can haul for 50 cents. Natural law forbids the Gould line to haul it for less than 75 cents lest it overcharge the other points to make up the loss. Thus does one violation of natural law always lead to another. It also forbids the Harriman line to overcharge. As a result the Gould line loses all through business from A to B and is confined only to business between intervening stations.

This seems like a most radical contention in this age of railroad consolidation, but why, we ask, shall the Gould line be protected against Harriman competition any more than one merchant shall be protected against another whose increased facilities make competition possible? Just as with the one merchant, so must the Gould line expect to lose A to B business. To juggle our entire rate schedule to equalize the chances of every railroad line in the country is a most flagrant violation of natural law and has naturally led to endless trouble.

Two or more roads often touch the same two points. But no two roads ever parallel each other so close between those points that their intervening stations are the same. Therefore no road could be driven out of business between a majority of its stations. But wherever it has any two stations in common with any other road, and its mile for mile hauling cost is greater, there is no way to equalize the charges of the two roads between the two stations that will not result in injustice to some other shipper. And justice to every shipper being in our estimation paramount to the existence of any railroad we can not sustain the objection to this result.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING
CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 435,000.00

DIRECTORS: James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.
Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant
Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909.....38,610,731.93
Total Assets41,261,682.21
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office,
or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin
by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock
P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First
Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-
President, Emil Rohde; Cashier, A. H. R.
Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann;
Secretary, George Tourny; Assistant Secretary,
A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt,
Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohde, Ign. Steinhart, I. N.
Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, F. Tillmann, Jr., E.
T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C.
Heyer, Manager.

The Third Result

A third result would be to prevent the juggling of rates to equalize the respective chances of the New York and Chicago manufacturer in the San Francisco markets. The idea of equalizing the chances of every city, of every industry, of every railroad and, in short, of all industrial conditions everywhere throughout the country, is as absurd a contention as that of the most extreme Socialist who would equalize every man among us. All men are not equal and to attempt to make them so would cause trouble. The attempt to make all cities and industries equal is responsible today for much of our transportation chaos. Every locality in America has some natural advantage distinct unto itself and upon this advantage alone must it build its foundation. As with men so with cities. We stand or fall upon our own ability. So must cities and industries, and any attempt to equalize them is a violation of natural law.

The Fourth Result

A fourth result would be to deprive the coast cities of the chance to make jobbing centers of the larger interior cities and would in turn deprive these larger interior cities of the privilege of lower rates than their suburban neighbors, even though the suburbs might require just that much less actual hauling. Right here let us pause and admit that any city able to receive freight in carload or in trainload lots is by natural law entitled to just as much a lower freight rate as the railroad is able to grant it by virtue of that fact. "The more you buy, the cheaper we can sell," is in full compliance with natural law and may well be said by the railroads to the cities with regard to freight service. Coast cities and the larger interior cities are entitled to any advantages that may be theirs by virtue of their ability to buy freight service in larger quantity. They are entitled to whatever greater growth and development is theirs by virtue of any of their other natural advantages. But further than these two, they are entitled to no advantages whatsoever and especially in the matter of railroad rates.

And it is just because natural law would deny any further advantages than these that its proposed enforcement is met today with such a vigorous protest. And neither faction asks for its full enforcement. The coast cities, having everything in their grasp, oppose any change at all and even deny the right of the large interior cities, such as Spokane, Reno and Fresno, to even an equal land rate with them, to say nothing of a lesser one. They now wield absolute power and will not relinquish an iota of it. These interior cities, while demanding at least an even rate with the coasters, are, however, opposed to a pure mileage basis as that would, in turn, lose them their grip on their suburban neighbors. Both factions would make the strong stronger and the weak weaker.

We are fighting to-day to preserve our democracy by taking it away from the special interests and giving it to the people. As we are toward individuals, so must we be toward cities. The entire West beyond the Rockies, both coast and interior, has perhaps the most radiant future before it of any part of our country. But its most glorious possibilities and its most wonderful opportunities can not and will not be realized by any policy which does not in absolute justice to each and every city, coast or interior, large or small, grant to that city the full and unrestricted benefit of each and every facility for its development to which natural laws entitle it. Let Seattle and San Francisco remember that their greatest growth will not come at the expense of Spokane and Reno and Fresno, and, in turn, let these interior cities remember that they can receive their full measure of development only as their suburban neighbors share it with them. These cities all have some distinct natural advantage. Let them realize from these advantages the full measure that is in them, but let them all remember that the railroads were built, not for one nor for some, but for all, that there is no room for selfishness and an unfair advantage in our busy western life and that our only motto from now on must be "All for one and one for all."

The Fifth Result.

A fifth result, and one which should be especially welcome to the hearts of San Fran-

Rubber Stamps 10 CENTS PER LINE

AT
Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do. To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3% per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

J. Downey Harvey	S. G. Murphy
John A. Hooper	James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper	J. H. Skinner
Thomas Jennings	Rudolph Spreckels
James K. Lynch	John W. Van Bergen
Walter S. Martin	Clinton E. Worden
J. K. Moffitt	George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

(Continued on Page 382)

I WAS the sole passenger on the stage that runs from Monterey to Carmel. The driver was not communicative. He had halted his team at the first turn outside Monterey, to adjust a cranky brake shoe, and thereafter his attention was equally divided between the horses, the brake shoe and a large quid of tobacco. Apparently he had not seen me when I got in at the railroad station, and he had answered my remarks about the fine day and the brisk team with grunts and without lifting his eyes. I was rebuffed, and kept still.

But when we breasted the last rise before turning into the oak forest and I looked back over quiet Monterey to the bright blue bosom of the bay, sparkling with foam and gay with little sails, I burst out again.

"Beautiful! Beautiful!" I exclaimed.

The driver turned and transfixed me with a long and sober stare.

"Stranger," he said, "you should see Coronado."

I was charmed to have broken the silence.

"Why is that?" I inquired.

The driver ignored the question.

"Yes, sir, you should see Coronado. That is to say, if you swim. Now, I'm a swimmer. When I was a boy, back'n the states, I uster swim like a side-wheel polypus, and I useter think there weren't no place to swim like the Missoura river. Yes, sir, I learnt early. My daddy says to me, one day, he says, 'Sonny, come on down to the branch.' So I went down to the branch with him and he says, says he, 'Sonny, do you see that bright rock down to the bottom o' that there pool?' And I says to him, I says, 'Yes, sir, I do.' And he says to me, he says, 'Git it.' And afore I knowed what was what, he'd picked me up by the seat of my pants and the back of my collar, and throwed me plumb into the middle of that there pool. Yes, sir, and he stood on the bank with a stick in his hand and he yells to me, 'Don't you come out of that there pool till you git that rock.'

"And I didn't. I was raised in the fear o' God, sir, and of a hickory stick, and my maw was a Baptist and my paw was a Presbyterian that believed in infant damnation, and I just naturally took to that water like a duck and learned to swim. You see, that was what my paw was a-drivin' at in the first place, but he war no man to tell everything he knew, especially to his children.

"As I was a-sayin', I am a swimmer, and p'raps you'll believe me when I say that I thought there weren't no place to swim in like the Missoura river. I have saw cleaner rivers and more reliable rivers, but as for swimmin', give me the Missoura river. You bet!

"Except Coronado. Of course, that ain't a river, properly speakin', but it's water, and there you are. Bein' a stranger, you ain't interested in knowin' why I left Missoura, so I aint tellin' you that my daddy once forgot to leave word that he had took Deacon Hepple's bay mare and then forgot to return her, but he was a man of few words, as I was sayin' before, and he never said nothin' at all after that for his breath bein' too short. But, as I was sayin', the climate was bad in Missoura, and I jest naturally came West and I says, says I, when I see the West, 'The West fer me,' and the West it is.

"Well, sir, I struck Californy at Los Angeles. I see pretty quick that that weren't no place fer me. No, sir. I says to the first man I see there the next mornin', I says, 'Where's the best swimmin' hole in these parts?' That man looked at me like I was a seven-toed cannibal in the side-show. He looks at me like he was dazed, and then he looks mad and says 'Hell!' and walks off. I felt pretty hot myself, but from what I knew of the shorter catechism and, about hell I thinks to myself there must be some mistake, so I asks the next man I see, 'Where's your best swimmin' hole?' He was perlit as ice, but he looked a good deal like the other fellow, and I thought he was goin' to say the same thing. But pretty soon he chirked up and he says, says he, 'I see you're a stranger in these parts.'

"I says to him, 'Kerect you are, sir, and hotter'n gehenna, and I'm lookin' for a place to git cool and clean up.' Well, sir, he says to me, 'When it rains in these parts you can swim right here in this here street,' he says, 'but it ain't rained fer six months, and nobody knows when it will rain,' he says, 'and until it does rain,' he says, 'you had better go to Coronado.'

THE MISSOURA FOR SWIMMIN'

BY

E. FRENCH STROTHER

"I left for Coronado right then. I wuz an all-fired long time a-gettin' there, but I figured it out to myself this way, I did. I says to myself, 'You've come seventeen thousand miles without seein' enough rain to wet a dog's back, and here you are twixt Coronado and high water and if the water's anywhere around you'd better be huntin' water. Sich bein' the case, I found Coronado. If I'd only of knowed it, I'd a found water a lot quicker, but I was youthful in them days. Twenty-one, stranger.

"Well, sir, when I seen Coronado, I says, 'Praise be, here's a puddle,' and I never stopped to strip nor shuck, but I just waded right in and struck right out and I swum and I swum and I swum. Yes, sir, I'm a swimmer, as I was a-tellin' of you, and I never gave no thought to how fur I was swimmin' nor where I was a-goin' to. I jest laid myself out and swum fit to kill. And it was easy. I'd never had no swimmin' in salt water before, and it was all new to me, and as easy as pie.

"I don't know how long I swum, straight ahead and happy. I was too glad to see water onct more to think of anything else. But bimeby I begun to get tired. This here business of swimmin' in yer clocs aint what it might be, and I aint no ingine, though I'm a swimmer, as I was a-tellin' you. Well, when I got purty tired, I lets up a bit and rolls around a little, easy like, and I looks back over my shoulder and, bless Dick, there aint no back. Nary a thing in sight. And there I was. Yes, sir. I was right there till I hit the rise of a big wave and looks back again, and I see I was mistaken, there was something back there, little old Coronado, but, bless me, the shore was away back there. About a mile. I judged. Leastways, I reckoned if I went to dry off in time for supper I'd-better be huntin' Coronado, and you bet you-I headed for land and put on full power.

"But somethin' was wrong, stranger. Them was anxious moments for me. As I was a-tellin' you, I thought there weren't no place like the Missoura river for swimmin'. The current's bad, but you c'n quarter across it, and you're sure to hit land somewhere. Yes, sir, the Missoura river has banks on both sides of it from one end of it to the other, and land somewheres you must. But this here Coronado has a worse current than the Missoura river, and there aint a doggoned bank to it. No, sir, nothin' but one place to tell this earth goodbye.

"As I was a-sayin', I turned on full power and I fairly clawed them waves apart for seemed to me like an hour. Then I says to myself, take 'er easy and git your bearin's and don't sweat yourself to death. So I looks over the top of the next big wave, and there was Coronado, one mile due east. 'Cuss the luck,' says I, I says, 'aint there no progress bein' made here?' I was a Democrat, stranger, and I was fits for progress in them days. Especially at Coronado.

"All of a sudden I felt as funny, like I'd been immersed by a darky deacon through a hole in the ice, cold all over, and then I was sweatin', and then I was scared plumb to death. I forgets all about takin' her easy and

I lit into that there water and made her hum fer mebbe twenty minutes. Yes, sir, things was boilin' around there. I hadn't never see Coronado but onct afore, but I shore did want to see her again, and I was in a hurry to do it, too, stranger. The next high wave that come along I was a-sightin' for Coronado, and shore enough, there she was, as placid and smilin' as a May mornin', one mile due east.

"Well, sir, I was mad clean through. I says to myself, I says, 'Quit your durn foolishness, now,' and I sailed into them waves and the way I knocked 'em off to the sides weren't slow. No, sir, I was going to Coronado faster'n the Old Nick goin' to the mourner's bench. Purty soon I see a sail boat out'n the corner of my eye, and I was a-gainin' on her fast, a-catchin' right up with her. I was feelin' pretty good about that, but the next time I see that sail boat I see why I was a-gainin' on her. Yes, sir. She was headin' due west.

"I was sick, wusser'n fever'n ager to onct. I looks for Coronado, and there she were, one mile due east. The Missoura river for swimmin', says I, and as for Coronado, to Los Angeles with her. And then I begins to yell. I see that that there sail boat were the one hope for me this side of glory, and I puts on full power to get there. Stranger, you can't holler and swim. You may take your choice, but you can't have both. It can't be did. On nowise can it be did. Never try it. I done it, and I imbibed all that there Coronado to onct. The Missoura river for mud, but Coronado for the bitterness of Mary.

"But I could still wave. I did wave. I wove arms and I wove legs, and I caught the eye of the sailor man on that there sail boat. And stranger, what do you suppose that sailor man done? He laughed! Yes, sir, he laughed, and he laughed, and he laughed. And then he turned the plow-handle and turned that there boat's snout straight for the Haywayan islands and went a-clippin' off at a two-forty gait, still a-laughin'.

"I could have killed that man if I could have, but I couldn't. I was too busy drownin'. Yes, sir, drownin' in the Coronado, and me a swimmer, as I was a-tellin' you, seventeen thousand miles from Missoura, and with my clocs on. Mebbe you've heerd tell that a drownin' man sees everything he ever seen when he's a-drownin', like a pannyrammer. Stranger, that's a lie. When I was a-drownin' in the Coronado I never see no happy home where I was born in, nor no Sunday-school lessons, nor nothin' o' the sort. What I seen was the cutest little shark you ever see, gnawin' my toes off while I was playin' marbles with a abalone pearl to the bottom of the sea. Them is the facts in the case. My, it was gashtly. Yes, sir, it was gruesome.

"I weren't afraid to die. Not a bit of it. I was jest thunderin' anxious to see Coronado. When I was purty nigh drowned, I says, one last call for Coronado. But there weren't no calls left. I couldn't raise a flip. I jest lay there, a-listenin' for them angel voices, when I see the durndest lookin' angel's face ever I see starin' at me over the side of a row boat.

"I hollers help, and then that angel says, he says, 'What'n hell you tryin' to do?' Sounded queer, from a real angel, but I chirps back, 'Drownin', and closes my eyes. 'Drownin'?' he says, 'drownin'? Can't you walk?'

"Walk, I says, 'walk? This aint Los Angeles.'

"No,' says he, he says, 'but it's Coronado. Put your feet down, ye durn fool, and walk to shore.'

"And stranger, I done it. I put my feet down, and there I were, waist deep in the Coronado. I looks around for land, and there she is, smilin' and bright as a May mornin', one mile due east. I looks around for that angel in the row boat, and he's headin' for the Haywayan islands and gruntin' like a hog. He weren't no angel, stranger. He were a skunk. I ast him to take me back to Coronado, and do you s'pose he would do it? No, sir, he would not. And I had to walk. Yes, sir, walk to Coronado, one mile, and me a drowned man. You may say what you like about Monterey, but you oughter see—"

We drew up at the Pine Inn, and I missed the rest. Now that I think of it, I'm not sure but that I missed the point of what he told me, too.

("Terminal Rate Question"—Continued)

cisco and Seattle shippers, is one pointed out in an editorial in the San Francisco Call, under date of March 13, 1910, in a reply by that paper to a previous article by the writer. We quote from that editorial as follows:

"The reason why water competition is not more extensive is that the railroads are permitted to meet the competition by giving low rates to coast cities. Now if the railroads were compelled to put everything on a mileage basis they might virtually go out of business so far as inter-coast trade is concerned. With such a rule in force water competition on a vast scale would spring up in short order."

Think of it. For months the Call has complained because the alliance between the Southern Pacific and the Pacific Mail has denied to San Francisco the benefits of water competition. For months Mr. Wm. R. Wheeler has labored in his efforts at Washington to break this alliance. And yet, when by the Call's own statement a mileage land rate would at once make this competition a reality, we find both the Call and Mr. Wheeler always opposing such a course. We would not be hasty and misjudge by forming an erroneous conclusion, but the only one we can logically arrive at here is that, if San Francisco can get lower water rates and still have advantage enough over Reno and Fresno to make jobbing centers of them, she will take the lower rates, but she will retain the present rate rather than give up this advantage. In other words, it really does not matter what she does pay as long as she keeps this advantage.

We will neither agree nor disagree with the Call that a mileage basis would bring actual competition by sea. Frankly, we don't know. But we can say that if it did not there would be soon seen in San Francisco the finest example of the "Get Busy" doctrine ever witnessed. Mr. Wheeler, instead of having to fight any longer alone and single handed at Washington, would receive assistance even if the whole Chamber of Commerce had to go to Washington in a special train to render it to him. Or, failing in this, San Francisco would soon have by some means an independent line of ships on the ocean, protected in some manner against the results of Mr. Schwerin's cut-throat competition that would follow. Where there is a will there is a way, and once establish a mileage land rate and San Francisco would find that way and find it shortly.

Is Enforcement of Natural Law Practicable?

In the foregoing paragraphs we have defined this question, we have stated what in our opinion is its source and what is its only solution. We have assumed the solution applied and have noted the results and the objections to them and stated why we believe the objections could not be sustained. There is one remaining phase of the question. Assuming that we have argued correctly and that the only solution is the application of the provisions of natural law as we have enumerated them, the question which arises is, whether or not such solution is practicable and possible. On this point we have an opinion which anyone can surmise if they can read our heart along with this article. This opinion we will not state. We will, instead, state our ideas as to what would be necessary to render the solution possible and then leave to our readers the answer to the question.

An Enlarged Commission

The first step necessary would be the enlarging of the Interstate Commerce Commission and then in turn its subdivision into as many parts as there are states and territories in the union. The work of each separate part would then be to ascertain the exact value of all property of every railroad in that state, from the stationery in the smallest country station to the depot itself in the largest city. The cost of construction of every mile of track and the cost of maintenance and of operation of every separate mile of road should be exactly ascertained, where the roads were on a level and where there were grades. These commissions should have full authority to inspect any of the railroad books necessary to obtain this information. Such information, when all correctly gathered (the work would consume from two to three years), could be used as a basis for establishing freight rates on every commodity on each and every separate mile of track in the United States that would pay the cost of transportation, allow for improvements, extensions, maintenance and depreciation and pay a right profit on the capital invested.

To give a hypothetical illustration, suppose a given commodity to be shipped from A to B over a total distance of 1000 miles. Over 500 miles the road is mountainous and a just rate is 5 cents; over 300 miles the road is level and a just rate is 2 cents; over 200 miles the road is also level but requires much more capital to construct and more to maintain and a just rate here will be 3 cents. The rate then from A to B on this commodity will be the total of 500 miles at 5 cents, 300 miles at 2 cents and 200 miles at 3 cents. In case that A and B were both large cities they would have the advantage of whatever the reduction in transportation cost might be to the railroads by virtue of their ability to run through trains between A and B, this reduction also to be established by the commission. From these rates the railroads could not appeal because the commission, having all the data that the companies themselves had, could at once refute any argument claiming injustice.

Such a mass of information, by always being kept up to date, would always be a barrier against any unjust raise in rates. A similar commission and a similar system would establish water rates between all United States ports. Such a work has been done by the state railroad commission in Wisconsin and the railroads there have obeyed the law without appeal, according to Senator La Follette of that state. They knew it was useless to appeal, so they kept right on doing business, giving good service and making legitimate profits.

Why Not in California?

Such a work has been done by an honest commission in one state in the union. That the present system in California is notoriously unjust and that such a work is badly needed here can be best understood by those who have seen one of our principal cities so retarded in development by the present system that it has today but a population of 30,000 where it should have 50,000. We refer to the city of Fresno. But such injustice is not confined to that city alone and the need for freight rate reform is not confined to California alone nor even to the Pacific Coast. This terminal rate question can not be entirely solved for any one state until every state has followed the example of Wisconsin and established its rates upon a mileage basis.

Can such a result be universally accomplished in this country? To you who know how the railroads have defied law in the past, how much greater their antagonism would be to the measures here proposed, who know our courts and our legislatures, who know our whole political system and the type of men who compose our commissions, and who know the apathy of the American people, the writer leaves the answer to this question.

But not until this result is accomplished, not until each and every present violation of natural law ceases and its every provision becomes fully and everywhere enforced will full justice be done to all and our western empire commence fully to come into its own.

BUFFALO BILL'S FAREWELL

Buffalo Bill is now showing his Wild West at Madison Square Garden, New York. He is also advertising that this is the beginning of a grand, final tour of the country, after which he will retire to private life. Buffalo Bill is now 64 years old. The press agent probably wrote his "Farewell Proclamation" for him, but it is worth reproducing anyhow, as it has his signature to it. It is as follows:

To the Public:

After many years of almost constant devotion to my calling, I have determined to retire from active service at the expiration of a final and complete tour of the American continent. Therefore, following a series of "Farewell Exhibitions" which I hope to give in 1910 and 1911, I shall permanently abandon the arena, and seek to enjoy some of the fruits of my labors, which I feel that I have well earned during a long life of activity on the frontier, in the field during the Civil and Indian Wars, and as a provider of the most approved drama of our national history.

It is, however, my earnest desire to once more salute from the saddle my millions of friends and patrons, and I take this opportunity to emphatically state that this will be my last, sole and only professional appearance in the cities and towns nominated in the present itinerary, as it is my purpose to leave the active management of the great educational exhibit, which I have created, in the hands of my partner, Major G. W. Lillie (Pawnee Bill), and his associates, who will continue the enterprise on the same magnificent scale and true fidelity that I have always tried to maintain, but without my personal presence in the saddle.

And now that I have reached this unalterable conclusion, I want to thank my numerous friends and the public for the full measure of success and applause that they have bestowed upon me, and I know of no honor that I shall cherish more than their good wishes, while the silent years are lurking in ambush for "The Old Scout," and at the conclusion of each and every performance I shall bid my numerous friends a fond farewell.

Yours, always sincerely,

W. F. CODY,

"Buffalo Bill."

SHEAR WIT

Extract from a young lady's letter from Venice: "Last night I lay in a gondola in the Grand Canal, drinking it all in, and life never seemed so full before."—Lippincott's.

A conscientious Sunday-school teacher had been endeavoring to impress upon her pupils the ultimate triumph of goodness over beauty. At the close of a story in which she flattered herself that this point had been well established, she turned confidently to a ten-year-old pupil and inquired, "And now, Alice, which would you rather be, beautiful or good?" "Well," replied Alice, after a moment's reflection, "I think I'd a great deal rather be beautiful—and repent."—Lippincott's.

Lord Palmerton expected work to be done well, but of mere peccadilloes he was tolerant. Some young gentlemen in the foreign office amused themselves by "shining" young ladies who lived on the other side of the street—that is, by catching the rays of the sun on a mirror and flashing them over the way. The father of the young ladies complained to Palmerton, who thereupon issued this minute: "The secretary of state desires that the gentlemen in this department will not cast disagreeable reflections on the ladies opposite."—London Chronicle.

Neal Ball, the famous shortstop, mourns that women will not learn the idea of baseball. At a recent banquet, he said: "With the ladies I adopt a light, facetious tone in baseball matters. A lady once said to me: 'I love baseball, Mr. Ball. I love especially to watch the man at the bat. It is so cute, too, the way he keeps hitting the ground gently with the bat's end. Why does he do that, though?' 'Well, you see, madam,' said I, 'the worms have an annoying habit of coming up to see who's batting, and that naturally puts a man out a bit; so he just taps them on the head lightly and down they go.'"—Washington Star.

Secretary Coburn and Dave Leahy were visiting the other day, and Leahy mentioned the ten-story skyscraper which some farmer was erecting in Wichita. "Do you know, Dave," said Coburn, without batting an eye, "that until I became secretary of the state board of agriculture you never heard of a farmer having enough money to build a skyscraper." "Well," said Dave, "when I was a youngster, over in Illinois, I worked on a section, and then got a promotion, handling baggage at a station. I was the chauffeur of a truck. I felt pretty big about it. Though I thought I was getting a good pay check, I wanted more. But the boss didn't raise me any. He always kept telling me how poor the road was. So I just quit. And do you know that the next year that road built 700 miles of track?"—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

MARK TWAIN'S GRIEF POEM

[In Memoriam—Olivia Susan Clemens. Died August 15, 1896. Aged 24.]

In a fair valley—oh, how long ago, how long ago!
Where all the broad expanse was clothed in vines
And fruitful fields and meadows starred with flowers,
And clear streams wandered at their idle will,
And still lakes slept, their burnished surfaces
A dream of painted clouds, and soft airs
Went whispering with odorous breath,
And all was peace—in that fair vale,
Shut from the troubled world, a nameless hamlet drowsed.

Hard by, apart, a temple stood;
And strangers from the outer world,
Passing, noted it with tired eyes,
And seeing, saw it not;
A glimpse of its fair form—an answering momentary thrill—
And they passed on, careless and unaware.

They could not know the cunning of its make;
They could not know the secret shut up in its heart;

Only the dwellers of the hamlet knew;
They knew that what seemed brass was gold;
What marble seemed, was ivory;
The glories that enriched the milky surfaces—
The trailing vines, and interwoven flowers,
And tropic birds a-wing, clothed all in tinted fire—

They knew for what they were, not what they seemed;

Encrustings all of gems, not perishable splendors of the brush.

They knew the secret spot where one must stand—

They knew the surest hour, the proper slant of sun—

To gather in, unmarred, undimmed,
The vision of the fane in all its fairy grace,
A fainting dream against the opal sky,
And more than this. They knew
That in the temple's inmost place a spirit dwelt,—

For glimpses of it they had caught
Beyond the curtains when the priests
That served the altar came and went.

All loved that light and held it dear
That had this partial grace;
But the adoring priests alone who lived
By day and night submerged in its immortal glow,

Knew all its power and depth and could appraise the loss

If it should fade and fail and come no more.
All this was long ago—so long ago!

The light burned on; and they that worshipped it,

And they that caught its flash at intervals and held it dear,

Contented lived in sure possession. Ah,
How long ago it was!

And then when they
Were nothing fearing, and God's peace was in the air,

And none was prophesying harm—
The vast disaster fell;

Where stood the temple when the sun went down,

Was vacant desert when it rose again!

Ah, yes! 'Tis ages since it chanced!
So long ago it was,

That from the memory of the hamlet-folk the Light has passed—

They scarce believing now that once it was,
Or if believing, yet not missing it,

And reconciled to have it gone.
Not so the priests! Oh, not so

The stricken ones that served it day and night,
Adoring it, abiding in the healing of its peace;

They stand yet where erst they stood,
Speechless in that dim morning long ago;

And still they gaze, as then they gazed,
And murmur, "It will come again;

It knows our pain—it knows—it knows—
Ah, surely, it will come again."

A BRILLIANT AMERICAN STUDENT

To Miss Julia H. Gulliver has been given an extraordinary honor, nothing less than her election as an officer of the French academy, in recognition of her services to vocational education. Miss Gulliver was a graduate from Smith college in 1879, and becoming greatly interested in the new idea of the higher education of women gave herself wholly to the study of vocational training as the most valuable and practical form through which women may fit themselves for life; and she spent nine years in close study before she took her degree of doctor of philosophy in 1888. Miss Gulliver is president of Rockland college, Ill.:

Miss Gulliver conceived the idea that the girl who goes to college may need just as much the assurance of being able to turn her training into dollars and cents when she graduates. The idea that all college girls are wealthy, is, of course, absurd. Many of them come of families in which a sacrifice is made to enable them to spend three or four years at college. The presumption is, of course, that when the girls graduate they will be better fitted to earn their living. Now, it was to provide for just such conditions that Miss Gulliver planned, and how well she has succeeded is a source of satisfaction to all the loyal alumnae of Smith. She has done wonderful things, she has shown how a girl may acquire culture, finish, polish, and, withal, a bread-winning capacity that is fully equal to that of the average college man when he graduates. She has made it plain that every course a girl takes at college may be so chosen that it will bear directly on fitting her for the profession, the vocation, that she intends to adopt in after life. That Miss Gulliver has been made an officer of the French academy is an honor, but to those who know her and have followed her work during all these years, it is no more than might be expected to befall her once her worth was made known abroad.

The idea of vocational training has been so developed that Rockland college, with its 300 students, and over 30 instructors, is considered a model.

100 GREAT PLAYS

"From Sir John Lubbock to Charles W. Eliot," said Howard Herrick to a Dramatic Mirror representative, "there have been more than a hundred lists prepared of the 100 best books. These lists have always aroused much discussion and criticism, and therein was the good, for those lists undoubtedly aroused new interest in books that by many had been overlooked or forgotten—and books that were well worth while. So far as I know there has never—at least in recent years—been prepared a list of the 100 best plays, and it would be a temerarious undertaking unless it were prepared by a man like William Archer or William Winter—some one who could speak ex cathedra. I have, however, prepared a list of 100 plays that have attracted a vast deal of public interest and that at least live in memory. From this list the plays of Shakespeare are omitted because they are in a class of their own. Also no foreign plays are mentioned except those that have been presented on the English or American stage. There has been no attempt to classify the plays in order of merit. The arrangement is largely chronological, although not strictly so, for the reason that all of the plays by a given author are grouped together.

"It would take too much space to comment upon many of the plays named," continued Mr. Herrick, "and, after all, the main object in preparing this list is to interest play lovers in reading many of the old plays that are still enjoyable despite their time-worn forms. In fact, there are some plays in this list that would prove highly interesting to the public if revived on the stage of the New theatre. Take, for instance, such plays as Philip Massinger's 'A New Way to Pay Old Debts,' Knowles' 'The Love Chase' (which was once a delightful feature of the repertoire of Julia Marlowe), 'Damon and Pythias' (a favorite with Macready and Forrest), Gilbert's 'Pygmalion and Galatea,' and 'Adrienne Lecouvreur.' There are some plays, such as 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' that many might think should not appear in such a list, but the basis of selection has not been literary merit. The list is far from being a perfect one, but I hope it will arouse enough interest so that eventually a list will be evolved that will be helpful to those who wish to study the progress and development of the English and American drama." Here is Mr. Herrick's list:

"A New Way to Pay Old Debts," "She Stoops to Conquer," "School for Scandal," "The Rivals," "Virginius," "The Hunchback," "The Love Chase," "Richelieu," "The Lady of Lyons," "Ingomar," "Louis XI," "The Mountebank," "The Fool's Revenge," "Ruy Blas," "Faust," "Adrienne Lecouvreur," "Damon and Pythias," "Pygmalion and Galatea," "The Corsican Brothers," "Monte Cristo," "Don Caesar de Bazan," "Camille," "Frou Frou," "Francesca da Rimini," "The Bells," "London Assurance," "The Shaughran," "Rip Van Winkle," "The Two Orphans," "A Celebrated Case," "Fedora," "Diplomacy," "Divorçons," "A Scrap of Paper," "Madame Sans Gene," "Caste," "Black-Eyed Susan," "Article 47," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "East Lynne," "Fanchon," "A Parisian Romance," "Hazel Kirke," "The Banker's Daughter," "Shenandoah," "The Henrietta," "Held by the Enemy," "Secret Service," "Sherlock Holmes," "Jim the Penman," "Shore Acres," "In Old Kentucky," "Esmeralda," "The Private Secretary," "The Professor's Love Story," "The Charity Ball," "The Heart of Maryland," "Zaza," "Magda," "Hannele," "Monna Vanna," "The Silver King," "The Middleman," "The Dancing Girl," "The Liars," "Mrs. Dane's Defense," "The Second Mrs. Tanageray," "Trelawney of the Wells," "Iris," "Sowing the Wind," "Cyrano de Bergerac," "L'Aiglon," "Ghosts," "A Doll's House," "Hedda Gabler," "Charley's Aunt," "A Contented Woman," "A Texas Steer," "Trilby," "Ben Hur," "The Prisoner of Zenda," "Lady Windermere's Fan," "A Woman of No Importance," "Mrs. Warren's Profession," "Candida," "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," "The Christian," "The Easiest Way," "Paid in Full," "Arizona," "The Witching Hour," "Sapho," "The Climbers," "The Truth," "When We Were Twenty-one," "The Great Divide," "The Servant in the House."

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

Estate of GEORGE E. WOODBURY, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within ten months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of Oliver Ellsworth, Room 824, Mills Building, corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco, Cal., which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.

A. M. HAINES,
Administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, May 2nd, 1910.
OLIVER ELLSWORTH, Attorney for Administrator,
Mills Building, San Francisco.

5-6-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF CHARLES H. MORRELL, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Rhinette Morrell, executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said executrix at the office of Joseph Hutchinson, rooms 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

RHINETTE MORRELL.

Executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

Dated San Francisco, April 20, 1910.

JOSEPH HUTCHINSON, attorney for Executrix,
710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, Cal.

NOTICE TO STOCKHOLDERS OF GIGANTE MINING COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in accordance with a resolution of the Board of Directors of Gigante Mining Company, duly adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, held on the 31st day of March, 1910, a special meeting of the stockholders of Gigante Mining Company will be held on the 14th day of June, 1910, at the hour of two o'clock P. M. of that day, at Room 269 in the Russ Building, on the west line of Montgomery street between Pine and Bush streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the principal place of business, and the office of said corporation, and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet. That the object and purpose of said Stockholders' Meeting is to take into consideration and then and there act upon a proposition to increase the capital stock of said Gigante Mining Company by the amount of $25,000.00, that is to say, from $100,000.00, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each, its present capital stock, to $125,000.00, divided into 125,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each.

Dated at San Francisco, California, the 31st day of March, 1910.

AUG. WATERMAN,
Secretary of Gigante Mining Company.

4-8-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

State Convention and Committee.

As explained a fortnight ago, the State Committee of the Republican party, at least, is not a representative body. Its executive committee of twenty-one has been designated by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, and when it had elected its corps of officers, it was injected into the larger committee, officers and all, and virtually became the state committee, its officers becoming the officers of the state committee. No more thoroughly unrepresentative body of men could well be gotten together, but thanks to the new direct primary law, Republicans will hereafter have an opportunity to control their party machinery if they have the energy and independence to avail themselves of the chance. Democrats have not been so derelict in this matter.

But the old, non-representative Republican State Committee has yet one or two functions to perform. There has been talk of calling it together to make up a primary ticket, but that would be bearding the insurgent lion in its den and it is doubtful if the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau will dare to take that step.

The other thing remaining to be done, in common with the State Committees of other parties, is at least fifty days before the August primary is to be held, to prepare a written petition signed by the chairman and secretary and file it with the Secretary of State, setting forth the date and place of holding the next state convention, the number of delegates entitled to seats in the convention, also the number of delegates apportioned to each county, together with a brief statement of the purposes for which said convention shall be assembled. This was the only function which Mr. Herrin in past years graciously allowed the Republican State Committee to perform, and even the performance of that function was programmed by his executive committee. Copies of this petition must be mailed by the chairman and secretary of the state committee to the chairmen and secretaries of all the county committees in the state.

In the years when a president and vice-president are to be nominated the state conventions must be called to meet in May. In the years when state officers are to be nominated the state conventions of the parties must be called to meet within four weeks from the holding of the August primary election.

Now that a state convention is no longer a bargain counter there is not much for it to do except to adopt a platform of party principles, elect a state committee and help that committee to make provision for the campaign before the people. There is reason to fear that the seeming unimportance of these functions will cause the people to pay little attention to the kind of men sent to state conventions. If so, it will be the opportunity of the "interests" to make up the conventions with serviceable men and so secure the election and officering of serviceable party officials. Therefore, look well to the men who go to the county conventions that they may look well to the delegates who go to the state conventions. Remember that the state committee and its officers will speak and act in the name of the party and its voters, in regard to Federal appointments and all things else, for the coming two years.

The making of a party platform under the new direct primary law will be a perfunctory performance binding upon no one. It will not be made until two to four weeks after candidates will have been nominated by the people, and no candidate nominated will stand aside because he does not endorse a platform made for him to stand on weeks after he has stood before the people on a platform of his own making and has been nominated. The real platform-making will be done by the candidates for nomination and their friends, just as the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League made and promulgated its platform months ago. Any platform to be worth the paper it is written on must be made in advance of the nomination of candidates. In that case, a candidate, if he can not stand on the platform of his party, can refuse a nomination.

Under the law as it is he has his nomination already in his pocket, and his policy has been sanctioned by his constituency in his nomination. Therefore a party platform, so far as he is concerned, made subsequent to his nomination, will cut little figure with him.

Every state convention must be made up of delegates elected by county conventions.

State committees of political parties are to be elected by state conventions and are to consist of not less than three members from each congressional district. The committee may be larger if the state convention so desires. The officers of each state committee are to be chosen by ballot of the members of the state committee and an executive committee may also be constituted. These committees hold until their successors are elected. This system makes government of the party representative as it must be made if government of state or country is to be representative.

A fact important to be noted is that the delegates elected to county conventions at the August primary election to be held this year will be the delegates who will constitute the county convention to be held in 1912 for the selection of delegates to go to the state convention, which state convention will select the delegates to go to the national convention to nominate candidates for President and Vice-President. The new law provides for exactly that situation, and there will not be another general primary after the one to be held on the 16th of August, 1910, until after candidates for President and Vice-President shall have been nominated. This makes the selection of county delegates this year doubly important. They will name the men who will name the men who will name the next party candidates for President and Vice-President. Therefore, look well to those delegates!

Grace George has bought the house of the late Richard Mansfield on Riverside drive, New York. She paid $51,000 for it.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary $50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE

Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.

1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: MAY 13: '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH·GOOD COURAGE·GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 25.

That Color Line

THE FRESNO REPUBLICAN is of opinion that the meeting, by Champion Jeffries of a gentleman of color in the prize ring will make prize fighting off-color ever after, and that the decadence of the sport will date from that event. Perhaps so. Per contra, may it not prove the zenith, climax, perihelion, ne plus ultra and e pluribus unum of the black race? To have met the pale-faced pugilistic champion face to face and fist to fist, perhaps to have vanquished him, before eager sporting thousands from Wall street as well as from Aphrodite alley—what white man, after that, could have any possible objection to allowing a negro to marry his daughter? Well may Johnson, in the improbable event of his victory, reel to the front of the stage and, with aspect gladiatorial, bellow forth the potent word, "Emancipated!"

The King Is Dead!

BORN PREDESTINATED to be loved, feared, coddled, adulated, altogether apart from what he himself was, Edward VII devoted the years of his youth and earlier manhood to pleasure seeking little reputable, his prime to blameless public functions and a private life never wholly unquestionable, so nearly rounding out three score years when he became king. Then less than a decade of real, self-restrained, beneficent statesmanship, a pacificator at home and abroad, a great factor for the maintenance of the peace of the world! Then the wages of self-indulgence cashed in. A heart that should have been strong fluttered in his breast, skipped a beat or two, started afresh and struck out feebly, recoiled, quivered and was still. One instant King of England and Emperor of India, the next a naked soul new-born into the life of mystery, the equivalent of the soul of the humblest subject that passed that day—equality at last! In the language of the street, a dead, game sport! Premonishing what was in store, he would, whether or no, be within his realm at dissolution and, with fever raging, he discharged the functions of his office with seeming unconcern until the last. His royal mother is said to have faltered at the brink. He stepped under the lowly lintel with clear eye and firm tread. Let him be judged by the way he took leave of life rather than by the way he lived it.

Long Live the King!

BLAMELESS, PRUDENT, narrow life, in maturity of years, George V comes to the sovereignty of a kingdom and an empire. Long live the king! He presides over, rather than rules, a prudent people. The misgivings many express concerning his reign this paper does not share. 'Tis true that our mother England should by now have done with the tinsel trappings of royalty. The vampire brood should be weaned of outworn privilege. The whole British superstructure is archaic. Privilege is wrong and only equality of opportunity befits a twentieth century civilization, but better bring this about by common consent than by revolution. Make the House of Lords an elective upper chamber. Suffer the dukes, earls, viscounts and barons to become citizens, no more except they achieve more, but in peace. The sense of brotherhood among Englishmen is too strong to have it otherwise. To these ends may George V devote himself! Long live the King!

The Inefficiency of it

IT DID NOT PAY John A. Benson to be a systematic and consistent plunderer of his government. Detested, impoverished, dead, he did not come out much ahead of the hounds ever upon his track, but what shall we say of the efficiency of a government that left such a man at large and marauding for half a life time? Twenty-five years in criminal conspiracy against his government and only one year in jail! Think of it! Is it any wonder that President Taft declared the administration of criminal justice in this country a disgrace to the nation?

The Skulkers

CERTAIN PAPERS, afraid of their shadows, are holding aloof from taking part in the direct primary contest, as they profess, in order that they may be the freer to make a fight for the nominee of their party, whoever he may be, in the general election. They may as well fold their tents and take to the desert first as last, for they will be practically out of the fight altogether. The only contest in which there is a principle involved, in which men are warranted in going up to battle with the fear of God in their hearts, is on right now in the Republican primary. After that fight is over the issue will probably be one of party against party, both parties standing for much the same things, all of which will warrant no man in getting hot in the collar. These non-combatants are so many skulkers. Nothing else can be made out of 'em.

Two Bites in That Cherry?

IT WAS KIND of President Taft to declare that, if there is to be but one exposition commemorating the opening of the Panama canal, San Francisco should be the place for holding it. But are we to understand from that that the Great Pacificator is going also to smile benignantly upon the ambitions of New Orleans? If so, then "double, double, toil and trouble."

Our Special Ambassador

THE APPOINTMENT of Theodore Roosevelt to be Special American Ambassador at the obsequies of the dead king was too obvious a thing to do to occasion comment. As to who shall take precedence over the other, the Special Ambassador or the regular, is something that small minds may potter over if they have nothing better to do. Theodore Roosevelt will settle that by promptly taking the head of the American procession.

Flannery's Battery

IT IS A FORMIDABLE BATTERY which former Police Commissioner Flannery feels called upon to array against the lone district attorney of Marin County, with George A. Knight in the box, Frank Gould catcher, Martinelli on first base, Heggerty for short stop and James W. Keyes, and a few private detectives, in the outfield. We are mistaken if this array does not impress jury and public with the gravity of defendant's situation.

A Petty Perfidy

IT WAS POPULARLY SUPPOSED that when in September last, the President exonerated Ballinger, and dismissed Glavis with a denunciation, he had before him Attorney General Wickersham's full report as afterward given out for publication. Somehow Attorney Brandeis, for Glavis, got an inkling that the Wickersham report was not made until long after the President had given Ballinger a certificate of character and had taken from Glavis the character he had. As we go to press a dispatch comes from Washington stating that Wickersham has admitted that his report to the President was dated back to make it appear that the President had his full report before him when he had not. A petty perfidy, if nothing worse, and one that will tend to put Wickersham in the same basket with Ballinger, neither a commendable nor comfortable situation for a cabinet officer. Is it not about time for the President to have a "clar'n out" in that cabinet?

TAFT AND THE LEAGUE

Efforts are making to induce the public to believe that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is opposed to President Taft and his policies. Such is not and has not been the case. Two years ago it was the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League that forced the candidacy of William Howard Taft upon a reluctant, shilly-shallying Republican "organization" that had not made up its mind whether to support Taft or oppose him and did not reach a conclusion three days before the assembling of the State convention.

This is not saying that there has not been disappointment in the League with William Howard Taft in office. That disappointment is prevalent among the common people from ocean to ocean, and it is for the most part deserved. He put some men into his cabinet that did not possess, and have not gained, the confidence of the people. He went to the natural enemies of his policies for support for them to the neglect of the natural friends of those policies. He went out of his way to justify an unjustifiable tariff law and still farther to commend the traffic manager to whose bargain-counter manipulation that tariff law was due. He has not taken the public into his confidence, and he has timidly required the government to be "buttressed by the law" without being as exacting as the people would like to see him in requiring those to buttress themselves by the law who would exploit the government to their own advantage.

And yet few doubt the sincerity and patriotism of President Taft, and no body of men cherishes a more sincere desire to see his administration made a success than does the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League of California. He was their candidate. They forced California into the Taft column and hold themselves responsible to the people of California for him. Why should not Lincoln-Roosevelt Republicans wish to see his administration successful?

Yielding a hearty loyalty to the Taft policies, and understanding them to be essentially the Roosevelt policies, Lincoln-Roosevelt Republicans would, nevertheless, have the specific measure he advocates submitted to the closest scrutiny, lest those among his advisers who are their enemies introduce into his measures some "joker" or "bug" injurious to the public and in contravention of Roosevelt policies. Such scrupulous inspection has been justified by the fact. The provision in his railroad bill permitting roads that own fifty per cent of the capital stock of competing roads to acquire the remainder, instead of forcing them to sell what they have, affords a case in point.

Nor does the League believe that the President may safely look to the natural enemies of his policies for help in securing the enactment of those policies into law. An aroused and outraged public sentiment has put his stand-pat contingent already on the run. Aldrich, Hale, Cannon, and the rest, are "dead-ones" and not one of our Representatives in Congress who has followed their lead but comes home to a dissatisfied and disappointed constituency. And yet the League, its leadership and membership, stands ready to reinforce the President in every way it can, short of giving character to a political "organization" that has no character, and countenancing legislative methods at Washington that should be intolerable in any country.

Let the President be true to himself and no patriotic American, in the League or out of it, will be untrue to him, but the League is not made up of that quality of manhood that surrenders itself to a blind and unquestioning leadership of any chief, no, not even to that of Theodore Roosevelt. Even he must be right if he would have the League follow in his train. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will stand by President Taft whenever he deserves to be supported and more than this it cannot do and be faithful to its trust.

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

THE RAILROAD BILL

The most important piece of legislation before Congress is the railroad bill. If present reports are to be relied on, the bill has passed the House of Representatives in good form. It is too much to hope that any such bill can be put through the Senate without the swinging of the Big Stick for all it can be made worth. If the President does not find out who his friends are before that fight is finished, it will be because he can't learn, does not care, or because friends and foes all look alike to him.

If there are those who have not kept track of this measure, the following facts may interest them: The first draft of this bill was made in New York, in August, 1909, by Attorney General Wickersham, in collaboration with the Solicitor-General, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission and a member of Congress, and it was made with the view of embodying in concrete form the President's views regarding railroad legislation, as well as the views of Theodore Roosevelt. In short, it was a Roosevelt policy put into legislative form. It was then a good bill.

This done, the President gave audience to a number of railroad presidents and big financiers with the result that injurious concessions were made to them, the bill revamped accordingly and given to Senator Elkins to introduce in the Senate, and to Representative Mann to introduce in the House. Additional hearings were given in committee and in the Senate, further injurious concessions were made and a few fine "bugs" were introduced. In the House committee the measure had much the same experience, but was reported to the House and, after discussion on the floor, amended into what seems to be good form. In the Senate there has been much debate. The bill was reported informally for the reason that, Democrats and insurgent Republicans voting together, it could have been beaten in committee. The insurgents did not wish to beat the bill, but only to amend the "bugs" out of it, and this they are seeking to do on the floor of the Senate.

The bill provides for a commerce court of five judges that will cost the country $100,000 a year and will prove a convenience rather than a necessity, inasmuch as within four years last past only twenty-eight or twenty-nine cases have arisen such as are likely to arise for the consideration of this court.

In the establishment of this court was encountered the first "bug." Under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States only those decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission can be appealed from that involve constitutional questions, generally in the form of confiscations of property without due process. Under the pending bill it was sought, in the Senate, to so enlarge the jurisdiction of the commerce court as virtually to hear on appeal all issues arising in and decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, reducing that commission to a practical nullity. It was adroitly done, the Aldrich-Elkins organization protesting that the language used does not mean what it says and that they cherished no such ulterior design, but refusing meanwhile to permit the bill to be amended that the issue may be placed beyond question.

The next "bug" disclosed itself in the form of a provision declaring that it shall not be unlawful, as provided in the Sherman anti-trust law, for railroads to enter into traffic arrangements subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The insurgents were in favor of this, provided that the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission be had before the traffic arrangement became effective and the railroads are put beyond the reach of the anti-trust law. The Aldrich-Elkins combination demanded that these traffic arrangements become effective immediately upon notice of the same being filed with the commission, the commission to do its fault-finding afterward if at all.

The destructive character of this insect becomes apparent when we reflect that the whole nation is divided into three traffic zones, one embracing all territory between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean, another covering the territory between the Chicago district and the Missouri River, and the Eastern all between the Chicago sphere of influence and the Atlantic ocean. In these districts combined are four or five million separate rates. If the bill passes as the Aldrich gang want it to pass, the traffic associations covering these territories will immediately convene and agree to maintain existing rates, or perhaps existing rates plus a ten per cent advance, file their agreements with the Interstate Commerce Commission and so at once and forever place themselves beyond the reach of the anti-trust law. Then the only remedy that the public will have will consist in the ability of the Interstate Commerce Commission to take these rates up one at a time, see if they are reasonable, and either confirm or change them as that commission sees fit, subject to appeal to the Commerce Court, a work that would consume all the time of the commission for five to ten years if the commissioners did nothing else, thus breaking the law down of its own weight. Under the law as the insurgents want it these traffic arrangements can only be entered into in special cases where there is real need for them, which the Interstate Commerce Commission may inquire into and approve before they become effective.

This artful dodge was quite worthy of the Aldrich-Elkins gang, but scarcely creditable to Attorney General Wickersham, who so changed the bill to suit the railroad presidents. Nor is it creditable to the President of the United States, who seemingly consented to this sweeping concession, despite the fact that, in his speech at Des Moines on the railroad issue, and at other times, he specifically declared in favor of requiring the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission as a prerequisite to the authorization of traffic agreements between railroads which should be competitive.

There are more "bugs" in the bill as it came from the hands of Attorney General Wickersham, with the approval of the President, though the President may not have been "wise" to them. They will be considered hereafter. Nothing is likely to prove so injurious to the reputation of President Taft as his connection with Wickersham's connection with this bug-infested bill as reported to the Senate in the form in which it left the hands of the Attorney General of the United States.

A Feeling of Apprehension

There is no use in disguising the fact; the truth is that those members of the upper and lower houses of congress whose fidelity to public interests is not a subject of doubt en-tain a feeling of apprehensiveness regarding administration measures as prepared for enactment into legislation. While it has been the immemorial, and very proper, practice for legislative committees to call into consultation members of the cabinet of the President, as well as subordinate officials, President Taft has gone farther and has caused to be prepared specific measures embodying his proposals and submitted them in form to congress with the express understanding that they are administration measures.

This paper commended this act, and still commends it as tending toward efficiency in legislation, a serious lack with our American congress, but in our commendation it was stated that no greater heed should be paid to such measures than though prepared in committee. But the tendency in congress has been for the regulars to say to the insurgent members: "You will accept this measure as it comes from the President or get out of the Republican party." That is going quite too far.

Then, too, the President's measures, or at least some of them, as they came from the hands of the Attorney-General, contained doubtful provisions. This is especially true of the railroad bill as elsewhere explained in this paper.

Such incidents are creating a feeling of distrust of the administration in the minds of many. The President appears to have surrounded himself with a precious set of reactionaries. While men do not yet question the sincerity of the President, they do doubt the sincerity of those whom he has commissioned to speak and act for him and to crystallize his measures into statutes. It is another case of inability of the king to do wrong, coupled with an urgent demand that the king's advisers be watched with sleepless eye.

The President has placed himself in the hands of as grim a set of materialists as ever blighted the enthusiasm of a people or made representative government misrepresentative of anything save special interests, and we may not know in what these influences will result. The legislative "bug" and "joker" are to be looked for in every clause of every bill that Wickersham has drafted. The subjects dealt with are tremendously important. They are railroad control, conservation, and the future disposition of the public domain. Few yet doubt the patriotic good intentions of the President. What he has said in public has been fine, but everyone may doubt the single mindedness of Aldrich and Elkins, Cannon and Dazell, Wickersham and Ballinger. If the President is to be judged by the friends he has made he will suffer harsh judgment.

Where the State is Weak

The Governor of California is without authority to invade the county of Alameda and the town of Emeryville to put a stop to an encounter that is to disgrace the state. The fair name of California is in the keeping of the sheriff and district attorney of every county in the state and not in the state government itself. There are certain conditions under which the Attorney-General of the state may intervene where justice is likely to fail because of the culpability or incapacity of the prosecuting attorney of any county, but that officer is generally loth to exercise that prerogative and it does not run to a full maintenance of the honor of the commonwealth. The state should not be left thus impotent. The governor of the state should have power to invoke all police and judicial powers of the state to save the reputation of the state whenever he has reason to believe that any sheriff or district attorney is, or purposes to be, negligent or consenting to that which is unlawful. He should have the power to impeach such negligent officer before any court of competent jurisdiction and so deprive him of an office he is unfit to fill. He should have power to direct the attorney-general to institute proceedings in such cases, and then he should have a trained state constabulary behind him to enforce executive orders and decrees of courts. Our state government is, when it comes to coping with crime, ineffective to the point of imbecility. In strengthening its arm there is opportunity for constructive legislation of the first quality.

Where the President is Right

The President wants a permanent, plenary, well-paid tariff commission, kept busy finding out the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. He is right. In trying to make the tariff board into a tariff commission the President was not buttressed by the law, but Congress should do the buttressing and do it now. To be sure this is locking the stable door after some valuable equines have been stolen therefrom, but there are some inside yet. Save them. Protection is right when rightly applied. When applied by an Aldrich it is robbery and does not much miss being rape as well as robbery. Hitherto the policy of protection has been applied wholly in the interests of the producer. The consumer also has rights and it is time to have his day in court. If the President can extort from a stand-pat congress a full-fledged permanent tariff commission, equipped with the sinews of war, he will be doing something we can all be proud of.

Look Again

Worcester, Massachusetts, has about 100,000 people and, for two years, has been a dry town. During that two years 2,125,551 gallons of beer and 102,293 gallons of distilled spirits were shipped into Worcester and presumably sold and consumed there. This does not look much as though prohibition prohibited in Worcester, now does it? But look again. The average per capita consumption of beer for the whole country is 21 gallons per year. It took Worcester two years to consume so large a per capita. The average consumption of distilled spirits in the United States per capita is 1.6 gallons. It required two years for "dry" Worcester to consume an average per capita of one gallon. Before going "dry" Worcester probably kept pretty close to holding up her end as a consumer of spirit and malt liquors, hence being "dry" is at least only half as "wet" as being a "wet" city. That is something of a gain. This paper is of opinion that a better system than the one Worcester is following is entirely practicable, and fully as dry as pretending to be "dry" without being real "dry," but the day is coming when, if forced to choose between "wet" and "dry," most American cities will choose "dry," if for no other reason than because it is better to be half "dry" than all "wet."

What To Do With the Money

The postal savings bank idea is good. It was always good. There is a large class of persons whose needs nothing else will satisfy, but what can the government do with the money? No one wants this government to be eternally in debt. It were as well for it to be out of debt as for any citizen to be out of debt. For the government to be a money lender is fraught with the gravest dangers. Congress is compromising with the issue, without solving it, by proposing to keep five per cent of the deposits in the national treasury, invest half the remainder in bonds and lend the other half to national banks in the vicinity where deposited. This device may serve for a time, but furnishes only a makeshift answer to the all important question: What ought the government to do with the money?

The Deeper Significance :: :: of Living :: ::

Do you love money? Every time you see a pile of it, does a thrill run through you as through a dipsomaniac when his nostrils catch a whiff of whisky? If you haven't the love that bad, about how bad have you that money-lust that is the root of all evil? Can you hear the clink of the counting of coin unmoved? These questions are to be propounded to one's self and answered by one's self in justice to one's self. Open confessions are good for the soul, especially when made to the soul—much better and safer than when made to the public.

One may acquire a money-lust before he knows it. For twenty years of his life the writer of this seemingly lived that he might pay his hands Saturday night, and he made it a point of honor to pay them. It required no end of rustling for money, already earned a time or two, in order to get the cash in hand for his employees, and the thing so wrought upon his nerves that the chinking of coin against coin startles him to this day. All that saved him from developing a downright money love was that he got a chance to hoard very little of what he handled and acquired, meantime, the habit of paying his obligations as promptly as he would that others might have paid him. We are creatures of habit and the money-loving habit may be acquired all unconsciously.

The writer has in mind a man who loves money. It is the only blemish upon his character. He is a Christian gentleman, and it were not a surprising matter if he gave a tenth of his income to the Lord, as he would call it, but no one else will ever get a cent of it without giving full value in return as long as he can hold onto it, and what is given to the Lord is not parted from without wringing the heart. Yet this man would be astounded and indignant if told that he loves money, loves it to the danger point of making that love the root of much evil.

He is affluent. He became so, not through inheritance or lucky chance, but through the conscientious practicing of the homeliest and sanest of virtues—economy, self-restraint, integrity, thinking hard and planning wisely, using his pencil on every proposition, looking ahead, studying values that he might buy cheap and sell dear. He has done nothing except what honest folk must do if they would get on, but, all unknowingly, he has, little by little, day by day, suffered love for money to fasten its grip upon his heart, sticking its claws in so that its hold cannot be loosened without risk to the heart itself. It seems as if a splendid character is to be ruined by this one insidious, unconscious vice.

It is not handling money that makes men love it. Paper money is foul, and even gold right from the mint will, if one handle enough of it, grime into and blacken the fingers most disgustingly. Bank tellers get so that money does not mean money to them, but only counters, playing the part in commerce that chips do in card games, mere conveniences for keeping accounts. It is not a good thing for one to become so calloused to the deeper significance of these devices for keeping accounts as to lose its import, for money means much to the world. It plays a great part in its weal or its woe, and it is good to keep sensitive to its deeper meaning, but it is not good to love it. Few influences produce greater evil than that.

How shall we avoid it? By not permitting acquisition to become the master passion of the mind and heart and soul. Some men, great men, business men, strive only to accomplish, others only to acquire. One man takes a piece of raw land and makes of it a farm which appeals to him in terms of productivity, of home-making, of mouth-feeding, of animate things that grow under his touch, rejoicing his heart. Another does the same things, but interprets all in dollars, dollars, dollars, and by and by dollars become the object of his overmastering passion. That is the way of it, and the end of it is a blighted character.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Something About Rural Delivery

Over his rural free delivery routes Uncle Sam distributes annually almost three billion letters and parcels. None of us has a very adequate idea of the immensity of the number thus lightly mentioned; it is to us something most vague and indefinite, but by considering further facts we may form some estimate of it. To deliver these three billion letters and parcels 41,000 carriers are required, the cost of the service being $36,000,000 a year. Each one of these carriers, then, distributes about 73,000 pieces a year, or 200 on an average day. A strikingly good showing for the carriers is indicated in the fact that but 165 of the 41,000, or three-eighths of one per cent, were dismissed last year for cause, and not one of these was dismissed for stealing from the mails or dishonesty of any sort. At the Washington center of this mighty system, a system extending from Florida to Alaska and from Maine to Southern California, but 110 people are employed, or one to every 373 carriers. A big business, and it should be remembered that this is only one line of goods carried in Uncle Sam's great department store.

Growth of the World's Big Cities

The Christian Science Monitor presents some interesting figures anent the estimated population, in 1909, of the world's greatest cities, their recent growth and their prospective population if the present rate of growth is maintained. There are six cities of more than two million inhabitants each. These are London, with 7,452,986; New York, with 4,564,792; Paris, with 2,792,988; Chicago, with 2,224,490; Berlin, with 2,164,944, and Vienna, with 2,100,356. The average annual increase of growth in recent years has been 125,000 in New York, 109,046 in London, 58,435 in Chicago, 50,222 in Vienna, 31,199 in Berlin, and 9,865 in Paris, New York heading the list in rapidity of growth. It is curious to note the changes in the relative standing of these cities which would take place were the present rate of growth maintained for another fifty years. London would maintain the first place with a population of 13,000,000, and New York still would hold the second place with a population of 11,000,000, but Chicago would have risen to third place with a population of 5,000,000, Berlin to fourth place with 4,750,000, Vienna would have dropped to fifth place (having been passed by Berlin) with 4,750,000, and Paris would have dropped to the bottom of the list with 3,250,000. At that time, supposing that the present rate of growth is maintained, it is interesting to note that the population of New York and Chicago alone would be more than half as great as that of the entire United States in 1860, or just a century earlier. Consideration of such facts and forecasts as these emphasizes the duty of Americans to improve, as rapidly as may be, their municipal conditions.

Another Method for Murdering Men

It is a hope not without possibility of fruition that little man yet will become so self-destructive in warfare that he will be glad to hasten the day when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." A recent invention apparently trending in this hopeful direction was lately demonstrated before Kaiser Wilhelm. It is the invention of a German officer, and consists of what is described as a new and more effective Greek fire. Poured upon the waters, it scatters rapidly and burns fiercely, and, directed against an enemy's ships, soon would engulf them in a sea of flame. The fluid, the composition of which is a secret, is said to work very effectively, there being great possibilities of murder in it. Perhaps the hope may seem cruel, but it may be that one could entertain no better hope than that this invention may prove successful in operation, for, notwithstanding all that the Man of Nazareth taught, it is quite likely that little man will fight, war and murder until his wholesale capacity to kill causes him to fear to do so longer.

A Latin's Opinion of Latins

There is woe in the Latin breast, with difficulty only can it be comforted, and here is the cause of it: Baron Rafael Garofalo, formerly a professor at Naples University, and a recognized authority on ethnology, in a recent lecture compared the Latin and Anglo-Saxon peoples and arrived at conclusions tremendously to the discredit of the former. The Anglo-Saxons, the baron decided, are eminently more "safe and sane" than are the Latins, the latter forever being the victims of their own emotional excitability, lacking firmness of purpose and the ability to think twice before acting. It might seem that it would require no eminent ethnologist to arrive at these conclusions, many people who are not students of ethnology holding similar opinions, but think of an Italian savant dealing out so bitter a dose to Italians, to say nothing of other Latin peoples. It is not strange that Italy rebels and demands homeopathic treatment, as, in a way, it is doing. The Smiths may be inferior to the Browns, but for a Smith to get up in meeting and announce the fact, that is treason. It is no wonder that the Italians are aggrieved; almost any of us would be—unless, of course, we happened to be Anglo-Saxons.

Shipbuilding in Great Britain

While the building of ships in the United States remains in that condition of noxious desuetude which has characterized it for years, that industry is booming in Great Britain. Witness the figures, as compiled by "Lloyd's Register of Shipping": On March 31 there were under construction, exclusive of warships, 386 vessels of 1,057,636 tons burden, 349 being steamships and 37 sailing vessels. In addition to these, 81 warships of 326,185 tons displacement are being constructed. Of course, the United States is doing very well (or ill, according to the point of view) in the matter of building vessels of war, but that with which she offsets the remainder of British shipbuilding is pretty nearly nil. We have been too busy putting a trust riata around our brothers' necks to have time for such side issues as shipbuilding, and we are just beginning to see that the price of such neglect may be heavy. Nevertheless, congratulations to our British cousins; probably they would congratulate us in return if we would give them opportunity to do so.

Substitute for Rubber Discovered

Doctor Karl Harries, professor of chemistry at the University of Kiel, Germany, is said to have discovered a substitute for rubber. Indeed, as his product cannot be distinguished from nature's rubber in appearance, quality or durability, it might better be said, perhaps, that he has succeeded in manufacturing rubber. The article thus produced is from light brown to white in color, and is fully as tough and elastic as the natural article.

Railroad Coaches for Invalids

The Swiss Government, which runs its own railroads, is about to introduce an innovation in the form of coaches for invalids on its railroads. It has ordered four coaches, each costing $12,000, which are to be specially arranged for the transportation of sick people. In each car there will be an operating room, a pharmacy, rooms for patients, for their nurses and their friends. Everything will be provided for the treatment of the diseased as well as for their comfort. Apparently the idea is a good one which might be profitably adopted by countries other than Switzerland.

Cremation in Great Britain

Considering the length of time that cremation has been advocated as a means of making way with all that is mortal of man, it does not appear to have made much progress in Great Britain. For instance, last year there were but 855 cremations in the United Kingdom, and, although this was an increase of 60 over the year before, it is a small number as compared with the many who were buried.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

IT'S OUR MOVE

TO OUR NEW STORE AT

42 and 44 CALIFORNIA ST

One half block off Market St.

Calendars, Pocket Diaries
Office Diaries for 1910

LE COUNT, CLARK & ORMOND

STATIONERS AND PRINTERS
San Francisco

MAGAZINE Subscription Agency

216 OAKLAND BANK OF
SAVINGS BUILDING

Cor. 12th and Broadway
Oakland

We take subscriptions for any Magazine or Paper published in the world at reduced rates.

TELEPHONE OAKLAND 3786
BRANDON & WATSON
A Post Card will bring our 44 page catalogue to your door.

"We Hold Thee Safe"

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

ROLLA V. WATT

MANAGER

N. W. Corner Pine and Sansome Streets
SAN FRANCISCO

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

RENEWED

By W. A. Kendall

The files of the early newspapers and magazines of San Francisco contain many contributions by W. A. Kendall. He was originally a school teacher in one of the interior towns, but becoming filled with ambition, he came to San Francisco, where his experience in trying to follow literature as a vocation was a sorrowful one. Eventually he died by his own hand.

On these bold promontories, that outjut
Impassively into the mobile sea,
Each morning, ere the shadow-gates are shut,
I, for an hour, am free.

The west is spattered thick with fading stars,
The East is blank for the unwritten Day;
A few white clouds drift up in silver bars,
And sea-gulls whirl in spray.

This is a sacred altar, and a throne,
Where most I worship, and where most I reign;
The only spot the air of earth doth zone
That hath no touch of bane.

Regality of hope and space are mine;
As one uplifted from the plane of thought
I catch the promise-dawn of days divine,
To prophecy once brought.

Nature, the myriad-voiced, salutes my ear;
The utterance that babel Day confounds
Becomes accentuation full and clear,
And revelation sounds.

And this the declaration of the Morn
Unto the isolated on the height:
"Rejoice! Go down to labor newly born—
The valleys gleam with light!"

Renewed for effort, I descend and sing,
Taking of irksome tasks a cheerful hold;
And evenings in reward perpetual bring Sunsets of royal gold.

BJORNSON'S HOME LIFE

The following intimate description of the home life of Bjornson was written for the New York Times by one of the most famous of Danish writers, Mme. Karin Michaelis. She was one of the closest friends of Bjornson and his family, and no one is more closely acquainted than she with the home of which she writes:

No one who has been a guest at Aulestad, the home of the famous Norwegian poet, Bjornstjerne Bjornson, who died last week, will ever forget the moment when he entered there.

The path winds through the mountains between birch trees and pines along numerous waterfalls. There is a rushing noise of falling water and a fragrant perfume of wild strawberries. The large Danish horses are making good speed, and the driver, who has been serving at Aulestad for more than thirty years, points uphill and cries, "There lies Aulestad, a little higher up among all the trees and decorated with flags."

Yes, this is Aulestad! Like a great big sunflower, over which the winds of the Norwegian mountains are sweeping. The flags flutter in the breeze; Bjornson's flag is the largest in Norway. He has planted the flags of all the nations, also "The Star-Spangled Banner," on his grounds, and there they fly like good friends. The carriage passes through a long avenue of mighty birch trees, and there on the veranda stands Bjornson with open arms to welcome us.

He is the handsomest man not only in Norway, but in all Scandinavia. Every member of the family embraces you, for if you are a friend and a guest of Bjornson, you are a friend of every one in the household. From the moment you enter this house you feel that it is a heaven of rest now and henceforth.

When Bjornson wishes to pay the highest tribute to a guest, he says: "You shall sleep in Dagny's room." Dagny is his favorite daughter, the apple of his eye, and his living ideal.

As a little child he furnished two rooms for her in pure white; there she spent her days until she married and left her home. But every time she comes back on a visit she lives in those two white rooms of her childhood.

Every morning you can see her standing on the veranda with her abundance of heavy, golden hair. In her father's eyes she looks like the sun, and it is hard to say which he loves best—the glorious sun or his daughter's golden hair.

Bjornson is an early riser, and he considers it a favor shown him by his guests when they, too, rise early enough to breakfast with him. To repay you for the loss of a morning's sleep, he begins at once to entertain you in a most delightful fashion by telling stories. These stories at once transfer you to the land of fairies. What he tells you he sees in his imagination, until you forget time and place.

Finally he will rise and exclaim: "Oh, we have forgotten all about Karoline," and then he will go upstairs to his wife, who, with her white, silvery hair, is sitting up in bed eating her morning meal. His wife is very hard of hearing, but her temperament is very cheery and happy like the lark. Her heart is as great as the Atlantic Ocean, and there is room in it for every one.

Bjornson paces up and down the floor in his brocaded morning gown and skull cap; now and then he will disappear in his library, but when we laugh loudly enough for him to hear, he returns to share in our merriment. At last his wife will say, "Now you must go, children, Bjornson wants peace." Then we know we must depart. Then his work begins.

He sits in his big armchair with his face turned toward his beloved Norwegian mountains. On his writing table there stands a large clock which is wound once a year. This clock is one of his friends, and he loves it as well as a human being. His wife only has access to his library, and there those dear, white-haired people work together like two souls who know what is in each other's innermost thoughts.

Every line that he writes he shows her, and every line has been rewritten and approved by her. His name is on the title page, but there is not one line that has not been inspired by her love and by the enduring courage of her temperament.

When Bjornson, for example, is angry—and he does get angry now and then, in a most violent fashion, so that the very earth trembles—then every one grows pale with the exception of Karoline, his wife. These outbreaks on his part give her the impression of volcanic eruptions, and she feels no fear, but a keen sense of delight.

Bjornson's favorite dish was a kind of very hard bread broken up in milk, and after each meal he would take a long walk.

His farm extends from the top of the mountain down to the valley. It lies between the small villages and beautiful forests. Bjornson would walk slowly, staff in hand, listening to the songs of the birds. There was no farm in all Norway that was worked in such a progressive way as his. He bought the latest and most expensive agricultural implements from the United States; from Denmark he got the strongest horses and the best farm hands. Therefore Aulestad's crops are in proportion about the largest in the country.

The Norwegian peasants are of royal blood, and so was Bjornson. When he called on his neighbor a king met a king.

One of the great Danish authors once said, "The dead are scattered along the wayside of life begging with invisible outstretched hands for alms, and sometimes we living give them a thought like a man throwing a bone to a dog." If the dead were scattered along the wayside passed by Bjornson they received his innermost thoughts from his loving hands.

Bjornson did not spend all his time thinking; he was a man who enjoyed the simple pleasures of life. He was very fond of playing cards during the long winter nights, and he took a great interest in teaching the younger set of the house the rules for playing. He never gambled, but nevertheless he was in great earnest and observed the rules of the game in every particular.

When the clock struck 10 it was his bedtime, and at 11 o'clock every one in the household had to be in bed. His son Erling supervised the farm and his electric plant. Bjornson was proud of this plant—he was the only man in Norway who could boast of his own electric power, and sometimes when his family and guests were gathered together in the house during the summer evening he would suddenly illuminate the whole house, and then stand outside in front of it to enjoy the sight.

Two years ago Bjornson celebrated his golden wedding; but he alone did not celebrate it; no, the entire Scandinavian countries celebrated with him. It was in the fall, and this season in Norway turns the mountain sides into masses of gorgeous reds and yellows. This was the last public manifestation of sympathy and esteem which the author enjoyed, and this included not only his home folks, but the entire world at large shared therein.

From north and south came letters from friends and relatives who wanted to participate in the celebration. "But where are we going to make room for all these?" asked Bjornson. "Oh, let them come, every one of them," answered Karoline, as if she had the 1100 rooms of the Vatican to dispose of. And they came all.

Cooks were sent for from Christiania, carloads of spices came from the grocers, chickens and ducklings were murdered, and lambs and little pigs killed; and for three days and nights the fire was kept going in the stove in the kitchen. Mrs. Bjornson went smiling about, saying to her servants: "You just keep on cooking; I am sure we won't have too much even then."

The night before the eventful day Bjornson was put to bed early; the presents had all arrived, and had to be put in order; one single one, a whole new set of furniture, which filled three wagons, was put behind the barn. A score of men were moving and fixing things; the new chairs and tables were put around in the rooms, in place of the old ones, which, offended, looked at these intruders. Finally everything was fixed, and the walls looked like hanging gardens, decorated as they were with vines and wild roses.

Oh! moment never to be forgotten, when in the early dawn the golden bridal couple, she dressed in white, with a golden wreath of myrtle flowers on her white hair; he with a myrtle flower in his buttonhole, hand in hand, walked downstairs, where the grandchildren, all dressed in white, with their beautiful young voices, sang the same hymn which had been sung for their grandparents when they, fifty years ago, were married in the little Norwegian wooden church.

At noon the highway which leads up the mountains to Aulestad was crowded with people and carriages. Golden gifts were sent from Emperors and Kings; telegrams came in bunches of 500 at a time.

The house was soon like an ants' nest; and when the between two and three hundred nearest friends, coming from Russia, Denmark, Italy and South Africa, had dined, Bjornson called them together and said the most wonderful words that ever were said from husband to wife.

And when he had finished, all lights were extinguished in the house, for lo! along the road to the mountain a serpent of fire was seen to wind its way; coming nearer and nearer, shining and flickering. It was all the peasants from the Gausdal, who, each with his burning torch, came up to greet their King of Songs and his bride.

It was the first time torches had ever been seen in the Gausdal; old and young women leading babies at their hands and with infants in their arms followed the torchbearers. In the courtyard of Aulestad they stopped, and one of the old peasants came forward and greeted the bridal couple, after which they all, throwing their torches to the ground, thus making a mountain of fire, began singing Bjornson's most beautiful poem, the Norwegian National hymn, and slowly, slowly, they descended the mountain side, all the time singing, while Bjornson, with his wife in his arms, listened to them far into the night.

"GREATER SAN FRANCISCO"

A DREAM THAT MAY COME TRUE BEFORE 1915

Greater San Francisco. Population, one million. Bounded on the east by a line drawn from Haywards to Richmond, on the south by the southerly boundary of San Mateo, on the north by the northerly boundary of San Rafael, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean.

That is the aspiration and the creed of a part of the population of the transbay district and of most of the population of San Francisco. The Greater San Francisco Committee preached that creed a few years ago, in Berkeley, Oakland and Alameda, but they won little support at that time. The revelation of corruption in the Schmitz administration was just being made, and the overbay cities said, "We won't want anything to do with that kind of government."

But Mayor Taylor's administration showed that San Francisco could have better government. And the arguments advanced by the Greater San Francisco Committee have convinced many doubting minds. These arguments are about as follows:

About 100,000 people have their homes in the transbay cities whose whole business interests are in San Francisco. A conservative estimate shows that probably 50,000 of these are voters. By the mere fact that they use the transbay cities as lodging places, these 50,000 voters are practically disfranchised. That is, they are allowed to vote in Berkeley, or Oakland, or Alameda, on local questions of no great concern to them and of even less interest, but they are not allowed to vote in San Francisco on questions that vitally affect their personal and business relations and that are of the utmost interest to them.

This disfranchisement of the 50,000 commuting voters is more than a mere personal disadvantage. It is a distinct loss to the city of San Francisco, for these commuters are mainly men of family, many of them men of property, who have given hostage to the community, by these strongest of ties, for their serious interest in the community's welfare. These commuters are of the choicest product of American citizenship. They have been conspicuous for their support of decent government and movements for better things. Had they possessed the ballot in San Francisco, they would have held the balance of power at every election, and they would have saved the city in all probability from most of the disgraceful misgovernment from which it has suffered.

In this same connection, it is noteworthy that the mayoralty of great cities comes to be looked upon as a position of almost equal importance and dignity with the governorship of a State. This fact, combined with the larger salary that can be paid, attracts to the position men of greater ability than can be secured for smaller cities. It also excludes, even from consideration for the office, all but those men whose attainments and reputation are high enough to be familiar to the larger public.

A second strong argument in favor of the consideration of the cities is that it would eliminate the useless and costly duplications of local offices. At present, Oakland has a complete set of city officials, a separate fire department, a separate police department, a separate department of public works. Alameda duplicates all this array of officials and expense. Berkeley duplicates it. San Rafael duplicates it, on a smaller scale. Each little hamlet drains its resources to a like purpose. Combine these cities under one government, and at a stroke all these public functions are directed by one body of officials, sweeping away all the useless number of men doing the same work on a smaller plan.

The effect of this is more than merely to reduce expense. Where great public works are managed on a large scale, more expert service can be commanded for the higher places in that work, and the smallest district gets the benefit of the experience and judgment of men whom it could never hope to employ in its separate capacity. Another thing: Where these public works are all handled by one authority they are developed after a unified plan that makes for uniformity and prevents the friction that now arises from the overlapping interests at the boundaries of the present separate municipalities.

Another advantage to accrue from the elimination of the separate municipal governments would be to end the present little, local, factional political animosities and rivalries. As long as Richmond, for instance, is a separate city, it is bound to have a local pride that is jealous of a near-by rival town. It is certain to continue to have its little local "ring" of politicians and its nearsighted view of the public interest. Sweep aside the artificial geographical boundaries that make this state of mind possible, make the inhabitants of Richmond citizens of a great metropolitan city, and at once their view of things would enlarge immensely, their eyes would be turned to broader interests, and they would develop a breadth of sympathy that would lift them, politically and in other ways, out of a narrow and confined purview of things.

Another argument for consolidation is that it would greatly enhance the value of all real estate, both in San Francisco and the transbay district. In so doing, it would decrease the tax rate on the Oakland side and increase it on the San Francisco side, because the burden of taxation for street work in outlying districts, etc., would fall heaviest on the most valuable property in the most densely populated district. But the evil to the San Francisco property owner would be more than compensated by the increase in the value of his property and by the attendant increase in the prosperity of the transbay section, which directly feeds the prosperity of San Francisco. The transbay section, itself, would feel the same effect that was experienced by Brooklyn, when Greater New York was formed—its population increased by unprecedented bounds from the day of consolidation. The reason was not far to seek. Brooklyn received the benefit of equal service in the matter of street paving, police and fire protection, sewerage and sanitation that Manhattan had, without anything like the cost that it would have required had Brooklyn remained a separate municipality.

Another argument for consolidation is offered as an appeal to both sides of the bay. With the prospect that San Francisco will secure the World's Fair in 1915 has arisen the question of a proper site for the exposition grounds. It is pointed out that no site on the San Francisco peninsula would be nearly so accessible, even to the inhabitants of San Francisco, as that part of the waterfront of Oakland that lies between the Key Route pier and the Southern Pacific mole. A special ferry service from San Francisco would land the people of that city on the exposition grounds in twenty minutes from the foot of Market street, to which every street car line in San Francisco converges. On the other hand, only street car service, and that of only one or two lines, would be available to carry the crowds to any site on the San Francisco peninsula.

With the exposition on the Oakland side, Greater San Francisco would be the name of the city to which the world would be invited to come. The present city of San Francisco would derive as much benefit from the attendance as it would with the site on this side of the bay. Its greater hotel facilities and its world-famous scenes of interest would attract the public to spend much of their time on this side. At the same time, Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda would derive great benefit from their equal accessibility to the exposition grounds. With the exposition site on the San Francisco side, residents and visitors on the transbay shore would have to make several tedious changes of cars and boats to reach it.

Still another argument for consolidation is the instant and complete solution it offers for the problem of a Sierra water supply. San Francisco would be relieved of a considerable burden of the expense of acquiring and developing a Sierra source and water conduit, and the transbay cities would share in the benefit of an assured supply of potable water. Even if consolidation be never brought about, some arrangement for a united water supply will have to be made, but consolidation would at once sweep away the mass of perplexing legal obstacles that now stand in the way, obstacles that may require years of public agitation and even, perhaps, a constitutional amendment to remove if consolidation be not adopted.

THE CLOSED SHOP

(George A. Tracy, in "Transactions of the Commonwealth Club," April, 1910.)

A few generations ago, when large business enterprises were unknown; when business of all kinds was conducted in a small way, on small capital, when master and man, so-called in those days, worked side by side in shop and field, there was then small need for the "closed shop" rule, because the limitations of the business then conducted generally produced conditions that the present "closed shop" advocates now seek to establish and maintain. Then, the master, by close working contact with the man, was personally aware of the latter's condition and needs.

On the other hand, the employee was usually familiar with all the conditions surrounding the small business, and the bond of human sympathy was sufficiently strong to bridge over the periods of adversity or distress that overtook either party.

Those conditions have gone from our industrial system as completely and permanently as have the small enterprises that have been swallowed up by the great combinations of capital.

So it is that when we advocate the principle of the "closed shop," we have in mind the fact that the individual, as such, has been lost in the industrial field. The man who once enjoyed the personal acquaintance of his employer and was familiar with all of the little details of a little business enterprise, now becomes a mere unit in the great system. In most cases he never sees, and probably does not know exactly who are his employers. His services are engaged or dispensed with by a superintendent, or through an agency that exacts a commission for handing out the job.

What measure of protection is afforded the individual operator under such conditions, unless he combines with his fellow craftsmen in an effort to establish and maintain conditions that only the "closed shop" guarantees? * *

Great stress is frequently laid upon the bald statement that because a man invests his capital in a certain business or enterprise he should reserve to himself the absolute right to employ and discharge help as he chooses. I am not going to take the position that an employer does not have that right; but I shall contend that the men so employed have an equal right to form a combination of individual interests and force that employer to yield terms of employment that at least are fair to those employed, and that guarantee compensation commensurate with the service rendered. And I hold that these combinations of men, called unions, if they choose to pool their individual interests, have a perfect right to elect a spokesman to deal with the employer in the matter of wages, hours and working conditions. And I also hold that these combinations of men, called unions, when they find, after long years of experience, that the only apparent way to secure fair compensation for their labor, and decent and sanitary working conditions, is to eliminate the non-unionist from their industrial field, by ostracising him from the shop in which they work, then the end justifies the means.

When industrial conditions have reached the advanced stage where great captains of industry, enjoying a superior mentality through environment of wealth and education, are in a position to control almost absolutely the destiny of thousands of their fellow men and women, the liberty and independence of the humble worker in the ranks are only preserved in name, not in fact.

Two thousand watches, belonging to the Waltham company, were stolen from a pier in New York. They were valued at $20,000.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Let's Keep Hopin'

Let's keep hopin' for the morrow.
Care's a load we often borrow.
While we're gittin' old and older
Tryin' to tote it on our shoulder.
Not a day the future's bringin'
But will hear the birds a-singin'
Sweet defiance unto sorrow—
Let's keep hopin' for the morrow.
Let's keep sayin' that the graces
Of the past will light the faces
That are comin' to us, smilin'.
All the future's bliss beguilin'.
Care's a specter; we must slight him.
For he haunts those who invite him.
Build no castle unto sorrow—
Let's keep hopin' for the morrow.
Let's keep trustin', always trustin'.
Future's ways bear no adjustin'.
Once there came and sat beside me
Trouble, and she sadly eyed me,
Sayin', while she held, enthralled me:
"I have come because you called me."
Fool was I my care to borrow—
Let's keep hopin' for the morrow.

The Sweetest Thing in Life

Somebody has said Adoniram, that love's young dream is the sweetest thing in life. In such philosophy I used to believe, too, but that was when I was love's young dreamer, as all adults have been at one time or another, if they have not pretty much lived in vain. Nevertheless, the philosophy very often goes astray, and it develops that love's young dream was a nightmare, from which the dreamer wakes in a divorce court or under circumstances hardly more pleasant. The fact is that love's young dream not infrequently is neither sweetest, sweeter nor even sweet, save for brief time, and the lingering taste of it is bitter upon the tongue.

It is love's old dream, Adoniram, which, perhaps, is sweetest of all earthly conditions. Look you, they started, this man and woman, to journey along life's mist-hung pathway together, and he was young and strong and she was young and beautiful. The years crept on, and Joy came and they danced together to the music of laughter; Grief came, and, by a wee, white coffin, they drew closer to each other, their love made sacred by the sharing of a mutual sorrow; Worry came, but each read courage in the eyes of the other, and bid it defiance; Passion died, but in its place stood such tender, yearning, self-sacrificing love as God's white angels might envy them.

And so the aging couple creep down the western slope together, their love grown mighty as their bodies have grown weak. Wrinkles have displaced the bloom of youth, their feet totter. Time has touched to silver the hair of brown or gold, but to him she still is beautiful and to her he still is all-admirable. This is the alchemy of love, the love that grows not old, but dims the physical sight only that soul may learn to look upon soul and be glad. This, my boy, is the sweetest thing in life, and if another life shall reveal aught sweeter, we, hedged in by earth-fogs, have no capacity to foresee what it may be.

A Few Political Definitions

Populist—A humble individual who taught Republicans and Democrats most of the political doctrines in which they ardently believe. He is dead now.

Democrat—He is not dead but sleepeth, but the most competent experts scarcely can distinguish the difference.

Republican—Almost anybody whose father voted for another party that used to go under that name. A sort of pousse cafe of political faiths, with the privilege to everybody of drinking of the color that suits him best.

The Big Stick as Evidence

The nice man—Is your pa an admirer of Mr. Roosevelt?

The little boy—I dunno, I guess so.

"What makes you think so?"

"Well, you ought to see the size of the stick he uses on me sometimes."

The Opinions of Rufus

I noticed 'twas the woman with a han'some diamond ring that fergot her kid gloves, in her hurry, when she left home the other mornin'.

Middlin' often a dollar bill in the hand is worth two in a debtor's pocketbook.

The main difference 'tween Sunday clothin' an' some folks' piety is that the owners 'casionally use the clothin' on week days.

Es I look at it, a creed's the trademark that man blows in the clear glass of truth. It don't hurt the glass any, but I ain't certain how much it proves.

The most respectable thing 'bout some men is the dog that b'longs to 'em.

Forgiveness is divine—'cept when the guilty one is a pretty woman; in that case it's human an' masculine.

An act of kindness is like a neat kid glove: It makes even a big an' awkward hand beautiful.

Even if faith without works is dead, I've noticed that some men never quit tryin' to galvanize the corpse.

"It's love, they say, that makes the world go round;" but so will mixed drinks, an' in less time.

The man that differs with us may not be a knave, but ain't you never noticed in yourself a tendency to feel that he ought to consult a mind doctor?

It's the splendid privilege of every free-born American citizen that can't give a reason for the p'litical faith that's in him to get fightin' mad if anybody says a word against that faith.

The value of little things is proved by coral-bugs buildin' an island, but the thought ain't so encouragin' to me, I s'pose, es t'would be if I was a coral-bug.

There's Pulcifer

(The Fifth Assembly District covers a considerable part of Oakland, and its citizenry includes a large number of excellent and respectable people. The warm question over there just now is who shall represent them in the next Legislature.)

There's Pulcifer; they might have Pulcifer.

They had him once, as quite their choice of men,

And so, accustomed both to grief and shame,
Might noses hold and take the dose again.
He made a record—pass the smelling salts—

Which still on Oakland rests too like a curse,

For fifty-odd were better sans a doubt,
And only twenty-odd were slightly worse.

Oh, yes, they might have Pulcifer. He shows
A will to do more legislative stunts.

He voted 'gainst the race-track curse, 'tis true,
And else for right 'but once—yes, I said once—

On any bill of grace (see Hichborn's book),
Once for the right and five times for the wrong.

'Tis true, they might take Pulcifer again—
That is, if Oakland's stomach's strong.

Speaking of Pulcifer, some fifty-odd
Made better records, twenty-odd were worse.

This in a body which, its friends admit,
Was not inclined all righteousness to nurse!
Ho, Oakland, looking to the mighty gate

That westward opes, by nature's bounty nursed,

Such record writes in black your record, too.
Let's better choose, or else let's choose the worst.

* * *

The Defendant's Case Presented

Walt Mason, who writes a multitude of clever, jingling things for many papers, recently added the following to his output:

His eyes are full of unshed tears; he labors like a yoke of steers to drive the lean wolf from his door, and still he often hears it roar. He takes his money home and hands it to the woman who commands. He has no time for rest or play; he grinds and grinds his life away; he might enjoy existence yet, he might serenely strive and sweat, if, when he toddled home at night, the folks would meet him with delight. There is no sunshine in his life, because he has a nagging wife. She has a tireless tongue that flops and wags away, and never stops. He comes home weary, stiff and halt, to hear the hausfrau finding fault, and wailing over this and that, and throwing bootjacks at the cat. Some day, when driven to despair, he'll knock his brains out with a chair, and get the peace he long has sought, and mourned because he found it not. Oh, housewives of the bitter tongues, and brazen throats and leather lungs, remember that this nagging graft has driven hosts of husbands daft. The man who labors hard all day, and to his family brings his pay, and sacrifices all the joys indulged in by the other boys, deserves a home devoid of strife; deserves a kind and smiling wife. He labors in the heat and glare, and he should leave his troubles there, and going home at close of day, find peace and comfort holding sway.

The case for the complaining witness having thus been duly presented, the defendant has a right to be heard, and the following is respectfully submitted in her behalf:

Her life is one of tranquil ease, with naught to do save John to please, and to the romping kids attend, and get the meals world without end, and wash and wipe the dishes then, and do the dratted thing again, and yet again, and then some more, and mend the pants that Willie tore, and Susie's hose, and Betty's dress, and scrub the kitchen more or less, and clean the house, and wash some clothes, and see that baby blows her nose, and soothe when colic comes to harm—Oh, woman's life is full of charm! There's lots of sunshine in her life! It's just a snap to be a wife! And when John rambles home for food, of course, she's feeling sweet and good, and when he says, "Oh, dash such grub!" she can't help doting on her hub, and so she smiles both night and morn, as you and I would—in a horn. And oft, too oft, she hears John say, when she for groceries would pay, "What, money, sheekels, cash, you seek? I gave you fifty cents last week!" Not always so? Thank God, 'tis not, but at some men 'tis center shot. Oh, woman's life in bliss we wrap: it always is the softest snap! But if sometimes, worn out and tired, her tongue is loosed or bootjack fired, I've seen some cases, not so few—and so, I feel no doubt, have you—when I have said, and watched John dive: "Thank Heav'n, her spunk is yet alive!"

* * *

Pensions for Teachers

State Superintendent of Public Instruction Hyatt is in favor of old-age pensions for teachers; so are the county and city school superintendents of California; so would be the intelligent public if it would give the matter its thoughtful consideration, which, in about nineteen cases out of twenty, it will not do.

There is no other vocation than that of the teacher which does so much for humanity and receives so little for its splendid service. It takes our children of today and makes of them the world-builders of tomorrow, and not infrequently the child's only opportunity of enlightenment is in its keeping, for there is no enlightenment in his home. And for this magnificent service a poorly paid teacher gets less than is paid to a day-laborer, a well paid teacher less than the plumber or bricklayer receives, and few indeed are those who may hope to receive as much as is paid to a competent mechanic. We pay a promoter who engineers a scheme of wealth for us thousands of dollars, and we pay the teacher in whose hands is much of the destiny of our child from $50 to $150 a month. We are regal in compensating him who adds to our dollars; we are penurious in paying him who makes or unmakes our child's welfare. These words are true, and it is to our infinite shame that they are.

Doing such service to mankind as almost no other does, the teacher perforce pinches and scrimps through a life of genteel penury, and as old age draws on it is all but impossible that he shall have a competence laid up—and if, under these circumstances, he is not entitled to a pension, will you tell me of somebody that is? The teacher is the one person beyond all others whom an even partly appreciative public should pension.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

The Ticket of The Democrats There will probably be no contests over nominations for State office on the Democratic ticket at the August primary. Council and persuasion have removed all but one candidate for most of the places. The ticket that will probably appear on the Democratic ballot is as follows: For Governor, Theodore Bell of San Francisco; Lieutenant-Governor, Timothy Spellacy of Los Angeles; justices of the Supreme Court, Judge W. P. Lawlor of San Francisco and Judge Benjamin F. Bledsoe of San Bernardino; Clerk of Supreme Court, Hiram A. Blanchard of Santa Clara County; Secretary of State, S. S. Bayley of Alameda County; Superintendent of Public Instruction, T. H. Kirk of Pasadena; Treasurer, C. A. Andross of Marysville. The present hope of the Democratic leaders is that no candidate will come forward for controller, so that Democrats may write in the name of A. B. Nye, the incumbent and Republican candidate, whose record entitles him to a unanimous election.

Aspirants for Other Offices The meeting of the executive committee of the Democratic central committee, held on May 2d, had been planned to consider only the offices named in another paragraph. But the question of candidacies for the appellate bench, for the board of equalization and for the State railroad commission was brought forward at the meeting. The candidates for these offices will probably get the executive committee to handle their petitions as the others are handled, by paying $300 and having their petitions bound up with the State ticket for signatures. The aspirants for the District Court of Appeals from the First district are Judge George E. Church of Fresno County, Judge Bradley Sargent of Monterey County, Judge Lucien Smith of Santa Cruz County, and possibly the incumbent, Justice J. A. Cooper and some others. There may be a contest for this office, though Judge Church is the likely winner. The probable choice for appellate judge of the Second district is Judge D. K. Trask of Los Angeles, and of the Third district Judge Peter J. Shields of Sacramento. The men who are most likely to run for state railroad commissioner are: First district, F. R. Rammers of Vacaville; Second district, Barclay Henley of San Francisco; Third district, Ed White of Watsonville. Mr. Rammers may be contested by Dr. C. L. Browning of Chico. The candidates for the board of equalization have not yet been determined.

Sloane Will Beat Wright Senator Leroy A. Wright bids fair to suffer for his peculiar record in the last Legislature. Wright's origin and affiliations, in the opinion of many of his supporters, entitled the public to expect political independence, and many were disposed to credit him with that virtue when the session opened. Doubts grew when it was found that he could not be counted on for reform measures. When he finally fathered the defective Wright railroad bill, by which the excellent Stetson bill was defeated, he went on record as directly opposed to better things. He is now in line for a sound beating at the hands of his constituents, and advice received this week from one of the shrewdest political observers in Southern California indicate that Judge Sloane is going to be the rod in the hands of the Republican voters of the Fortieth senatorial district on August 16th.

Clerk Keyes Is Off Wrong County Clerk Charles G. Keyes of Los Angeles has been wrongly advised on one point in the direct primary law. He has announced that he will follow legal advice and refuse to check over more than one set of nominating petitions for each candidate. This means that all nominating petitions for each candidate signed in Los Angeles County must be turned in at one time, and the validity of the candidate's petition must stand or fall by the result of the verification of that one batch of signatures, without an opportunity to file further signatures, if necessary, within the time limit set by the law. This interpretation is plainly absurd. There may be no occasion to test its correctness, but neither is there now any occasion for Mr. Keyes to complicate further an already too perplexing situation by a ridiculous threat of this sort. However, candidates can save annoyance and possible friction by securing abundant signatures to their petitions in the first instance and by observing care in their selection.

San Francisco Clubs Organizing The Independent Republican Clubs of San Francisco are rapidly taking up the work of organizing their districts for Hiram Johnson. Meetings for this purpose were held this week by the clubs in the following districts: Monday, the Thirty-ninth district; Tuesday, the Twenty-eighth and Thirty-seventh districts; Wednesday, the Fortieth, Forty-first and Forty-third districts; and Thursday, the Thirtieth and Thirty-first. Tonight the Twenty-ninth and Thirty-third districts will organize, and tomorrow the Forty-fifth. Johnson meetings in San Francisco will probably be arranged for dates in the near future.

Other Activities In San Francisco The Central Executive Committee of the San Francisco Independent Republican Clubs met last Monday night and perfected arrangements for city organization in behalf of Hiram Johnson. Thomas H. Williams was chosen to be chairman of the finance committee, W. H. Stewart to be treasurer, and Paul Bancroft, M. S. Kohlberg and John H. McCallum to be auditing committee. It was agreed that the city campaign shall be in charge of a campaign committee of eighteen members, one to be chosen by the Independent Republican Club in each of the eighteen assembly districts.

The Central Executive Committee also decided to endorse Edward Rolkin for the office of member of the State Board of Equalization from the First district (San Francisco). This office and that of railroad commissioner from the San Francisco district were left to the autonomous action of the Central Executive Committee. That committee, at this meeting, took no action on the candidacy of H. D. Loveland for railroad commissioner. This was the proper thing to do, and Mr. Loveland's ambitions should be treated in the same way throughout the campaign. His record and affiliations do not warrant his endorsement for the office. The only other Republican candidate at present is Ed Aigeltinger, who is notoriously a machine man. Until better material is offered or can be brought out, no candidate should be endorsed.

The League Has Stirred 'Em Up The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League's fight for a full State ticket at the approaching primary election has undoubtedly done more than all other things combined to arouse that preliminary interest and discussion that will make the first election under the new primary law a fair test of the direct primary idea. Conceive the League's ticket to be out of the field, and imagine the interest in the campaign that would be left. Compare that state of listless indifference with the actual ferment of discussion, meetings and interest that the ticket has aroused throughout California. The Hiram Johnson campaign meetings have done more than everything else to bring out the unprecedented pre-primary enthusiasm of the present year. It has also—the Watchman quotes the observation of a keen student of politics—done more to bring out an early registration in the country districts than anything else in years. The advocates of the direct primary idea owe many thanks to the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League.

Abolish R. R. Commission? Machine politicians are getting it on the "low down" that the State Railroad Commission is to be abolished by constitutional amendment. This may be the machine program, and certainly the prospect of having such men as John M. Eshleman and Alexander Gordon on the commission—pledged and determined to do equal justice to public and railroads—is enough to make the machine wishes father such a thought. More likely, however, the machine has sense enough to know that the popular cry for regulation of the railroads would not be silenced by abolishing the commission, especially after some good members on it have demonstrated its possibilities for usefulness. More probably the machine program is to get a constitutional amendment adopted, making the commission appointees of the Governor instead of elective by the people. That arrangement would have certain advantages, depending altogether on the character of the Governor. But the thing to do now is to elect Gordon and Eshleman and show what a properly constituted commission can do.

More About Eshleman John M. Eshleman, candidate for the Republican nomination for railroad commissioner from the Third district, will be 34 years old next month. He was born in the "Egypt" delta of Illinois. At 14 he was thrown on his own resources, and has found them adequate since to carry him through college, to the State Legislature and to the district attorneyship of Imperial County. At 17 he was teaching school. At 20 he was picking oranges in Southern California. In two more years of hard work as a camp steward for the Southern Pacific Company and of hard study at nights he had equipped himself to pass successfully the entrance examination to the University of California. There he took about all the honors there were—Phi Beta Kappa, Winged Helmet, Golden Bear, president of the junior class, president of the Associated Students, associate editor of the junior annual, of the college daily, of the college weekly, and of the college monthly, and member of the Psi Upsilon Fraternity. And he left college with the word of several professors and the president that he was the most distinguished scholar the university had graduated in many years.

Out of college, he made the State Bureau of Labor Statistics a useful institution for the first time in its history. In the Legislature of 1907 he forced the first anti-racetrack bill through the Assembly against all kinds of threats and cajolery. In spite of broken health, which he largely recovered in the desert of southernmost California, he quickly became first district attorney of Imperial County and the most successful private attorney in Southern California outside of Los Angeles. He could have that office again this year, by unanimous vote, if he wanted it. Mr. Eshleman has gone far in public life, and will serve California in large fields and to greater effect in the future. He is a growing man, and strong for Right Things. Watch him.

How Candidate Platforms Would Work in Practice The Charter revision convention in San Francisco has suggested that candidates be permitted to submit hundred-word platforms to their constituents, to be printed at public cost and distributed to the voters without expense to the candidates, together and with the sample ballots officially sent out. Nothing else is quite so enlightening as an object lesson. Let us therefore illustrate the point by assuming that the gubernatorial candidates for Republican nomination promulgate their personal platforms as follows:

Mr. Curry: "Fellow citizens and the Royal Arch. I desire to be governor of California because I desire to be governor of California, and for the further reason that I make politics of business and business of politics; out of office and politics I should find existence precarious and life uninteresting. My 'organization' fealty has never been questioned, all rumor to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. Stanton: "I desire the Republican nomination for governor because I think that the nomination ought to come South this time. If ever I have kicked over 'organization' lines, remember on my behalf that I have always kicked back again when I was needed. If anybody says anything about that Alaska-Yukon Exposition, answer with a rah! for the grand old party."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

Mr. Anderson: "I want the Republican nomination for governor because my friend Herrin wants me to have it if I can beat Curry. If I can't, then he wants Curry, but I am also the candidate of those certain interests that want prosperity and don't care a whoop who governs us so we get the business and can see the wheels go round. I have always been clean and decent and never have taken sides for or against anything. I am a dead, safe man. Yours truly."

Mr. Johnson: "I want to be governor of California that I may help to make California a free and independent State; recover government from the hands of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, that has usurped it, and restore it to the people of California, where it belongs, that it may be by them transmitted to their children, as they received it, an unimpaired heritage. There is no other issue, for, in accomplishing this task, we shall emancipate our courts and make justice equal, speedy and certain."

On second thought, the individual hundred-word-platform idea has much to commend it. It prevents candidates masquerading under false colors and gives them a chance to say all they need to in order to make their position clear.

Sackett Will Quit Assemblyman George L. Sackett of Ventura County has announced that he will not be a candidate for re-election. Sackett has served two terms in the Assembly, and has generally voted right. On the eleven test issues applied by Mr. Hichborn, Mr. Sackett voted right ten times and was absent once, and yet he has been an "organization" man throughout his legislative history. It was as an "organization" man, to whom something was due, that Mr. Furlong was displaced from the position of secretary of the text-book committee that the place might be given to Mr. Sackett. His advocacy of the candidacy of Mr. Charles F. Curry for governor connotes in the mind that which is unpleasant, for Mr. Sackett knows perfectly well what manner of politician Charles F. Curry is. A clear-headed gentleman and a good legislator, George L. Sackett narrowly misses being a man who can ill be spared from our legislative halls. Somehow he has just dabbled enough in "organization" politics to take the lustre from his linen without suffering it to be seriously soiled.

Otis Seeing The Light Assemblyman Frank Otis of the Forty-seventh district (Alameda) will probably be endorsed for the senate by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. His record in the last Legislature was good. The only hesitation felt by the more ardent reformers of Alameda was about his willingness to stand out openly against the machine. The failure of the reform forces in the 1909 session of the legislature was caused by lack of proper organization of the reform members. It is essential this year that candidates declare, prior to the primary, where they may be found after the organization of the Legislature next winter. Mr. Otis is beginning to see the necessity for this kind of a declaration, and we may look for such a statement from him as will put his pledged word where his intentions seem always to have stood. The word is being passed down the line in Alameda that Otis must be knifed by machine voters. The reason is that Otis did not get a job as assembly clerk for Wilbur Lanktree, son of Boss Joe Lanktree. Joe Lanktree says he cannot control Wilbur's political opinions, and that it is Wilbur's personal fight that is being made on Otis. If this is true it is the first time father and son have been very far apart in local politics.

The Nat Ellery "Organization" There is a Nat Ellery "Organization" and it has promulgated. It is an assemblage of gentlemen convened for the purpose of restoring to circulation the few thousands of dollars which Nat Ellery has been able, by the practice of a frugal economy, to save from his salary as a faithful if not always efficient public servant. Also, it has for its purpose the creation of ones of those atmospheric disturbances, commonly known as a flub-a-dub-dub, which the blacksmith makes when he plunges a hot iron into his tub of bilgewater. In its pronouncement to the Nat Ellery "organization" takes a whack at the Herrin "organization," which is proper and at all times in order, and another at the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, probably as further evidence that Nat is going it alone. Nat Ellery is a thoroughly good fellow and means well. He is merely suffering from an acute attack of megalomania and will feel better after it gets done hurting. It may be noted in passing that the state is dotted all over with public buildings that his department planned to fit appropriations made in advance, scarcely one of which buildings he has been able to complete within the appropriation; that he caused San Quentin prison to lose a year in its construction of much needed cell houses while he overhauled and undid plans already provided by capable architects working under the direction of expert prison men; that his department has been behind with all its architectural work, and that if he were to lay out the ground plans for Governor Gillett's eighteen million dollar system of automobile highways the state would be fortunate indeed if those roads were to reach their destination with a bond issue of ten millions more. He plans bigger, if not better, than he knows. Mr. Ellery will be able to carry all the votes he will poll in his vest pocket without their being in the way in finding his toothpick.

Queer Fight in San Jose The municipal fight in San Jose has some odd features. The scheme of the Mackenzie-O'Neal S. P. machine is to elect Chas W. Davison mayor of San Jose, with the aid of Union Labor votes, Union Labor to get, in return, the election of Walter G. Matthewson to one of the vacant places on the council. This deal has a further string to it: Davison is to resign from the mayoralty and to have both machine and Union Labor support to beat "Red" Hayes for congress, Union Labor to get the election of Matthewson as mayor by vote of the council. Such is the deal, and Union Labor is acting on it in good faith. But the Mackenzie-O'Neal machine men are not. They are cutting the earth from under Matthewson's feet, and supporting Harvey S. Kelley, "scab" laundryman and anathema to Union Labor. The Union Laborites will wake up at election to find they have been double-crossed and left out in the cold. The Hayes faction, meanwhile, is also backing Kelley against Matthewson, but its candidate for mayor is Frederick A. Curtis. Davison cannot beat Hayes for Congress, whether elected mayor or not.

William Kent For Congress It seems likely that William Kent may contest the Republican nomination for congress from the second district with Duncan E. McKinley. If Mr. Kent goes into this fight it will not be because he has political ambitions, but because he feels that he is under political obligations to stand for Right Things where his standing for them can do the most good. A personal friend to President Taft, and a willing contributor toward his election, he regrets exceedingly that the President has seen fit to surround himself with reactionaries and that he has not proven robust enough to withstand the pressure that the "interests" have brought to bear on him to swerve him from those high purposes which he started out to fulfill. He feels that the President has compromised where he should have shown no quarter, that he has put up with half loaves when he, and the country, would have been better off with no bread. Politics with William Kent is an affair of the conscience, in which personal friendships will not swerve him from right lines. He goes up against Duncan McKinley knowing that McKinley will be able to command the aid of all the power the administration can bring to bear on his behalf, knowing that the President will ask that McKinley be returned as a personal favor to the President himself, and he does this when not in robust health, all because he feels that he ought, in the public interest, to do so. Mr. Kent is one of the too few men of wealth who are accused of "going back on their class," and standing for the common good instead of striving to secure his share of special privileges while they are going. If a good campaign manager can be found for Mr. Kent, a man who can take the brunt of the heavy work off his shoulders, so that making the campaign will not tax his strength beyond endurance, he will enter the lines. He had a broad and useful experience in redeeming Chicago from the clutches of organized greed and, if nominated and elected, will prove an honor to the state. McKinley is a stand-patter among stand-patters and has forsaken his duties in congress to campaign in other states for the election of stand-pat members of congress. He will not be permitted, if so disposed, to masquerade as anything other than a stand-patter and Cannon program-taker when he reaches home. On that issue the people of the second district will be called upon to decide betwixt William Kent and Duncan E. McKinley.

Walter Macarthur Or Julius Kahn? Walter Macarthur has made up his mind to accept the Democratic nomination for congress in the fourth district that he may contest the election of Julius Kahn for congress. This is good news to those who believe in clean men in clean politics whatever party one may belong to. There is nothing to be said against Walter Macarthur. He is true blue all the way through. He represents the working people, not for politics only, as so many political patriots do, but as a laboring man himself laboring for the common good of all. As it is well to have some lawyers in congress, some merchants, some bankers and some farmers, so it is well to have in those halls some men who come from the walks of life of those who must eat their bread in the sweat of their faces if they, and their families, are to be provided for. Walter Macarthur is such a man. He is no narrow-minded enthusiast. His views are at once broad and liberal, sane and sound, and, during his years of residence in San Francisco, no good cause has lacked the support of his pen and his tongue, and no bad cause has not felt the force of the blows that he can deliver. He has classed himself as a Democrat, rather as a protest against the gross materialism of the predominant factors in the Republican party of recent years than because of any doctrinaire espousal of Democratic platforms. Upon close analysis his views of public issues will not be found essentially different from that protestant Republicanism that is seeking to gain the ascendancy in the Republican party. The candidacy of Walter Macarthur is good news.

The Fiftieth Assembly Dist. The fiftieth assembly district lies in the heart of Oakland. It deserves to be represented by a true-blue man. The district was represented in the last assembly by Harry W. Pulcifer, a protege of Dr. Mehrman, of whom much was expected and little fulfilled. Mr. Pulcifer's legislative career was disappointing. He voted against Drew's motion to reject the code of rules the "organization" was trying to get through with which to tie the hands of decency by its sides; he fell down on the test vote on the direct primary; he voted against taking the party circle off the ballot. This is not saying that he stood for nothing good, for his record was by no means wholly bad, but his district can do better than to send him back for another term. It can send F. M. Parcells or William C. Clark, both of them men who can be counted on to stand for Right Things on every ballot. Both of these gentlemen have the question of making the race under consideration and whichever of them enters the lists will be a preferable candidate to the aforesaid Harry W. Pulcifer.

CARNATION WHEAT FLAKES

For Breakfast and Dessert

Pacific Cereal Association
Bay and Taylor Sts. San Francisco

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

The Complete Text of the

REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir: Your notice of the expiration of our subscription has just been received. We need no urging to renew it, as we have had the paper from the first number, and should feel decidedly disinclined to do without it. Our name did not appear on your subscription list at first, as we purchased weekly from newsstands. Many and many an extra copy we have sent to friends.

I shall be most happy to send you a list of people who I think would be interested in the California Weekly, but will wait till I have a chance to get my husband to help me with it. As he is an exceedingly busy man, I must wait his leisure. However, he always finds sufficient time to read the California Weekly with ever increasing interest, approval and enjoyment.

I am one of those who approve your stand on the question of votes for women. The strongest impression I get from women friends who desire the vote at present is, that they demand the suffrage as a personal right instead of feeling it simply another avenue for performing duties and discharging obligations.

Very cordially yours,
G. W. P.
P. S.—Sometimes you print subscribers' letters and their names. I am so old-fashioned a "female" that I don't like to see my name in public print. If I were a "personage," and my name would help materially a righteous cause, I would endeavor to swallow my repugnance. But that would be a different matter.

In our judgment suffrage for neither man nor woman is based on natural, personal right, but rather upon what is good for Society as a whole. There are tens of thousands who now have the suffrage who are unworthy of it and should be deprived of it. There are those who are too ignorant and others who are too much lacking in moral character. No man who lives in and around houses of ill repute should have the right of suffrage, and yet the red light district of every city has come to be a power in our political life. Furthermore, the right to vote should never be separated from the obligation to vote. Whoever shirks the obligation should lose the right. With these limitations, and perhaps others, suffrage should be conferred without reference to race, sex or color. The equal suffrage movement will have to be based upon a concrete good rather than upon an abstract right if it would make headway.

Editor The California Weekly.

We see something occasionally, in regard to the moral obligations of the voter at the primaries, to support the candidates receiving the majority of the party vote, whether he favored those nominated or not. I wish to protest against any such construction of the law. At first reading, it might seem to be the law, but such construction would shut out all honest voters in any close contest between machine and anti-machine. This should not be the intent of the law. And if it were so, there would be the moral obligation for the honest voter to take the law in his own hands, to take part in the primary, and if it happens that the right person be not nominated, there will still be his moral obligation to his country to vote for the best men, regardless of party. That portion of law that attempts to pledge or bind any voter at the primaries to support any person at the coming election, if such construction be put on it, would probably be declared unconstitutional.

It may be said that this would open the door to fraud, but those who would risk fraud will do so, anyway. To prevent fraud I would suggest that the primary law be amended so that a voter who has registered as belonging to a political party be not permitted to change his party affiliation for two years; that is, after one has registered as belonging to a political party he be not permitted to take part in any other party primary for two years. There is no good reason for a voter changing his party every time the weather changes. This would prevent voters registering as members of parties in which they have no intention of staying. There would then be no chance to change the party in order to defeat some one in an opposite party. This would not hurt a new party, for the new party can always begin by an independent nomination. I believe that some such amendment would go far toward deterring voters from registering falsely.

In the case of persons changing their residence, or of transients, it should not work a hardship. The person should be required to state the party to which he had registered and the place where. If he still wants to be registered as belonging to the same party he should be permitted to take part in his party primary, but if he wants to change he should be compelled to wait till after the next general election. This would go a long way toward preventing fraud, and would leave the management of the party in the hands of those entitled to control, viz, those who honestly believe in the principles of the parties to which they belong.

Red Bluff, Cal.

It is seldom indeed that the still, small voice can justify a man in voting for an unfit person to fill any office when any political party, other than his own, offers him a fit man for the place. The new direct primary law carries with it no obligation, moral or otherwise, that will require any voter to take his party ticket straight merely because he participated in the primary election that resulted in putting an unfit man on the ticket. Even under the old convention system there was no moral or other obligation resting upon the voter not to scratch his ticket. There was an obligation resting upon a candidate who had gone into a convention to abide by the results of the convention, and there is an obligation resting upon a candidate who allows his name to be submitted to a primary to abide by the results of the primary and not run independently, but that obligation relates only to candidates, not to voters.

How to keep party voters on their own side of party fences at primary elections is, of course, the crux of the question of party, but any device which permits rascality to be free and binds only honest folks is bad. As the law now stands, voters are all free to affiliate with any party they wish to up to twenty days before the primary election without limitation or obligation, moral or otherwise, to hinder them from voting any ticket they please, or for any candidate on any ticket, at the general election. It is to be doubted if this condition can be bettered in any way. The only need is that it be more generally and clearly understood.

Editors California Weekly.

Gentlemen: Enclosed find check for $2, in payment for subscription to The California Weekly.

While I cannot agree with the political views expressed, implying as they do, that redemption from existing evils must be wrought by persons bearing a particular political brand, and necessarily involving the proposition that those professing another political faith have neither the capacity nor the patriotism essential to confidence or trust, I am of the opinion that the work being accomplished is of inestimable value, appealing, as it does, to a large body of citizens.

Aside from this, however, the charm to me of your very valuable paper are the songs of hope, of humanity and home from the pen of my esteemed friend, A. J. Waterhouse, whom I regard as standing in the very forefront of American poets.

Very truly yours,
C. E. M'LAUGHLIN.
Sacramento, Cal., May 7, 1910.

The types have made us say things foreign to our thought if they have conveyed the idea that The California Weekly holds that no good thing can come out of the Democratic party. Our country needs, and has needed, a good, strong, well organized and prudently led Democratic party. The State of California now needs and has needed such a party, but neither the State nor the nation has had such a Democratic party since before the Civil War. Being almost continuously out of power, it has been out of training and out of that potency which responsibility gives, and it has compromised with anything and everything that could promise it votes and has stood for nothing certain. It has had no principles that it would not compromise and has contented itself with being in opposition to whatever policies the Republican party espoused rather than having the courage and patriotism to espouse policies of its own. These things have deprived the Democratic party of public confidence. Even now, at Washington, the leaders of the Democracy are trimming the sails of their craft with the purpose of taking advantage of disagreements within the Republican party rather than with the purpose of bringing forward definite, Democratic plans and specifications for dealing with great, national issues. With so many good men in the Democratic party, have we not a right to expect better things from the Democratic party?

Editors The California Weekly.

Gentlemen: It is with pleasure I hand you check for the paper up to May 2, 1911.

The paper is a clean sheet and always on the right side of all public questions which come before the people. I wish it were a daily with a million in cash, managed by its present officers. It would be a power in the land for good.

Wishing you success, I am,

Yours very truly,

I. J. TRUMAN.

San Francisco, May 7, 1910.

Editor The California Weekly.

My Dear Friend: I enclose you check for $2, covering another year's subscription for your paper. It is worth more than this to me, but presume it is honest to pay all that you ask and no more.

The moral and inspirational tone of your paper at times is so high that I hardly know whether the rule of action followed in this case comes up to its requirements. I like your column on the deeper significance of living, and get a great deal out of it. In some respects you go away ahead of me, but I am young yet, and in the formative stage of life, and I hope that by going forward and looking up, I will some day get to your heights.

I hope to see you soon and would like to see you

(Concluded on Page 397)

R. B. MARSHALL, CHIEF GEOGRAPHER

THE ADVENTUROUS CAREER OF THE "MAN WHO MAKES THE MAPS"

BY PERCY TURNER

I sometimes think that we Americans do not take enough interest in certain classes of our public servants. The statesman, the politician, the soldier, each comes in for his share of popular applause; but our highly-efficient, hard-working scientific corps—those who, in the face of seemingly insurmountable obstacles, often at the risk of their lives, penetrate the remote places to gather data for our institutions of science, to dam our rivers, to make our maps, or to get for us information concerning our mineral deposits—we are wont to pass by on the other side.

Yet, among these quiet, capable, sunburned men, the percentage of extraordinary capability, of greatness, even, is extremely high. Their achievements are as noteworthy, and, to many, their personalities are far more interesting than is the politician's, or even the soldier's. The reason that they are so little known may be traced to the fact that their work lies far and away beyond the sphere of activities of our indefatigable journalists.

It was my good fortune to be rather intimately associated with one of the most conspicuous of these men for four very pleasant years, and, now that Fate has placed me beyond reach of the consequences of my act, I propose to turn the light on him.

Virginia Days

About forty-two years ago, back in Amelia County, Virginia, a brown-eyed, dark-haired infant was given his first bath at the hands of a "nigger mammy." She was inordinately proud, was that ebony mammy, for her charge was no ordinary baby. You would not have learned from the parents that the baby was directly descended from Chief Justice John Marshall and Governor Bradford—who, you will remember, came over in the Mayflower in 1620—but Mammy was exceedingly vain of the fact and she would have told you all about it.

But, once in a while, there came times when even Mammy, with her worship-sharpened wisdom, was puzzled, and when she had to admit that "Mister Bob"—that was Mammy's name for him—acted in a manner which was a discredit to a gentleman and his ancestors. Sometimes he would howl and the ministrations of Mammy (who naturally went on the theory that it must be a pain in his stomach or an outlaw safety pin, and proceeded accordingly) were fruitless. All of you who are of the initiated know what consternation this causes in the household to which the baby belongs. Now had I been there I could have shown Mammy that her diagnosis was wrong—all wrong and I'm sure of it.

Knowing what I do of him since he grew up I am positive that this particular baby would have endured the colic or the laceration of a derelict safety pin with the fortitude of a savage under torture; but, had she looked, I'm willing to bet forty dollars that Mammy would have found the handle of his rattle loose or that the stopper was improperly fitted into his bottle.

To this day the sight of a botch job causes Robert Bradford Marshall almost a physical pain, and in this sensitiveness to the false note, combined with the fact that unfinished work acts upon him as a stimulant, lies the key to his success.

Mr. Marshall is pointedly aggressive, but it is not his way to rush into things headlong or half ready. He is economical, but he is not the type of official who loses twenty dollars saving a nickel. He is resourceful, but not an advocate of makeshifts. Everything is carefully thought out beforehand, the best men and tools procurable are secured; then, when the measure of the problem has been taken, the attack is sudden and deadly. Almost invariably the outcome is about as he desired it to be.

Early Training

At fifteen, believing that a man can, if he be persistent enough, accomplish anything in reason, he mapped out his life. Up to the age of twenty-one he decided to give his body and brain every opportunity to develop and mature; at twenty-one he would have chosen and begun his life work; he believed that a man should have earned enough to marry at thirty, that at forty he should be at the top of his profession and that at fifty he should be able to retire.

As for results, knowing what I do of the man, I am in no way surprised that at twenty-one and a half years he received his appointment to the Geological Survey; that he was ready to marry six months before he was thirty; and that in his fortieth year he was promoted to Chief Geographer.

Yet this remarkable success has come about through no occult process. Mr. Marshall would tell you that he is an ordinary man, and, in a sense, he is; but I should say that he differs from ordinary men in that he has the faculty of developing what we may term ordinary talents to the highest degree of efficiency. He is a live wire. Latent powers that in other men are brought out only by unexpected emergencies, he seems to be able to generate by sheer exertion of will. He works always at a tension and his mind bites into problems as acid cuts into an etcher's plate.

MR. R. B. MARSHALL

Yet, apart from his professional side, he has a pleasing and interesting personality. He is very human, and during the ten years that he was grinding away in the grim effort to win his spurs, he had most of the experiences, pleasant, or painful, or humorous, that fall to the average run of "pasteboard pluggers."

Tenderfoot Experiences

Years ago, when the "Old Man" was still something of a tenderfoot, he arrived from the East, at Fort Custer, Mont., in the small hours of the night. The proprietor of the only shack in sight was grouchy at having his slumbers disturbed and tersely informed the newcomer that he had no room to let for the remainder of the night, but (upon further questioning) he guessed that the Geological Survey camp might be found on the banks of the Yellowstone about two miles to the north. Marshall eventually found camp, but not until he had stumbled into an Indian village, where painted warriors were dancing to a musical accompaniment which appeared to be a struggle for supremacy between a tom-tom orchestra and a canine chorus. Having an easterner's misgivings about Indians, the action of the Old Man's hair raised the campaign hat off of his head and it took him some moments to realize that he had startled them quite as much as suddenly finding himself in their midst had confused him.

Subsequently the Crow Indians took a great fancy to Mr. Marshall and they became the best of friends. One day, just at dinner time—let us believe that the time of day was due to chance rather than design—he was called upon in state by Chief Pretty Eagle, who gravely accepted the invitation to himself and his braves to dine. The chief ate with Mr. Marshall and immediately afterward the staff partook of what was set before them with such telling effect that there was little work left for the dishwasher.

When Mr. Marshall returned the call he was most hospitably entertained. After they had eaten, Chief Pretty Eagle delivered himself of an elaborate oration, in which he besought the White Chief to become the official farmer of the Crow tribe that the braves might be properly taught modern methods of agriculture. And as an absolute guarantee of good faith, he presented bodily to the astonished and embarrassed topographer his charming and much-sought-after daughter—to have and to hold, forever.

A Cyclone

During this same season, Mr. Marshall had his first experience with a western cyclone. It was 6:30 in the evening. Everything was still and clear. The party had just finished dinner and were quietly sitting about, when, without any warning, the sky thickened and the storm came bellowing over the mesa at the foot of which they were camped.

In times of danger, a topographer's thoughts instinctively turn toward his "sheet," and accordingly, Marshall rushed for his tent just as the twister, accompanied by a deluge of large hailstones, struck the outfit. As the tent began to sag perilously, he yelled for the others to let the rest go and come and help him hold it down; but in another second the wind changed front, and as it struck the open end the tent exploded like a paper bag and went up into space.

"At this juncture," said Mr. Marshall, in speaking of the incident, "I stopped howling, for the spectacle before me was so ridiculous that I needed all my breath to laugh with. The assistant, teamster and cook were lying flat on the ground in six or eight inches of hailstones. One had a bucket over his head, another a dishpan and the third a washbasin. They had taken refuge under the dining table, which almost immediately had been smashed flat by a falling tent frame, leaving only their heads and feet sticking out." Marshall himself appeared with his sombrero jammed down over his ears, a towel tied over the crown to protect his head from the hailstones and the precious map (carefully wrapped in bedding) gripped between his knees.

The storm had lasted fifteen minutes. Every tent was gone, the camp wagon was upside down and ten head of stock were missing. The briefest time was allowed for a good laugh and the comparison of bruises; then the teamster was sent after the stock and the others set about repairing the wagon. There was need for hurry, for a hasty search for provisions had disclosed but two half-loaves of bread and a small chunk of bacon swimming about in the mess chest. Everything else was gone or ground into the mud. In just one hour after the storm, the teamster pulled out for the nearest supply station, sixty-five miles distant. The remainder of the party lived for two days and two nights on the half-loaves and the bacon.

Adventures

I venture the assertion that in the twenty years Mr. Marshall has held a commission in the Geological Survey he has found it necessary to risk his life many more times than had he held a commission in the army. Ask Nelson, or Willie Vance, or "P. D." Davis—any of the men who have been with him, and they will tell you that the Old Man never sent a man into a dangerous place till he, himself, had first set the example.

Huster will tell you of the time he and the Old Man were caught in a tight place while climbing Dardanelles Peak. Climbing over each other's shoulders, hanging on to shallowly rooted scrub, they found themselves confronted by a sheer, bulging wall of granite when within 1000 feet of the top. Circuiting, they made a drop and found themselves caught on a narrow shelf of rock—the uprooting of a small shrub having cut off retreat in the way from which they came. Peeping over the edge, a 1000-foot jump into space confronted them. The only possible way out seemed to be in successfully making a drop to a second small shelf scarcely two feet in width, which lay fifteen feet below.

Accordingly a rope was made by tying their shirts and the bookbag strap together. This rope Mr. Marshall made fast to one foot, then, grasping a small root in one hand, digging into the gravel with the other, he lay flat upon the ground, thus making a human anchor for the rope, and enabling the assistant to descend in comparative safety. After the sheet had been lowered, Marshall himself made the drop with only such slight aid as Huster could give him, and landed successfully. Very likely a miscalculation of an inch would have cost him his life.

Once, crossing the Merced River at a point above Yosemite Valley at an old trail fork, Mr. Marshall and his party found the stream full from bank to bank from recent spring rains. The high water made the ford particularly dangerous owing to the rapids which lay a scant fifty feet below, and the problem became for one of the party to carry a life line across, after which the others could make it easily. Seeing Marshall preparing to make the attempt, two of the men offered to go, and even Ti Sing, the Chinaman who had been Mr. Marshall's cook for fifteen years, begged to be allowed to go instead. But "the Old Man" calmly anchored himself to the tail of Biddy, his saddle mule, and she succeeded in towing him across.

Tehipiti

The Tehipiti Quadrangle, Mr. Marshall's last piece of instrument work, was one of the roughest, most "impossible" pieces of country that has ever been mapped. Daily the members of the party risked life and limb, and daily they came face to face with problems that would have compelled a less resourceful or a less courageous leader to turn back.

As a sample, once, to avoid a ten days' trip around, the party decided on a short cut, taking what purported to be a sheep herder's trail. They were three days making three miles. Several times pack mules went over the grade and had to be relayed back with a block and tackle. When, finally, the exhausted party reached Tehipiti Canyon, their objective point, they found the river a raging torrent, and the improvised ferry, somewhat elaborated, was again resorted to.

This time, "P. D." Davis took the line across, and Mr. Marshall, standing up to his waist in the icy water for two hours, took charge of making the mules fast to the sliding tackle and getting them started.

These anecdotes are, of course, but individual instances which come to me as I write: the tight squeak on Dardanelles Peak, the crossing of the Merced River, the saving of six days on the Tehipiti, are but weekly experiences of the more seasoned and reliable men who are chosen for the rough country.

Also, the incidents named antedate my personal acquaintance with Mr. Marshall. I knew him only as an official who came to the field to inspect the work of other men—and let me remark in passing, that whatever comes under his supervision gets "jolly well" inspected, too. If I were a bank president with a guilty conscience, R. B. Marshall is about the last man on earth I would want monkeying around the vaults.

First Impression

I remember well the first time I saw him. It was in a big camp in Bakersfield, one evening in the fall of 1903. Naturally, being but a "rooky" of three weeks' experience, I expected to be ignored. A good many seasoned instrument men and their assistants were in evidence in that camp, and all I wanted was to get my dinner, for I was hungry as a bear, and then hide my insignificance as quickly as possible in the 9x9 which I shared with Willie Vance.

As we came in from work and entered the big dining tent, Mr. Marshall, dressed in citizen's clothes, was sitting on a camp chair, relaxed but not sprawled, his feet resting comfortably on a tool box. I noticed, on the lapel of his vest, the emblem of a Royal Arch Mason and the coveted badge of membership in the American Society of Civil Engineers. He was from south of the Mason and Dixon line—I could see that at a glance—but not the tall, loose-jointed mountaineer, nor yet the obese Senator-Bailey type of Southerner; Marshall's is a rarer type, dark of complexion, well-knit of body and a shade under average size. Usually it is accompanied by a high degree of efficiency, and little given to pomposity. General Robert E. Lee was of this type, and General Joe Wheeler.

Mr. Marshall greeted the others of the party, whom he knew, in a friendly way, and when I was introduced, he shook hands courteously and asked why he hadn't got me at Yuma. I could still blush in those days, and I think I blushed—it was rather more than I expected, that the man who had charge of the work on the Pacific Coast should remember that a clerk in the Tulare express office had been

Rubber Stamps

10 CENTS PER LINE

— AT —
Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information
from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country.
Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining,
but thousands do.
To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law
SUNSET TEA COMPANY
911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING

CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 435,000.00

DIRECTORS James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.
Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant
Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909.....38,610,731.93
Total Assets41,261,682.21
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office,
or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin
by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock
P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8
o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First
Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-
President, Emil Rohte; Cashier, A. H. R.
Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann;
Secretary, George Tournay; Assistant Secretary,
A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt,
Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohte, Ign. Steinhardt, I. N.
Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, E. Tillmann, Jr., E.
T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.
RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C.
Heyer, Manager.

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00
Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00
Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid
on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

J. Downey Harvey S. G. Murphy
John A. Hooper James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper J. H. Skinner
Thomas Jennings Rudolph Spreckels
James K. Lynch John W. Van Bergen
Walter S. Martin Clinton E. Worden
J. K. Moffitt George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

DOUBTLESS the greatest genius I ever knew was a young fellow named Simon Taylor, who was born and reared in a little town in Southern Wisconsin. His genius took the inventive form, and it was not much of a week when he did not turn out two or three inventions. Some of these he gave away, and some he sold for little or nothing, but by far the greater part he permitted to die of neglect. The careless, insouciant way in which he turned out his devices was a constant source of wonder and delight to the people of the neighborhood, and there was a prevailing impression that there was nothing he could not invent.

Circumstances had thrown Simon Taylor and myself much together, and he used to talk to me a great deal of his theory of the inventive art.

"Intellect," he would say, while we smoked our pipes together, "intellect is electricity, and electricity, if properly governed and controlled, is intellect. Take a few atoms of matter and subject them to an accurately apportioned current of electricity, and, sir, those atoms have a soul; the electricity does it. This accounts for the cases of some men that you know; they lack electricity. I calculate that when I have perfectly worked out this theory I will present to the world the greatest invention of this and all ages."

Finally, young Taylor went into retirement, and for more than a year devoted all of his days and much of his nights to the construction of some machine, the exact nature of which was kept secret from all. Even to me, who was so close to him in confidence, he only would say, "Wait and see; wait and see," and I was constrained to be contented with that. At last he came to me, told me that the great invention finally was in working order, and asked me to come and witness its operation.

"It is not as yet entirely perfected," he continued, by way of explanation; "it wabbles at times, but I think it is far enough along to convince you that I have devised the mechanical marvel of the age."

I at once followed him to the "den" in which he did his work, and we reverently stood before an object covered by a black cloth. This was removed by Taylor, and his machine stood revealed. It was rather more than five feet high, and was shaped somewhat like a man. What might have been considered its head was covered with long, flowing hair, and its false face wore a particularly vacuous expression.

"The hair and face are intended merely to add to the machine's appearance of realism; for," said Simon Taylor, an exultant look lighting up his clear gray eyes, "I call this machine my Mechanical Poet, and I will convince you that it deserves the title. You will observe that it is connected with a battery of great power, and, indeed, the world may observe it, for my sole patentable device is the substance in the Poet that performs the part of the brain in the human body."

Taylor lifted the lid that served as the top of the Poet's head, and exhibited something that looked as much like a symphony in gray mush as anything of which I could think.

"It looks some like putty, doesn't it?" he said, with an air of triumph, "and I don't mind telling you that there is a little putty in it, for I have not studied brains in vain, but there are also several other things. When I wish to start the Mechanical Poet I replace his skull, turn on the electric current, feed him a page from the poems of some gifted son of song, so that he may get the desired rhythm and swing, press the button, and he does the rest. We now will let him perform."

I did not see the page which he gave the Mechanical Poet to devour, but it was eaten ravenously, and in hardly more than a minute Taylor pressed the button. There was a whirr of wheels, a rattle and low rumble of machinery, and in an incredibly short time a typewritten sheet of paper issued from an orifice and dropped in the Mechanical Poet's right coat pocket.

"Take it out," said Simon Taylor, in a voice husky with excitement, "and read."

I did so, and I quote the words:

Sway out and also inward;
Stand up and also sit;
Do right and wobble sinward—
Whatever is it.

THE MECHANICAL POET

BY ALPHEUS JAMES

We twain once draining glasses,
What will the next morn do
When its dull pain surpasses
All headaches that we knew?

"Why, it's Swin—" I said, but I got no further, for Simon Taylor excitedly interrupted me.

"That's it; that's it!" he cried; "you've guessed it; that's what I fed him on. You will observe that a certain something which might be termed the spiritual quality is lacking, but some changes in his gray matter and in the electrical current, which I have in view, will remedy that. Now we will give his afflatus another trial."

Again he took a printed page, fed it to the Mechanical Poet, and pressed the button. As before, there was a whizz and whirr of wheels, and in less time than it requires to write of it another typewritten sheet dropped into the pocket. This time I awaited no invitation, but seized and read it at once. Here are the words:

Ship me somewheres to the seashore where the nights are always cool;
Where the Summer Girl is frequent, and a man can play the fool,
For them bloomin' belles are callin' and it's there that I would be,
Squeezin' of her hand ecstatic while we're lazin' by the sea.

"Of course, you recognize it," said Taylor; "you see what I fed him that time. I admit that it still is somewhat deficient in verve and swing, but wait till I have perfected the Mechanical Poet—got his afflatus to working without a jar, so to speak—and you will see what you shall see. Perhaps it may have occurred to you that possibly I had prepared him in advance to write these particular poems. To convince you that this is not the case, I wish you would select something to feed him; take anything in the poetical line that you may please, and you will observe how quickly my Mechanical Poet will catch the idea."

Several popular magazines were lying on the table, and I picked up one of them and at random tore some verses from it. These I handed to Taylor, and he fed them to the Poet and pressed the button. In a few moments the following verse was in my hands:

In bosky glades the drowsy cattle stand,
And whisk the busy fly with restless tails,
One feath'ry cloud floats pregnant o'er the land;
The skylark tries its liquid throated scales,
Anon the vagrant hawk with harsh acclaim
Proclaims himself the monarch of the sky;
The sun's good night is writ in lambent flame;
Eve dons her mantle; hours of rest are nigh.

"It doesn't appear to say anything in particular," I remarked.

"Of course not, of course not; you've caught the idea the first thing—you fed it magazine poetry, you know. Oh, I tell you this machine is a lulu; it never misses a suggestion. What do you think of it?"

I told the elated inventor that I thought it was a very remarkable machine, a really astounding machine, and I certainly did think so. Then he covered it with the cloth and we went away.

Later Taylor showed the Mechanical Poet to the Rev. Horatio L. Huggins, but he made the mistake of feeding "Ostler Joe" to the machine, and it, apparently acting on and intensifying the suggestion, turned out some lines so reprehensible that the good man at once departed, saying that he never would have believed that anything inanimate could be so totally depraved. The inventor was sorry to have shocked the Rev. Mr. Huggins, but he said that after he had got the afflatus properly gauged all such deplorable defects would be rectified.

I write the remainder of the tale with a sad heart. Poor Taylor! Naturally, having invented the Mechanical Poet, he was anxious to make him remunerative as soon as possible; so he hunted up the leading capitalist of the town and tried to interest him in his invention. Having thoroughly explained to the leading capitalist what poetry was, that gentleman said that he would look into the matter, and that if it appeared to be all right he would undertake the manufacture and sale, allowing Taylor 2 per cent of the net proceeds and taking but 98 per cent himself. The proposition seemed a little one-sided to Taylor, but, having ascertained that his share was fully up to that generally allowed to inventors by leading capitalists, and consequently that he was being treated with entire commercial fairness, he concluded to accept it.

Together the two men went to the "den," and—it is hard to write, but they never again were seen in life. A book of French poems was found in the back yard, where it had been blown by the explosion, and it is possible that Taylor fed a page missing from it to the Mechanical Poet; or he may inadvertently have turned on too strong a current of electricity. All that is certainly known is that there was a tremendous explosion, and when neighbors had extinguished the resulting flames the lifeless bodies of the two men were found. The double funeral was largely attended.

The secret of Simon Taylor's marvelous invention died with him. I experimented more or less with putty and some other things in the vague hope of reinventing it, but my efforts were quite in vain. A greater and wiser than I must take up his life work where he laid it down.

Poor Taylor! He was a very gifted man.

("Little Talks"—Concluded)

once a week to talk over with you some of the things I see in your paper. I don't know how you keep up your work, how you get all the suggestions your paper conveys and how you find time and strength to develop them.

Hoping that your strength will remain a match to your purposes for many years to come, I am,
Yours very truly,

PETER J. SHIELDS.

Superior Court, State of California, County of Sacramento, May 5, 1910.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir: I enclose a check to bring my subscription up to date, and wish to take the opportunity to tell you that I have read the paper with a great deal of interest from the first issue. I believe California needs just such a fearless, straightforward analysis of its public life as you are attempting to give. I like your motto, "Good Faith, Good Courage, Good Humor," immensely, and all the more because I believe you especially try to live up to the "Good Humor" part of it. As a minister, may I express my appreciation of your "Deeper Significance of Living" column? I don't always agree with it, any more than the people who attend my church agree with all the minister says, but I am glad to see that column printed, just the same. I also feel that your treatment of the liquor question is very sane and constructive. If the suggestion has any value, I would suggest that a series of articles on "Saloon Substitutes," "The Gothenburg System," etc., would be profitable and interesting reading.

Perhaps you remember calling on me a little while before you started the paper. I think you are moving along very satisfactorily toward the sort of paper you outlined to me that day, and I congratulate you.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT W. PALMER.

Pastor of Plymouth Church (Congregational),
Oakland, Cal., 4160 Terrace St., May 4, 1910.

I congratulate you on the good work you are doing. The California Weekly supplies an element very much needed in our California journalism.

San Francisco, Cal.

FRANK W. TROWER.

No greater good can come of The California Weekly than a demonstration that such a paper can live in California.

Like Webster's dictionary I look into your paper when I want to get the correct pronunciation of public men's characters. You are doing great good as an educator in showing the busy voter which way the "cats" are trying to jump.

G. W. WYLLIE.

Dimuba, Cal.

("R. B. Marshall"—Concluded) offered a job when the work was being done at Yuma, the year before.

Good Company

During dinner and afterward—the Old Man never talks shop at the table if it can be avoided—conversation was delightfully informal, and the least of us felt that we were included in what was said, even though we took no part in the talk. When the meal was finished, there was a felt but unspoken invitation to everybody to remain. The subject of Indian massacres came up, and Mr. Marshall, who is a charming raconteur, told the story of Custer's last battle. He had mapped the battlefield twelve years before and had a surprising knowledge of every detail of the fight. To show that the narrative was vivid and impressed its hearers, I cite the case of my friend, Bill Hugunin:

Next morning, as Bill and I were washing our faces in the Kern County Land Company's irrigating ditch, I inquired: "Well, Bill, how'd you sleep?" "Oh, sacre bleu," exclaimed Bill, "I was fite de sohns of gohns all night!"

Outside working hours, Mr. Marshall is charming, courteous and always pays some little attention to everyone. He has remarkable eyes; they are warm and pleasant as a girl's when he smiles, but the moment he begins work they take on a cold venom and he is all business. It is then a survival of the fittest, and Lord help the man who blunders.

There are, in the world of contour lines and angles, as many styles of profanity as there are instrument men. Nelson cusses with the rapidity and effectiveness of a double-gear gatling gun; Willie Vance patters away in a villainous conglomeration of Santa Barbara Spanish and water-front billingsgate; I could, on occasion, do a fairly good rough job myself—but the Old Man's profanity is unique. He is a master of it and knows the value of not overworking the gift. But, when he goes forth to cuss, every oath has the deadly sting of a poison-tipped rapier in the hands of a fencing master.

As a Leader

At work, Mr. Marshall is severe and impatient with blunders. But here again he sets the example, for he is as uncompromising with himself and compels himself to toe the mark quite as smartly as he does the others. He toadies neither men nor mules, but he looks after them far more intelligently and has a far better knowledge of their needs than many an expounder of ideas who might on the surface appear more tender-hearted.

The salary of Chief Geographer is good when compared with the majority of salaries; but compared with what a corporation would gladly pay for a like amount of executive ability it is, like all government salaries, amazingly small. Why, then, does a man who has had repeated opportunities to turn his exceptional capability to vastly better account in a financial way remain out of the lime-light, at the thankless task of giving the people of the United States the best geological and engineering maps that were ever put on paper?

I'll tell you. Tucked away, next to the back cover of his suitcase (where a survey man keeps the treasures that are nearest his heart) R. B. Marshall has a package of letters, some of which are yellow with age. These letters are his medals, his rewards of merit; for they are the voluntary compliments which came out of the sheer appreciation of his superiors for his faithfulness and efficiency in the days when he was winning his spurs—when his superiors were more numerous than they are now. Very few have seen these letters, but they are there, and they, along with the present knowledge of work done well, mean far more to him than do the offers of the corporations.

Once, in a heart-to-heart talk, Mr. Marshall said to me: "Honestly, Turner, I'm telling the truth when I say that no day in the field was ever long enough." That is the truth, and that is why the Old Man has risen from rodman to Chief Geographer—he loves his work.

Orville Wright's aeroplane fell 100 feet at Montgomery, Ala., but alighted easily on soft ground, and neither Wright nor the airship was injured. The descent was partly under control.

PERSONALIA

Emanuel Lasker, the champion of the world, won 18 out of 20 games of chess against as many players and brought one other game to a draw. This display in a simultaneous contest has been equaled by Lasker before, and had been equaled by Steinitz (from whom Lasker won the championship) and surpassed by Morphy. With the exception of Morphy, however, Dr. Lasker has probably never had a superior. The player who won from Lasker in this contest was Stasch Miotkowski, who is State champion of Pennsylvania and evidently a genius. Dr. Lasker is a Jew, calm, self-centered and deliberate—something of a philosopher aside from his chess; and has contributed something to the literature of the game.

A new book by Selma Lagerlof, the famous Swedish author, to whom was recently awarded the Nobel Literary Prize of $40,000, is announced for immediate publication. In this new volume, "The Girl from the Marsh Croft," Miss Lagerlof has chosen for her heroine a girl who has gone astray, making her innate honesty and goodness the redemptive qualities. Miss Lagerlof here abandons her former world of Romanticism and enters the world of naturalism and realism.

Miss Ellen Emerson, granddaughter of Ralph Waldo Emerson, is a trained nurse in the Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston. She also gives health talks before women's clubs and similar groups of women.

Miss Mary Custis Lee, daughter of General Robert E. Lee, recently sold to the Valley Forge Museum of Pennsylvania the tent under which Washington is said to have slept during the Revolutionary War. The tent was inherited by Miss Lee from her mother, in whose family it had been handed down directly from Washington. Miss Lee has given the money, $5000, received for the tent to the Home for Needy Confederate Women, in Richmond, Va.

At the banquet given in her honor after the Nobel prize had been awarded to her Miss Selma Lagerlof, the Swedish author, spoke of the pleasure such a festival would have given Fredrika Bremer. She said all old maids should shower blessings on the memory of Miss Bremer for showing them how to attain an independent place in the world and an object in life. She then pointed out the change which had taken place in the public opinion since the days of Miss Bremer. Women were no longer set aside and looked down upon, but had gained for themselves education and standing. Among women nowadays were found graduates of universities, doctors of philosophy and medicine and heads of great business houses, hospitals and schools.

"Charm," says Barrie, speaking with the voice of Maude Adams, "is something which, if a woman has it, she need have nothing else."

Louis Brennan, of gyroscope car fame, has contracted with American capitalists interested in Alaskan developments for the exclusive use of his monorail system in that territory. It is their stated purpose to construct a monorail line 100 miles from Fairbanks to the Matamiska coal fields at an estimated cost of no more than $3000 per mile. The ability of the gyroscope car to take curves is a large consideration in its favor for so rough a country.

Maxim Gorky's American agent denies that the Russian has deserted socialism. He is said to be now keeping school at Capri, his pupils being intending socialists and not children.

Another illusion vanished! A photograph of Thomas B. Mosher, maker of about the most beautiful books in America, is now appearing in various papers. His taste stops this side of ties. The one depicted looks like a barber's pole.

What attracts Sir Ernest Shackleton to Canada as a place for his future home is the vast unexplored subarctic and Arctic territory of the Dominion. He yearns to tramp all over the snowy wilderness and discover its mineral resources. "I am eager to be at it," he says.

"Once in a while I should come back to the civilized world for a rest, but my future will be ever in the work of searching out new places that scientists know nothing of at present." Pole hunting, however, the explorer has entirely abandoned.

Miss Gertrude Jordan, who was elected last November on the Republican ticket treasurer of Cherry County, Neb., is entitled to hold that office. That was the decision of the Supreme Court of Nebraska, which says that under the constitution there is nothing to bar a woman from filling such a place. Miss Jordan's predecessor refused to surrender the office to her, on the ground that a woman is not competent under the statutes. Judge Jacob Fawcett dissented from the majority opinion, on the ground that it was establishing a dangerous precedent, urging that if a woman were competent to be county treasurer, there was no reason why she should not be governor.

Mrs. Fiske is to revive "Becky Sharp" and will use it in connection with "Pillars of Society" and "Hannele" on her coming trip to this coast.

Dr. Gertrude E. Curtis of 471 Lenox avenue has been appointed in charge of the dental clinic on Monday afternoons at the Bellevue hospital in New York city. This is the first time a negro has been honored with an appointment to practice at this well-known institution. Dr. Curtis was graduated from the New York college of dental and oral surgery in May, 1909, and enjoys the distinction of being the first colored woman to get a license to practice dentistry in New York State.

One of the great railroad men of North America retires in the person of Sir William Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific, whose resignation was recently reported. Born in Illinois, Sir William was the United States' chief contribution to Canada's commercial development. In return, Canada gave the United States James J. Hill.

Gabriele d'Annunzio, whose bankruptcy or narrow escape from it was lately announced, is said to be the one Italian author who can make money—for most writer's receipts from the sale of books are a negligible quantity. But unluckily he goes in for hunting, keeping a fine kennel at his beautiful villa in Rome, is an art collector and has extravagant habits that he does not attempt to improve.

Miss Fanny Crosby, the blind poet and hymn writer, has just celebrated her ninety-third birthday. She was born in Putnam county, N. Y. Aside from her blindness Miss Crosby is still in possession of all her faculties, gets around by herself and takes an active interest in all that goes on about her.

Mrs. William G. Choate resigned as president of the Woman's Exchange of New York at the last annual meeting. The exchange was founded by Mrs. Choate thirty-two years ago and she had served as president ever since. Since its foundation it has paid more than $1,500,000 to consignees.

A throat specialist in Bethany, according to The Clipper, used a laryngoscope on a nervous woman patient and remarked: "You would be surprised to know how far we can see with this instrument." As he was about to place the instrument in her throat she apologized for a hole in her stockings.

TEN PLAYS OFTENEST ACTED

A tabulation of the ten plays oftenest acted, compiled from a symposium of expert opinion, shows a surprising result. Three plays easily lead the list, in the order named. They are: "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "Ten Nights in a Barroom" and "East Lynne." The remainder of the ten are: "The Two Orphans," "Camille," "Rip Van Winkle," "Hamlet," "Jerry the Tramp," "Hazel Kirke," "Faust" or "Colleen Bawn." With untempered joy we note the contiguity of Hamlet and Jerry the Tramp in the onward and upward march of the drama, of Hazel and Faust, of Uncle Tom and Camille. Memories of peanuts and wooden benches surge within us as we read and dream. To Maeterlinck and Rostand and Barrie we leave the delicate, the suggestive, the merely subtle. As for us, give us our emotions raw.

TUBERCULOSIS PREVENTION BENEFIT

The San Francisco Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis announces a benefit performance of Maud Allan in her classic dances for the relief fund of the association. The performance will be given at the Garrick Theater on Tuesday, May 17th, at 3 o'clock p. m. The prices of the seats will be $2.50, $2 and $1. Seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co. on and after Thursday, May 12th. There has been no reservation of seats and the choice of seats will be first come, first served. Every expense of the performance has been donated, and the proceeds will be used in a most worthy and needful cause.

CENSUS OF STATE INSTITUTIONS May 1, 1910

Institutions.	Male.	Fc. male.	To-tal.	On pa- role.
Industrial Home for Adult Blind	91	22	113
State School—Whittier.	283	73	356	240
State School—Preston..	385	0	385	198
Total in Reform Schools	668	73	741	438
State Hospital—Stock-ton	1287	702	1989	112
State Hospital—Napa..	1055	800	1855	96
State Hospital—Agnew	402	285	687	61
State Hospital—Mendo-cino	631	261	892	18
State Hospital—South-ern California	866	522	1388	53
Total in State Hosps'ls.	4241	2570	6811	340
Sonoma State Home—Eldridge	476	372	848	17
State Prison—San Quen-tin	1859	30	1889	218
State Prison—Folsom..	1023	0	1023	112
Total in State Prisons..	2882	30	2912	330
Totals—
Ind. Home for Adult Blind....	113	Dec.	1
State Reform Schools.....	741	Dec.	10
State Insane Hospitals	6811	Inc.	37
Sonoma State Home	848	Inc.	10
State Prisons	2912	Inc.	8
Total in State Institutions....	11,425	Inc.	44
W. A. GATES, Secretary.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

The Grizzly Bear, the organ of the Native Sons, has begun its fourth year of existence. It is a neat publication, well edited, and worthy of the success which it appears to attain.

Several carloads of cherries which were grown on the Bidwell ranch, near Chico, were sold and shipped with the sole label, "Klein Fruit Company of Los Angeles." And cherries are not successfully grown in the vicinity of Los Angeles. It is small wonder that the Angel City has prospered, as it has.

The Dutch Flat post-office recently was robbed of $300 in cash, a quantity of gold dust and several valuable articles.

California now is first among the oil-producing States of the Union, its product in 1909 having been nearly 60,000,000 barrels valued at more than $30,000,000.

In Porterville A. J. Meeks of Tulare was stabbed by two unknown men who thereafter escaped. The party had been drinking.

A handsome five-story hotel is to be erected in Stockton. A half-million-dollar hotel has just been opened.

The citizens of Roseville are to vote on the question of establishing a municipal power and lighting system.

More transfers of land were recorded in Sacramento County during April than ever before. A fine showing, but it appears to be needed, there being seventy real estate firms in the Capital City alone.

DISTANCES (From the Fresno Republican)

The announcement that Aviator Paulhan is going to undertake the unprecedented task of flying from London to Paris, a distance of 259 miles, is a reminder how small Europe really is, measured by California standards. The distance of 259 miles, from London to Paris, is barely more than the distance from Fresno to San Francisco, and not so far as from Fresno to Los Angeles. From Paris to Berlin is just about as far as from San Francisco to Los Angeles. From Berlin to Rome is not so far as from San Francisco to San Diego, and from Berlin to Vienna is only as far as from Fresno to Los Angeles. An air line, the length of California, drawn from Berlin, would reach in one direction to St. Petersburg and in another almost to Constantinople. The famous "Orient Express," the one limited transcontinental train in Europe, in going from Paris to Constantinople, traverses no greater distance than from Los Angeles to Portland. And these are the "great distances" of Europe, the journeys which appeal to the imagination, and which very few people ever take. The American comparison is with distances measured by a single State. The chief part of the history of the world has been enacted in a territory no greater than that which a California commercial traveler would "make" in a week. A California candidate for Clerk of the Supreme Court has to canvass more territory than Caesar ever ranged over. The tremendous distance which checked Napoleon in his conquest of the world is being covered by Hiram Johnson now in a little red automobile, talking good government to the people of a single commonwealth. If this were Western Europe, the people of Fresno County would speak one language and the people of Tulare County another, with a record of a thousand years of war between them. We should have, within the limits of this State, half a dozen kings, with as many parliaments and orders of nobility. Within the distance which we traverse in a night, with neighbors and friends at both ends, Europe would show two or three different civilizations, with different governments, languages and institutions. From Paris-like Vienna to Turkish Constantinople is only a short journey, but it marks a separation of a thousand years in civilization. We live in a big world, out here.

STEVENSON AND MANSFIELD

Robert Louis Stevenson was in New York in the summer of 1887, at which time Mansfield was getting ready for the production of "Jekyll and Hyde." The author and the player tried to see each other, but not successfully. Mansfield related in regard to this: "It happened that he was not at home when I called on him, and it happened that I was not at home when he called on me. At last one day I was fortunate, as I thought. I sent in my name, and a person whom I understood to be Mr. Stevenson's adopted son presently appeared and after the customary exchange of civilities said that Mr. Stevenson wished to know whether I had a cold, because if I had he could not venture to see me. I told him to tell Mr. Stevenson, with my kindest regards, that I had an exceedingly bad cold, which I should be most happy to communicate to him, and so took my leave. We did not meet."

THE LAW'S DELAY

President Taft, in his Chicago speech on the 16th of last September, said:

"We inherited our system of criminal prosecution and the constitutional provisions for the protection of the accused in his trial from England and her laws. We inherited from her the jury trial. All these limitations and the jury system still remain in England, but they have not interfered with an effective prosecution of criminals and their punishment."

"There has not been undue delay in the English criminal courts. In this country we have generally altered the relation of the judge to the jury. In England the judge controls the trial, controls the lawyers, keeps them to relevant and proper argument, aids the jury in its consideration of the facts, not by direction, but by suggestion, and the lawyers in the conduct of the cases are made to feel that they have an obligation not only to their clients, but also to the court and to the public at large, not to abuse their office in such a way as unduly to lengthen the trial and unduly to direct the attention of the court and the jury away from the real facts at issue."

JUST FOR FUN

The old physician is an enthusiastic angler in every sense of the term, says Everybody's. While on his way home from a fishing trip he received an emergency call. The proud newly-made father was impatient to have the child weighed, but couldn't find the steelyards; so the physician had to use the pocket scales with which he weighed his fish. "Great Scott, doctor!" exclaimed the father, as he saw the pointer go up. "Thirty-seven and a half pounds!"

Jack Barrymore probably gets off more clever sayings nowadays than any other actor, with the possible exception of Wilton Lackaye. He went to see Sister Ethel in "Mid-Channel" the other day, and some one asked him how he liked the somber Pinero drama. "It reminds me," said Jack, "of a scene in the operating-room of a hospital. A group of happy surgeons is gathered around a patient who is at the point of death, and one of them is saying, 'Oh, what a lovely cancer!'"

ORPHAN NOTICE

The Boys' and Girls' Aid Society

The following have been received since the publication of the last notice:

Half Orphans
Greenwood, Thomas	13 yrs.	4 mos.
Johnson, Luther	9 yrs.	11 mos.
Moser, John	9 yrs.	2 mos.
Nossen, Abraham	10 yrs.	4 mos.
Whiting, David	5 yrs.	5 mos.

Abandoned
Smith, Robert	12 yrs.	1 mo.	4 13 41

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

Estate of GEORGE E. WOODBURY, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administrator with the will annexed of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within ten months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of Oliver Ellsworth, Room 824, Mills Building, corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco, Cal., which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.

A. M. HAINES, Administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, May 2nd, 1910.
OLIVER ELLSWORTH, Attorney for Administrator, Mills Building, San Francisco.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF CHARLES H. MORRELL, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Rhinette Morrell, executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said executrix at the office of Joseph Hutchinson, rooms 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

RHINETTE MORRELL.

Executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

Dated San Francisco, April 20, 1910.

JOSEPH HUTCHINSON, attorney for Executrix, 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, Cal.

NOTICE TO STOCKHOLDERS OF GIGANTE MINING COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in accordance with a resolution of the Board of Directors of Gigante Mining Company, duly adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, held on the 31st day of March, 1910, a special meeting of the stockholders of Gigante Mining Company will be held on the 14th day of June, 1910, at the hour of two o'clock P. M. of that day, at Room 269 in the Russ Building, on the west line of Montgomery street between Pine and Bush streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the principal place of business, and the office of said corporation, and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet. That the object and purpose of said Stockholders' Meeting is to take into consideration and then and there act upon a proposition to increase the capital stock of said Gigante Mining Company by the amount of $25,000.00, that is to say, from $100,000.00, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each, its present capital stock, to $125,000.00, divided into 125,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each.

Dated at San Francisco, California, the 31st day of March, 1910.

AUG. WATERMAN,
Secretary of Gigante Mining Company.
4-8-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Election of United States Senators

For many years, anyhow ever since the modern tendency to centralize industry and commerce in great corporations and holding companies of corporations became dominant, the American people have been dissatisfied with the constitutional method of electing United States senators. They have believed, with what justice need not be discussed at this time, that senators have represented great interests rather than free and independent states, and that the public interests have been injured thereby. Hence the pressure upon the legislature of California to devise some means whereby public sentiment may exert a more direct and wholesome influence in the selection and election of United States senators.

The constitution of the United States declares that: "The senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years, and each senator shall have one vote." This law being paramount, United States senators cannot be elected otherwise than by the legislatures without first amending the Constitution of the United States, a task not easy of accomplishment.

The Constitution of California places no restrictions upon the election of United States senators other than to declare that, "The governor shall not, during his term of office, be elected a senator to the senate of the United States."

The Political Code of California merely directs that "Elections for senators in congress for full terms must be held at the regular session of the legislature next preceding the commencement of the term to be filled," and "Elections to fill a vacancy in the term of a United States senator must be held at the session of the legislature next succeeding the occurrence of such vacancy."

It was, therefore, under the limitations of the foregoing constitutional provisions and code sections that the makers of our direct primary law had to work with reference to a more popular election of United States senators from California. Manifestly the preference of the people can be expressed only in an advisory way, but woe to the legislator who disregards the advice given him by his constituents!

The new direct primary law provides that, "Party candidates for the office of United States senator shall have their names placed on the primary election ballots of their respective parties in the manner herein provided for state officers." Inasmuch as the methods whereby state officers get their names placed on the tickets of their political parties have been fully set forth in this series of articles it will not be necessary to repeat the process here.

The first limitation upon the above declaration reads as follows: "Provided, however, that the vote for candidates for United States senators shall be an advisory vote for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiment of the voters in the respective senatorial and assembly districts in the respective parties."

Just here is where the legislature of California "fell down" upon the people of California. The election of United States senators is not a matter of particular concern to the "senatorial and assembly districts" of California, but to California as a whole. The senator from a state is supposed to represent the whole state in the upper house of congress, not any particular part of it, and nothing short of a state-wide expression of sentiment as to United States senators will answer the requirements of any free state. The deprivation of California of this privilege was the result of a bit of machine politics, presumably in the interest of making it easier for the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company to designate who should represent that company, not the state of California, in the United States senate.

The second proviso reads thus: "Provided further that members of the legislature shall be at liberty to vote either for the choice of their respective districts expressed at said primary election, or for the candidate for United States senator who shall have received the endorsement of their party at such primary election in the greatest number of districts electing members of such party to the legislature."

In the state are eighty assembly and forty senatorial districts, making 120 constituencies to be heard from instead of a single one—the state as a whole. If senators and assemblymen choose to be governed by the sentiments of their own constituencies, as they probably will, for their first vote at least, it is unlikely that any candidate will receive a majority of the votes of the legislature and the way will be opened for trafficking and trading in the interests of some corporation candidate. In fact, the condition of the legislature will be precisely as though no expression of sentiment had been given.

But if the legislator does not wish to be bound by the expressions of his own constituency he may take refuge in standing for the candidate who has received the endorsement of the largest number of districts. Now, one district may cast a small majority for one candidate and another district a large one, and the sums of the several pluralities, or majorities, may bear little relation to the sentiment of the state as a whole. It would be quite possible for one candidate to receive the votes of a majority of the legislative districts and the opposing candidate to receive an overwhelming majority of the popular vote of the state.

In fine, these provisions were inserted into the law for the purpose of coming as near as possible to a nullification of the popular demand for an advisory vote. Once again, representative government deliberately failed to represent, and, whenever such a failure is scored, it will be found to owe its failure, as in this instance, to some inimical, unpatriotic, and perhaps criminal, special interest.

The people of California should not fail to put such pressure upon the legislature they will elect this fall as to secure such a revision of this section of the direct primary law as will afford a state-wide expression of popular opinion as to who shall be United States senator from California. It should be an issue in the election of every legislative candidate.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary $50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

☞ Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE

Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.
1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels: Oakland 950 OAKLAND
Home A 3950 1236 Broadway

This Week: "IMPENDING CHANGES IN CONSTITUTION"

—By Warren Olney, Jr.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: MAY 20 : '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 26.

Never Touched Us

WE HAVE PASSED BY, near or through the tail of Halley's old comet without being feased. Only ignorance cherished any alarms, but, in other days, during such an experience, consternation would have been depicted on every countenance and men and women would have mumbled prayers with trembling lips expecting every instant to be their last. When this earth comes to an end it is as likely as anyway to occur from a short circuiting of the electric currents that surcharge our atmosphere, in which event the earth and all it contains will be reduced to a cinder in a jiffy. Auf wiedersehen, Halley's Comet! Long before you come again we shall be as insubstantial as yourself and, mayhap, follow in your train.

Was It a Put-Up Job?

MAYOR GAYNOR OF NEW YORK "sassed" William Randolph Hearst libelously and all the papers in the country repeated the libel and a good many of them "rubbed it in," whereat William Randolph Hearst instituted suits for damages against about all of them not execution proof. If there be anything at all in it there are millions. Was this a little side scheme of Hearst and Gaynor for raking the table into their pockets to be divided afterward? If it was it was real cute.

The Accession Oath

NOTHING MORE COMMENDS the King of England to his realm, and to the world, than his protest against the form and substance of his accession oath. In so protesting he proclaims himself a twentieth, instead of a seventeenth, century king, though there are those in the twentieth century whose ice-bound spirits should have been freed three hundred years earlier. "A fair field and no favors" is as wholesome a doctrine to apply to religious sects as to political, social or industrial movements.

The Man That Roosevelt Praised

COMING UP THROUGH THE SAN JOAQUIN valley with horn honking, rushes Phil. Stanton, "The man whom Roosevelt praised." What lover of Roosevelt (and who not a higher-up is not a lover of Roosevelt?) can resist the impetus of that onslaught! But, be it remembered, Roosevelt had not seen Phil then, as he has not since then. Does that account for it?

A Big Thing

THE DISPATCHES REPORT that, at Chicago, Governor Gillett declared that the Jeffries-Johnson fight will surely come off and that it will be a big thing for California. Jesso! To save it from being a fake, not worth crossing the bay either way to see, it must be a fight to a finish, and, if it be a fight to a finish, it will be a big display of brutality against which the conscience of the nation will revolt. The governor is right. The event will prove a big thing for California, either a big fight or a big fake, a big disappointment or a big disgrace. So it turns out to be somehow big, our executive of big ideas will be in his glory.

Big Fish Eat Little Ones

THE DISCLOSURES REGARDING THE FISH TRUST, for which public thanks are greatly due The Call, emphasize the ancient truth that the few big fish will eat up all the little ones

if they have an unhindered chance. The big concern can first craunch the little ones and then swallow them. It is the law of The Beast in the jungle, the law that holds sway in the commercial activities of our day. Where is the fault with that theory that free access to the resources of nature will afford an abundant safeguard against monopoly and extortion? What could be more free than the ocean, what market more open than that of the people living in these bay cities and the easily accessible interior? And yet where is there a monopoly more grinding or more puissant in enhancing the cost of living than the fish monopoly? In what way would free access to land be more reassuring than free access to water? Must we guess again?

Full of Fish-hooks

UPON A FIRST READING the Wickersham railroad regulation bill appeared to be perfect, but a second and more careful inspection discovered that about every seemingly beneficent provision had a fish-hook carefully concealed in it. Thanks to insurgent inspection most of these fish-hooks were disclosed and some of them were withdrawn by the representatives of the "interests" that put them there, but they are not all out yet. The "interests" will not consent to their being all taken out, and inasmuch as there are not enough Republican "regular" bait-swallowers in the senate to pass the bill, fish-hooks and all, the "interests" are now turning to their Democratic reserves to supply the needed re-enforcements. The "interests" are not likely to be disappointed. They generally know their men and their men know their master's voice. Effective railroad regulation by government is not to be looked for until railroad representation in government has been effectually eliminated.

He Beat the Beast

PRESS ADVICES FROM DENVER afford the cheering intelligence that Ben Lindsey has probably beaten The Beast in that jungle in a straight-out fight for self government. One of the gentlest and most non-combative of men, with one of the softest hearts and kindest of personalities, without a big brain, great eloquence or a masterful spirit, nor yet surcharged with that subtle fluid known as magnetism, Benjamin Lindsey has made himself a national hero. He is a David, trusting in the Lord God of Hosts, and daring to go up against Goliath to pluck off his head and give it to the fowls of the air. It looks as though he had gotten that head pretty well plucked. There is no estimating the power in a self-forgetful moral courage piloted by mother wit.

Honor to Ira Copley

IRA COPLEY, OF AURORA, Illinois, has volunteered to finance the Attorney-General of his state in getting at the truth in regard to the election of Senator Lorimer by purchase. No better use for wealth can be conceived than that of supporting constituted authorities, if well disposed, in the enforcement of law, but Ira Copley will find his pathway beset by thorns. He will find The Beast, its brothers, its cousins and its uncles, arrayed against him, while The Beast's wife, her sisters and her aunts will accept indictment on a criminal charge as a badge of honor and as affording the entree to the alleged best society. All honor to Ira Copley! May his generation increase.

Fifty Years of Life

California is proud of its state university, more proud of it, perhaps, than it is justified in being, just as we Americans are more proud of the "greatest country on earth," and the "freest of all governments," than the cold facts quite warrant. Anyhow, we are proud of our great university and experience a sense of satisfaction in its having survived the vicissitudes of half a century.

There are two courses open to a university. One is to take in hand only those relatively few students who have proved themselves capable of becoming learned and, with a corps of learned instructors, give these few the best advantages that specialized learning has to offer. The other course is to accept as raw material that abundant mediocrity, not downright stupid, and, with the aid of a relatively numerous corps of instructors, also not stupid, raise the mediocre level as many notches as possible, re-enforcing elemental knowledge with supplemental knowledge, but turning out few scholars, few whom the world shall look up to as learned.

Properly, as we think, the University of California has chosen the second course, with the result that the human lump is being leavened, widely if not deeply. There exists no community in the state where the influence of this democracy of learning has not gone, and there will come to exist few families in the state untouched by its advantages. There are those who would have made it an aristocracy of learning instead of a democracy. It has chosen the better part. Let it be the function of the endowed university, arising out of private or associate benevolence, to take the hundredth, or the thousandth, student and carry him on as far as any one may lead him that he may then follow alone the call from within to go where no one has led, or can lead, into the mysteries of original research. The penalty of this policy may be that our university shall be and become big, even huge, without being great, but we can afford the price. An instructed mediocrity will prove to the commonwealth worth all it shall cost the commonwealth whether that cost be stated in terms of money or renunciation of the call to a higher learning.

What of the future? It is The People's university, born of their needs and nourished of their substance and they have a right to make it what they would have it made. What would they have it? What should they have it? If the writer of this were commissioned to frame a reply it would be that the University of California shall not aim to impart less of specialized instruction than it is now imparting, but that it seek to emphasize the moralization of all its activities; that it place stress upon the truth that no man, and no woman, no student of either sex, can live to self alone, but that all that anyone is or can become belongs to the human whole. To this we should add a great emphasis to that kindred truth that God is imminent in his universe and his world.

As the writer has come into contact with university life and university men it has seemed to him that there is need that greater and more persistent emphasis be placed on these two phases of a generous preparation for living the normal, intelligent, middle-class life and that, with these, one and all well may wish the University of California God speed in reeling off the years.

President Hadley's Message

In common with other thoughtful men, President Hadley of Yale university is concerned for the future of this republic. Without being pessimistic, or more than dubious, he does not shut his eyes to the truth of history or to the tendencies of his time. Condensed into a sentence his message is that if the American democracy would live the American people must learn to concern them-

THE STAFF
A. J. PILLSBURY.....	Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....	Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....	Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....	Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 36 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094.

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Blair, 346 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

selves with those phases of government with which they are competent to deal and must leave to trained experts those functions of government the discharge of which requires specialized knowledge beyond the reach of the ordinary voter. Those issues that are moral in their last analysis, President Hadley thinks, the people may be trusted to deal with, but only those. As he saw it, the great gold-silver issue of 1896 fell within the domain of expert knowledge, and it only chanced that the people decided it aright. They might easily have made a wrong decision, in which event the consequences would have been calamitous.

Marshall and Story, Webster and Lincoln, President Hadley declared, were experts. It was fortunate for the nation that great issues, requiring expert knowledge, were left to their determination, and it is the function of colleges and universities to turn out experts upon whom the people may rely in great crises. But it is not always that experts agree. A divided supreme court means a divided public opinion as to what is right or wise or just or practical. The problems which confront democracy on a small scale, as in the town meeting, are simple enough, but when democracy attempts a scale as huge as that of the American Republic, the problems assume proportions as huge as ever confronted empires. Then it is that the people must put their trust in the hands of trained experts for good or for ill.

President Hadley's views are worthy of serious consideration. It has long been plain to many that the general public must relinquish to executive agencies many functions that are now sought to be performed through direct political action. The shortened ballot would be in line with the reform suggested. Direct legislation is not inconsistent with this tendency when direct legislation is attempted only with relation to those issues which the general public is competent to determine, but any attempt to legislate directly touching more than a fraction of the issues that come before a legislature would result in disaster.

California needed this message from President Hadley. The people of California should take it to heart. Our public institutions are mainly in the custody of inexperienced men and, with each change of administration, we are apt to have a change of management which displaces those who, after four years of experience, have become expert, in order to find places for those whose duties are wholly new to them. Politics has touched our university relatively little so far, but the blight of politics is over all else in contravention of Dr. Hadley's law for the survival of democracy—that functions requiring expert knowledge shall be performed only by experts.

The Lawler Draft

In order to give credit to whom credit is due, in the matter of the Lawler draft of findings to be used by the President in exonerating Ballinger and punishing Glavis, it will be necessary for the reader to put himself in the place of Attorney Brandeis in charge of what is commonly spoken of as being the prosecution.

Learning that such a draft of findings had been made in advance by Lawler, made in advance of taking the documents in the case to the President at Beverly, it was not unnatural for Brandeis to conclude that our fat, good natured and naturally indolent President had been successfully "worked" by Ballinger and his friends, and that the investigation into the merits of the case had been perfunctory, the President having relied almost wholly upon the good faith and intelligence of those in whom he had placed confidence. These assumptions or suspicions were given additional weight by the fact that Brandeis had been unable to obtain the Lawler draft, either by authority of the investigating committee or by its being voluntarily furnished by Ballinger.

The publication of the Kerby letter, giving a history of the Lawler draft of those findings, brought the whole affair to light, drew from the President a perfectly satisfactory explanation of the incident, that explanation showing that he had dug into the papers in the case with a Cleveland-like laboriousness and had reached a conclusion expressed in his own language. Apart from this explanation, the country would have believed, as it would have had a right to believe, that the Ballinger influence had succeeded in "working" the President to his own injury and to the great injustice of Glavis. The President should be properly appreciative of the opportunity to set himself aright, which Stenographer Kerby afforded him.

This is not saying that the President's treatment of Glavis was either warranted or just, but only that the President was actually, intelligently, personally and not perfunctorily responsible for that treatment. At least, he was not "worked," as many had feared.

More Than Coincidences

Nothing braver, clearer or more convincing has been spoken in recent weeks than the address on "Hurting Business," delivered by Col. Harris Weinstock before the Unitarian Club and its guests at the Fairmont Hotel on Friday evening of last week. He faced the commercial situation of San Francisco without flinching. Taking the statistics of Los Angeles under the wide-open Harper administration, during which it was attempted to make our Southern city the "Paris of America," and contrasting them with statistics afforded since the reputable Alexander administration redeemed Los Angeles from reproach, Col. Weinstock showed that, whether in point of building permits issued, aggregate investments made in improvements, the total of clearing house business or commercial failures reported, good government had meant good times in Los Angeles, almost a wave of prosperity. Contrasting, in like manner, the reputable Taylor administration with the discredited regime of McCarthy, Col. Weinstock showed that, whether in point of investments, in improvements, bank clearings or failures in business, San Francisco had suffered substantial diminution since the Taylor administration came to an end and that of McCarthy came into power. The contrast presented in the experiences of the two cities, under their respective reversals of policy, was presented in plain terms and the only legitimate conclusion was clearly and courageously drawn. As a business man, Col. Weinstock is under no misapprehensions concerning the effect on business of a degradation of moral and political sentiment. It does not pay. It "hurts business," and to fail to stand for Right Thinking in any community is for a business man to array himself against his own business interests. Furthermore, as Col. Weinstock showed, we cannot have a corrupt moral life in our city without having a corrupt government, and we cannot have a corrupt government without having corruption permeate our commercial life through and through, and rottenness in our commercial life means its death and destruction. Those were brave words spoken by a man who knows. The experiences of these two cities, wide-open and with the lid on, were more than coincidences.

Conservation on the Run

There are indications that the foes of conservation are encouraged. There is not a mouthpiece of the exploiters that is not vociferous in advocacy of the rights of this generation as paramount to those of generations yet to be born. A Senate committee lately had the audacity to report the old James River-Dam bill that former President Roosevelt vetoed because the bill gave, in fee and without consideration, a valuable public property with no limitations for conserving the public interest. Ballinger has publicly declared that the Cunningham claims should have been clear-listed, which means that they will be clear-listed and patented as soon as he can get his hands down that are now held up, and that the Guggenheims will get what they went after. It is evident that our American "performers" feel that they are in the saddle again ready to swear a new allegiance to the doctrine that the best use that can be made of public property is to make a free gift of it to some opulent private corporation. There are, however, some American millions who do not and will not share in that way of thinking. They will make their influence felt as soon as they get a chance to vote.

What's the Matter With Pittsburg?

What's the matter with Pittsburg? Ten of its prominent citizens and city officials already in prison and more to follow! Can it be that the Pennsylvania railroad is nowhere connected with this gang of grafters? Are the villainies there unassociated with the great corporation that runs the government of the State? Has Pittsburg produced no Calhoun to debauch the press and demoralize the people so that a just jury cannot be obtained? When the story of "Graft in Pittsburg" shall be written by some Denman it will make mighty interesting reading in San Francisco where, with infinitely more of struggle and stress, on behalf of justice, infinitely less was accomplished in vindicating justice and the law.

Our Grievances

A contemporary complains that neither the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League nor its candidates have pointed out any real grievances in the way the administration of the State has been conducted, but have contented themselves with "mere rhetorical denunciation of individuals and of more or less imaginary political ills." So? Is it, then, no real grievance that the government of California is not permitted to be of the people of California, but rather by mercenaries in the pay of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company and allied interests? Is it no real grievance that the one litigant in all the courts of California has had a predominating influence in naming almost the entire appellate judiciary and a good part of the judges of courts of first instance? Is it no grievance that the State Board of Equalization has ever been held an affiliated and dependent arm of the aforesaid political bureau and that every legislature for more than a generation has been herded, led and manipulated likewise? Are the people not rightfully aggrieved that the State Railroad Commission, to whom the people looked for the establishment of justice between carriers and their patrons, has for thirty years been looked upon as a safe niche in which to tuck away serviceable retainers that they may wax fat at public cost while performing little public service? Is it not a grievance that public patronage, in the approximate sum of a million dollars a year, is devoted, in great measure, to paying retainers of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau for services rendered the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau instead of for services rendered The People of California? Is it no grievance that efforts made to take the judiciary out of partisan politics were defeated by the partisans of this corporate political bureau? But if there were no grievance other than that of corporation domination of parties and State, what man is there in party or State who will not proclaim that grievance sufficient warrant for resistance to such domination with all the forces, moral and political, that manhood may command?

From Mouth to Mouth

There are those who think that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company is inactive, and it regards the nomination of Hiram Johnson, and the greater part of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League ticket, as inevitable and is contenting itself with slipping in now and again a legislator to take program from Walter Parker and Jere Burke. Those who so think are in error. That bureau was never more perniciously active than it is now. It is burrowing under the foundations of the League's platform and Johnson's candidacy. It loves darkness rather than light and, like a mole that is both blind and working under ground, it can drive straight tunnels and elaborate a connected system of underground offensive and defensive works. It will be remembered that this same element in our political life whispered down the graft prosecution in San Francisco and poisoned the public mind against Spreckels and Heney without showing so much as a hand above the parapets. It is following the same tactics in the case of Johnson. Every day or two some new canard, some injurious insinuation, some false accusation, comes to the surface, showing that this is the busy season for the plague-infected rodents of California.

That Constitution

The reader who has no use for a weekly paper, other than to be amused by it for a half hour when he is tired, will not find our "backbone" article for the week much to his liking, but those who feel themselves to be a part of The Great Republic and in some measure responsible to it and for it, will find "Impending Changes in Our Constitution," from the pen of Mr. Warren Olney, Jr., a most enlightening, liberal-minded and progressive presentation of an ever-present problem. Both houses of Congress are now wrestling with the issues he has raised, the President and his Cabinet are empaneled to consider them, and the Supreme Court of the United States has demanded a rehearing of the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases for no other reason than that the last word now possible to be said on the subject shall be said before they render a decision interpreting again, if not a new, the organic law of the nation. It is just to Mr. Olney to say that the article was prepared to be read before a club of thoughtful gentlemen, rather than for publication, but the editor of this paper felt that the contribution to contemporary thought was too valuable to be confined to so limited a circle. If our Constitution fails to grow as the needs of the nation grow, it will sometime be torn into a thousand shreds and, no matter how often the garment is refitted to the growing giant, the process of refitting must go on from incident to incident, need to need and year to year, or be split asunder. How shall it be done?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Can the reader keep his feet? We were crossing Kern river back in the mountains. There had been showers, and the current was strong. Our pack-mules were not. They were old and decrepit, evidently retrieved from the animal junk-heap by an owner who had made a somewhat spectacular failure in life through equipping himself with the cast-off appliances of more successful men, but that is another story. Could these old mules keep their feet in that stream and bring our camp equipage safely over? That was the question.

It was a trying ordeal, and what ropes carried across ahead of them and stoutly pulled on could do to brace them was done, but how they did totter on their stoven-up hoofs when they got where the current was strongest! But they made it and fetched us safely over when it seemed, as we watched them from the bank, as though the chances against them were more than even.

There are times in life when adverse currents set strongly against us. If we are stanch and well disciplined, and have full use of all our powers, we breast the currents with confidence, as good, strong, really serviceable mules would have breasted the current in Kern river, but if we have suffered our moral natures and our power for forming and acting upon sound judgments to become decrepit we totter and too often fall.

Up in New Hampshire there once lived a dear old Yankee farmer who ordered all his steps in conformity with Bible texts and, thanks to his almost constant companionship with the Scriptures, he generally had a text on his tongue's end to fit every possible contingency. At one time—we have forgotten the occasion—there was a popular movement in the community which his conservative judgment assured him was not wise, but he searched the Bible long before he found a text that conformed with his judgment, a process of being enlightened not by any means infrequent, but his search was rewarded at last. He came upon Luke 17:23, where it is written: "And they shall say to you, See here, or See there: go not after them or follow them."

The text may not have been very relevant to the matter in hand, but it is a good text and may well be applied to many a new thing. The craze of the day or time is a good thing to "go not after" or follow. There are hundreds of American families being impoverished by striving to support each its automobile in a style befitting its station. There are men who have put a mortgage upon the only home they may hope to own in order that they may ride in an automobile they can neither afford to own nor to take care of. The bankers of a thrifty eastern city, sometime since, made an investigation into the phenomenon of automobile buying and found not a few instances where families had placed mortgages upon their household furniture to secure the purchase price of automobiles on the installment plan, mainly because their neighbors had them. Such persons are clearly unable to keep their feet in a stiff current. They place themselves on a parity with the packmule that has seen better days. In the language of the mule market, they are "stove up" in power of will, in sanity of judgment.

There are great, mysterious movements that permeate the human mass that are not only wholesome but glorious, such a movement for instance as that national insurgency in our political life that has for its purpose the rehabilitation of free and representative government in the spirit of Lincoln's Gettysburg address, but where there is one such movement that challenges the enthusiasm and consciences of stalwart manhood, there are a dozen crazes, fads, fashions of thought and action, that skim the surface of the multitude, toppling over the weak and sweeping the irresolute from their feet. "Go not after them nor follow them." Keep your own two feet under you as firm as foundations built upon bedrock that you may not be toppled over by every adverse current that sets in your direction. There are those who have learned to walk who have not learned to stand.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

No Impending Wheat Famine

It was James J. Hill who, not long ago, casting a prophetic eye upon the mist-hid future, announced that a wheat famine was imminent for the bread-eaters of the world. Mr. Hill's prophecy was not extensively bolstered by statistics, but the might of its oratory might be considered to compensate for this lack in some degree. However, the defect in prophecy is that, dealing with the unknown, as it does, anybody may take a hand in it, and now comes a prophet to discredit Mr. Hill's forecast and to put some touches of light into his picture. This later seer is Mark A. Carleton of the United States Department of Agriculture, who is recognized as one of the greatest of living wheat experts. He lightens up the gloom noticeably by asserting that there is no danger of a wheat famine, up to 1950 at least, and presumably not thereafter. And the beauty of the case is that he summons figures—which, as everybody knows, cannot lie—to give a backbone to his prophecy. Adding lands available for raising wheat in Alaska, Texas, Indian reservations, reclaimable semi-arid or swamp lands and available lands in the older States, Mr. Carleton finds that there are nearly 300,000,000 acres of land which are not now, but may be used for growing wheat. Proper cultivation should result in producing at least twenty bushels of wheat to the acre, and accordingly here is the opportunity to add about six billion bushels to the world's annual supply of this grain. Allowing a per capita consumption of six bushels per annum, which is more than the present average, there should be, according to these figures, wheat for one billion people—this added to the present supply. On the whole, we should feel encouraged; it appears probable that we can eat bread for some time to come.

The Land-Owning German Cities

The thrifty German—and where is the German who is not thrifty?—displays his thrift no less in municipal than in private affairs. Officially he has noted the value of the "unearned increment," and he makes practical use of this knowledge. It being true, he says to himself, that unoccupied land increases in price when people settle about it, why should not the people, rather than any individual, have the benefit of this increase? Such a question answers itself, and accordingly the city governments, representing the people, have purchased and hold lands and the unearned increment swings their way. Frankfurt, a smaller city than San Francisco, owns twenty square miles of land within its boundaries and nearly six square miles outside of its limits, having paid about $50,000,000 for land within the last ten years. Berlin owns nearly 61 square miles, Breslau 20, Cologne 15½, Munich over 21, and Strasburg nearly 19. As evidence of what the unearned increment on these municipal lands means to the people, let it be noted that in about 500 of the towns and villages of Germany not only are the people exempt from local taxes but a dividend of $25 to $100 a year goes to each citizen as his share of the surplus earnings of the lands. This is the manner in which German cities do business, and this is what the unearned increment means to them and their citizens. Some day, perhaps, the people over here will conclude that it is just as well to take that sort of thing unto themselves as to have some wealthy citizen absorb it, but, being self-rulers, and in that respect differing from the unfortunate Germans, we must be given ample time in which to rub our eyes open.

The Progress of the Wireless

It now is about twenty-two years since the secret of wireless telegraphy was revealed to the world, although it was some time after that before much practical use was made of it. So great has been the progress since then that the Pilot, the official organ of the German signaling stations, says that there are now 416 wireless stations on the coasts of the maritime nations of the earth. Of these 150 are controlled by the Marconi Company representing the discoverer and inventor of the wireless, while the German Telefunken Company, which is next in number, controls 110. This leaves 156, which are divided among smaller companies. With reference to the oceans, the stations are divided as follows: The North Atlantic has 106, the North Pacific 88, Mediterranean and Black Sea 63, North Sea 45, the English Channel and Irish Sea 38, the Baltic Sea 21, South Atlantic 17, Indian Ocean 15, and the East Indian Archipelago 15. The radius of action varies from 800 to 3000 miles.

The Woman Aviator Is in Evidence

When the world's first great aviation contest was held in Rheims, France, last summer, not a woman competed, the honors being divided among men only. Nearly a year has passed since then, another series of contests soon will be held in France, and among those who are expected to compete will be eight women. In brief, gentle woman looked upon man flying through the air, said to herself, "Pshaw! I can do that just as well as he can," and she is doing it—and "just as well as he can," too. And not only can she fly as well as he, but it is the testimony of instructors that, "given a woman with sufficient nerve to withstand the buffeting inseparable from first experiments, her natural swiftness of movement, her keen sense of touch, and above all her gift of intuition, enable her to equal if not excel men in the delicate manipulation of the levers of an aeroplane." And when masculine instructors admit that woman may "equal if not excel" man, it is a fairly safe bet that she is not unlikely to excel. The women who will take part in the approaching meeting are the Baroness de la Roche, Mlle. Marvingt, Mlle. Dutrieux, Mme. Peltier, Mme. Hevartson, Mme. Daity, Mlle. Aboukaia and Miss Spencer Kavanagh. All of them are French except Miss Kavanagh, who is English, and she was trained in France.

The First Night College

The first night college in the United States, and probably in the world, began its work in New York City on October 1, 1908, and is just about to conclude the second year of its work. It began with a student enrollment of 201, a larger freshman class than that of most colleges, and the number of students has constantly increased since then. The average age of the students at that time was 22 years, the oldest being 38 and the youngest 17. Following are the distinctions which have been noted between these night students and those who attend the day colleges: The latter, as might have been anticipated, have had better preparation, but the former are desperately in earnest in their desire to secure an education, are much the more thoughtful, and consequently ask more pertinent and searching questions in the classroom. In short, the night students attend, not because their parents wish them to obtain an education, but because they, themselves, desire one and have seized upon this as their only opportunity to attain it. The experience of this first of night colleges should lead to the establishment of many others.

Proposed Penal Reform in England

A bill introduced in the British Parliament by Hugh Courtenay Luttrell would, were it adopted, make a vast change in the administration of the penal law, as the following brief statement of what it proposes will indicate: No death sentence for minors, imprisonment, instead of execution for infanticide, no black cap when a judge imposes a sentence of death, religious services for convicts about to be executed, no solitary confinement in prisons, and no corporal punishment except between the ages of 10 and 16 years. The appointment of women as police commissioners is recommended.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

IT'S OUR MOVE

TO OUR NEW STORE AT

42 and 44 CALIFORNIA ST

One half block off Market St.

Calendars, Pocket Diaries
Office Diaries for 1910

LE COUNT, CLARK & ORMOND

STATIONERS AND PRINTERS
San Francisco

MAGAZINE

Subscription Agency

216 OAKLAND BANK OF
SAVINGS BUILDING

Cor. 12th and Broadway
Oakland

We take subscriptions for any Magazine or Paper published in the world at reduced rates.

TELEPHONE OAKLAND 3786

BRANDON & WATSON

A Post Card will bring our 44
page catalogue to your door.

"We Hold Thee Safe"

QUEEN

INSURANCE CO.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

ROLLA V. WATT

MANAGER

N. W. Corner Pine and Sansome Streets
SAN FRANCISCO

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

COSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

GATHERED INTO HIS CARE

By Frances Margaret Milne

(This poem is Frances Margaret Milne's last message to the world. It was written, with pencil, several days before her death, and given to her brother with instructions that it be handed "directly to James H. Barry of the San Francisco Star" when she was no more.)

I am going away on a journey
Sometime, in the gray of the dawn
Or haply it may be at midnight
Or just when the sunset is gone.
I know not the time of my going,
I know not the road I shall fare,
But I know that the Lord of the Harvest
Will gather me into His care.

The leaf of my life is in fading,
Oh, long hath the Spring tide been past!
And Summer hath blossomed and withered
And here is the Autumn at last.
Ah, small is the sheaf of my gleanings
From fields where the gleaners had share—
But I know that the Lord of the Harvest
Will gather me into His care.

I have faltered and stumbled in treading
The way He appointed me here,
Tho' eyes that were pure as His seraphs
Dropped for me the suppliant tear.
The dear human love that unfolded
Oh, had I been worthy to share!
But I know that the Lord of the Harvest
Will gather me into His care.

The sheaf that I gleaned for His service
Has withered in breath of my sighs;
And salt as the spray of life's ocean
The dew of my grief on it lies.
How shall I approach Him to render
Such offering unworthy to bear?
But I know that the Lord of the Harvest
Will gather me into His care.

I am going away on a journey—
The journey my loved ones have gone,
And whatever the time of our going,
We travel it always alone,—
Alone, to all mortal beholding;
But shall not His angels be there?
For I know that the Lord of the Harvest
Will gather me into His care.

HOW BARRIE WRITES PLAYS

James M. Barrie has been in Paris with Charles Frohman of late and Rennold Wolf of the New York Telegraph says that one may invariably accept that fact as an unfailing sign that Barrie is at work on a new play, and that Charles Frohman will soon announce it. Not since "The Little Minister" has Barrie written a play in Scotland or in London. "Peter Pan," "Quality Street," and "What Every Woman Knows" were really written between London and Paris—or rather talked out by Barrie to Frohman on the little trips which they periodically make together, when one is crystallizing his dramatic ideas and the other is hurrying on his way to keep appointments with French authors.

It is not a desk covered with blank paper, a bottle of ink and a set of pens that Barrie wants for writing a play, but the single compartment of a continental railway train and the exclusive audience of Charles Frohman. Then, with his head sunk in the leather cushions on his side of the compartment and his feet firmly fixed in the iron basket for wraps above the window—a favorite position greatly resembling the "split"—Barrie is ready to write a play; or rather, by talking out what is in his mind, find out whether he has one worth writing. Mr. Frohman is ever on the alert for two things on these excursions to Paris with Barrie. One is Barrie himself, and the other is a new play by Barrie. The guardianship of Barrie consists in taking care that he is not lost or does not disappear. Once when "Peter Pan" was being done at the Vaudeville Theater in Paris, the woman attendants, wrap-keepers and program-sellers, not knowing Barrie, held up the little playwright with such persistence and versatility that he finally beat a retreat out of a side exit and was missing for the rest of the day.

But on the trip back to London Mr. Barrie told Mr. Frohman the story of "What Every Woman Knows"—only he told it not as a possible plot for a play, but just as a little story to while away the time. Seated in the compartment in his usual posture, with a well lighted briar pipe hanging from his mouth and gazing, not at Mr. Frohman, who sat directly opposite smoking a cigar, Barrie talked to the ceiling of the car, and, as he articulated his principal ideas, he sounded a note only insinuated in the play itself when it was later actually put to paper.

It grew out of a single notion. Woman suffrage was tempestuously all over England at the time. Barrie's idea began with the declaration that it is not the ballot but her equal common sense with man that will lift woman from being a pretty idiot, a passive beauty or an adorable bundle of caprices to the station of equality with man. Then he went on to say that the bedrock of common sense is a fine comic sense, all the more perfect on account of its sparkle. "That's what every real woman knows," said Barrie at the end of his explanation.

Oddly enough, in such talks, the little playwright speaks as if unto space, and only after talking himself out does he listen to his companion, the practical exploiter of plays. Then, when London is reached, Barrie again disappears—this time to his little cottage at Leinster Corners. Next comes the real work, but the briefest period of play-making—dictating into crystal clarity the ideas talked off at random.

WHEN POETRY PAYS

Alfred Noyes, the English poet, has not only written some of the best contemporaneous poetry, but has disproved the axiom that poets must make money on the side or starve. He describes his experience thus:

"I mention this fact, as it really might count for something with those who are perpetually talking of the impracticability of poetry in the present day. This fact is that one poet, at any rate, has from the time when he left Oxford, eight years ago, taken up poetry deliberately as his career in the same way that a painter or a sculptor is allowed to devote himself to his art, not as a hobby, but as a serious life-work. This poet deliberately set aside all other financial resources, and has so far met with no difficulty, but indeed with more practical success than would be likely to one engaged in any other art, in so short a period. I think it is due to the somewhat audacious stroke of throwing oneself into the work entirely, i. e., not taking it as a hobby. But at any rate it is a fact."

SWEDENBORG SOCIETY CENTENNIAL

Says the New York Sun:

The hundredth anniversary of the Swedenborg Society of London, founded in 1810, will be the occasion of a gathering from all parts of the world an international congress of the students and admirers of Emanuel Swedenborg, to be held in the City of London, the event to occupy four days, July 5 to 8 inclusive.

The assemblage is not an ecclesiastical or sectarian one, but a meeting to be devoted to the consideration of Swedenborg's contributions to science, philosophy and psychology, as well as in theology to the higher thought and investigation of the world of today.

The meetings will be held in the handsome group of the Crown Rooms, Holborn, which will afford accommodations not only for the day sessions in the various sections of the congress, but also for the "Conversazione," and other large social gatherings in the evenings.

The coming together of so many of the religious followers of Swedenborg from various parts of the world, but especially from America and Great Britain, will doubtless be availed of by various New Church organizations, the publishing, mission, educational, and other boards for conference and the opening of new means for brotherly union and co-operation. But as the Swedenborg Society, whose centenary is to be celebrated, is strictly a publishing body, with no sectarian or ecclesiastical limitations as to its membership or polity, the emphasis of the congress will be laid entirely on Swedenborg in his most comprehensive and world-wide relations, not to religion alone, but to the whole range of human thought and interest.

The non-sectarian and non-ecclesiastical character of the Swedenborg Society may be seen at once by a glance at the list of its original and subsequent members and most ardent promoters.

Swedenborg died in London in the year 1772, leaving his voluminous works in Latin distributed largely at his own expense among the universities and the leaders of the clergy of the established Churches of England and of Sweden.

The first work to be given to the English reader was that on "Heaven and Hell," translated in 1778 by the Anglican clergyman, the Rev. Thomas Hartley, rector of Winwick, with a very commendatory preface, and this was followed in 1781 by the translation by the venerated and beloved John Clowes, rector of St. John's, Manchester, of Swedenborg's "True Christian Religion, Containing the Universal Theology of the New Church." This was before any religious organization of the New Church had been attempted.

Even as early as 1784 these and other writings of Swedenborg were brought to America and the doctrines publicly proclaimed in Philadelphia; and it was in that city that, under the auspices and by the subscriptions of such prominent men as Benjamin Franklin and Robert Morris, signers of the Declaration of Independence, and the prominent jurist, John Young, for thirty years the presiding Judge of Western Pennsylvania, the first edition of Swedenborg's "True Christian Religion" was published by Francis Bailey of Philadelphia in the year 1789.

The Rev. John Clowes of Manchester, although a prominent rector in the Established Church, was not only a very diligent translator but a most zealous propagandist of Swedenborg's doctrines, and largely through his influence a publishing society had been established in Manchester some years before the inauguration in 1810 of the Swedenborg Society.

This society has been now for a hundred years the great, central publishing agency of the writings of Swedenborg as well as of the collateral literature of the New Church body.

On its committee have been men of wealth and of scientific and literary as well as those of theological attainments. Among these men may be mentioned Messrs. John and Charles Augustus Tulk, Dr. J. J. Garth Wilkinson, F. R. S.; the famous sculptor, John Flaxman, and the Rev. Augustus Clissold, M. A., of Exeter College, Oxford, to whose liberality the society is indebted for its valuable property in Bloomsbury Street, now for many years the principal headquarters of New Church publications.

The extent of the society's publishing propaganda may be seen from the fact that its stock now includes editions of Swedenborg's works complete or in fragments in the following languages: Latin, English, German, Swedish, Norwegian, Polish, Icelandic, Danish, French, Welsh, Russian, Magyar, Italian, Dutch, Arabic and Hindi.

Nearly 2000 "Foundation Truths," extracted from the "True Christian Religion," were sent two years ago to the native Japanese Christian ministers.

The total number of volumes issued by the society considerably exceeds 1,360,000 and the growth of Swedenborgian literature, to which this wide dissemination of Swedenborg's writings has so largely contributed, may be judged of from the fact that the Bodleian Library at Oxford contains some 250 titles under the name Swedenborg and the British Museum Library between five and six hundred, and the recently published "Biography of Swedenborg," by James Hyde, a volume of over 700 pages, names 3500 editions of Swedenborg's own works entire or in fragments in a score of different languages.

VIRILIZING HIGH SCHOOL EDUCATION

ALAMEDA'S REMEDY FOR "FEMINIZATION"

Other interesting ideals in education than the open-air school plan are under discussion in Alameda. They concern especially the students in the high school. About five hundred pupils attend the high school. The building in which they study is admirable. The courses given are comprehensive, and the teaching force is adequate in numbers and skilled in pedagogy. Plans under way for more courses of study and for increased equipment show that the school is in the hands of progressive educators.

And yet the principal, Dr. George C. Thompson, sees visions of larger usefulness and greater efficiency ahead. He has been powerfully impressed with the idea, widely discussed by educators throughout America, that the evolutionary process defined as the "feminization of the schools" is at work in Alameda, and that the boys need some virile touch in their school life to offset its influence.

The idea of the "feminization of the schools" probably was first promulgated by Dr. Everett Tomlinson of New Jersey, a noted educator and author. Dr. Tomlinson pointed out, about four or five years ago, that the education of the youth of America was almost wholly in the hands of women, that from the primary grades to the last year of high school, practically all the instruction received by the pupils was at the hands of women teachers. This was not particularly news, but he made the point graphically and added to it the new idea that there was a decided difference in the influence exercised upon the character of children by women and the influence exercised by men. He contended that this difference was very perceptible, and that the boys especially were showing its effects in the development of effeminacy in the public schools.

Dr. Tomlinson's views excited a lively discussion that has by this time resolved the consensus of opinion down to something like this: The influence of women upon boys, up to the age, roughly speaking, of 14, is wholly desirable. The boys need an example in gentleness, courtesy and consideration, and an incentive to chivalry toward women. Women teachers refine and steady the boys under their charge. But after the age of 14 the lack of masculine influence shows upon the development of boys' characters. From that age they need the "give and take" of companionship with men. They need to be toughened for the harsh experiences of after life by the rougher contact with men. Life these days is a fight against blows to the spirit if not blows on the body, and the boy who does not learn to accept the inevitable roughness of life with philosophy and to fight, if need be, is very apt to find life an unnecessary discouragement, perhaps a hopeless battle.

Here is the point at which the masculine influence can be of essential help to boyhood. Not that the male teacher cuffs or kicks, nor that he is gruff and harsh, but he looks at life from a man's point of view, and his casual words and his way of meeting problems and his laughter at things that would arouse sympathy in women, these things are all a guide and an example to the boys in his charge, and they unconsciously shape their point of view and their character.

Dr. Thompson has been greatly impressed with the absence of this virile influence in the Alameda High School. Some of his teachers are men, but they touch the lives of the boys only at two or three recitation periods of the day. At other times the women teachers have the boys. And at all times the boys are in classes in which they are outnumbered by girls.

This last fact opens another field of educational inquiry and discussion. Some of the eastern colleges, notably Tufts, have decided that a full trial of the co-educational idea has proved it to be a failure. The strongest argument used on behalf of co-education is demonstrated to be wrong. That argument is that the presence of boys and girls in the same classroom arouses the competitive spirit, the boys striving to excel the girls, and vice versa. Experience has demonstrated that this is only half true; it does inspire the girls, but it acts in a directly opposite way upon the boys. The reason for this is that boys are self-conscious and girls are not. When a girl recites before a roomful of boys she feels no hesitation because of their presence. On the contrary, the presence of girls keenly affects the boys, they feel self-conscious, and they stumble and blunder where they would do well if the girls were absent. Thus the boys are excelled by the girls. This has another bad effect: the boys' pride is hurt and they become stubborn and indifferent and do less well than they would do under ordinary conditions.

The remedy for this difficulty is being applied at Tufts by the segregation of the sexes, separate classes for the boys and girls, but the same teachers. That system has all along been in use at Harvard and Radcliffe. This solution is now being suggested for general application to the public schools.

Dr. Thompson has in mind an extension of the idea. He believes that it would be advisable not only to segregate the pupils into classes of boys only and classes of girls only, but to have only women teach the girls and only men teach the boys. This plan, of course, applies only to high school students. It should be added, however, that this plan is only tentative in Dr. Thompson's mind, and has not been definitely broached for action in Alameda.

But Dr. Thompson has another plan for achieving the desired result of more masculine influence upon the boys of the Alameda High School. Here again it is necessary to digress for a few paragraphs to show how he has brought this matter to the public.

In his desire to bring about a closer relation between the faculty and the parents of the students, Dr. Thompson initiated the plan of having "conferences" with the parents. These conferences are in vogue elsewhere, but they are usually limited to the mothers of the children. Dr. Thompson felt here, as before, the necessity of the masculine influence. He therefore invited both the fathers and the mothers to his conferences. They have been enthusiastically successful. Between 200 and 300 parents attend these gatherings in the assembly room of the high school, and take a lively interest in the discussions that are broached. Dr. Thompson presides, and follows a program which he has previously prepared, discussion of the papers that are read being open to the house.

At one of these conferences a paper was read on "What Students Do Outside of School Hours." Statistics had been gathered by personal inquiry, showing what percentage of spare time was devoted by high school students to recreation, to reading, to study, or to mere loafing. These figures showed that the percentages were heaviest at the two extremes—either students studied too much out of school hours or made sheer waste of their time. The happy medium of those who divided their time properly between study, intelligent amusement and equally intelligent exercise was represented by a very small percentage.

This paper aroused much discussion among the parents, and several remedies were proposed. At length it occurred to Dr. Thompson that a pet idea of his own was applicable to this problem, and he took the floor to explain it. This was his plan:

To build a gymnasium on some lot accessible to all parts of the city, and equip it with all the necessary modern apparatus, including a swimming pool and shower baths, handball and basketball courts, and the like. In addition, to furnish club rooms, in which there should be facilities for all innocent amusements, such as pool, billiards, chess, checkers, and reading. To make the active membership of the club all the boys of high school age. To have an associate membership of any other boys or men who cared to join. To make the active members responsible for the conduct of the club, and to have them elect a board of control empowered to pass on the fitness of applicants for membership. To vest the financial control of the club property in the hands of some body of citizens distinguished enough to give the institution the confidence and support of the public.

This plan was discussed and its substance heartily endorsed. One citizen present offered the ground rent of lots for twenty years as a contribution to the plan. The final result was the passage of a resolution calling on Dr. Thompson to appoint a committee to sift plans and prepare a final scheme for later consideration. This committee, through a subcommittee consisting of Major Tilden, Mr. Baker, Mr. Politeo, Mr. Cooley, Dr. Thompson and Mr. Randolph, has now recommended that the following report be made the basis of future work on the plan:

"The committee on the Young Men's Club House and Gymnasium met at the Bank of Alameda, Saturday night, April 30th, and, according to the instructions under which they were appointed, went over the ground very thoroughly with an idea of determining the best plan for such an institution. The committee went into every detail and tried to cover all the points as thoroughly as they could. The general points which came up for discussion fell under the following heads:

"First—Under whose authority should such a clubhouse be established?

"Second—What should be the nature of such a clubhouse as to its uses and membership?

"Third—How shall the finances be raised?

"Under the first head we discussed the advisability of establishing (1) the Young Men's Christian Association, (2) the Columbia Park Boys' Club, (3) the club with no special object further than social, (4) the Gymnasium Clubhouse idea or Civic Center.

"It was generally felt that the Y. M. C. A. would not meet the conditions thoroughly in Alameda. We felt that our clubhouse should be on slightly different lines and possibly somewhat broader in its membership.

"The Columbia Park Boys' Club idea likewise seemed to be somewhat foreign to the general plan upon which we started; and we did not believe would meet the conditions in Alameda. This feature, however, might be added later if the scheme which we have recommended met with approval.

"Likewise, it was felt by all of your committee that the clubhouse for purely social purposes and not connected with any definite organization, such as the Y. M. C. A., but under a board of control, might in the beginning be very enthusiastically accepted, but later would fall into disuse. And so we were forced to the fourth proposition brought before us, namely, the Gymnasium-Clubhouse idea combined; and we therefore recommend:

"First—The establishment of a gymnasium under the authority of the Board of Education. In this way its permanency will be insured, and the confidence of the people in its usefulness will be beyond question.

"Second—That the gymnasium clubhouse be built upon the high school lot or some lot adjoining, and be made to fit in with the plans for the future expansion of the high school.

"Third—That this gymnasium should be used during the day by all of the high school students, both boys and girls, as a regular gymnasium. That everyone who comes to our high school should be examined by a competent physical examiner, and required to take those gymnastic exercises that are necessary for their best physical development; and that gymnasium instructors be employed in connection with the high school.

"Fourth—That the gymnasium clubhouse should be used by the young men of Alameda, after school hours and during the evening. And that membership in such a club should not be confined to high school students, but might be extended to post-graduates, any student who had ever attended the high school, and other young men of the city, whether high school students or not. It was also suggested that associate members of older men might be admitted; and that such a club might become something in the nature of a Civic Center, such as are springing up in Rochester and all over the East.

"Fifth—That the management of this club should be in the hands of the young men them-

(Concluded on Page 415.)

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

By Right of Our Fathers' Might

What was the thing that our fathers sought at Lexington that day?
What was the prize that their valor bought ere their lifeblood ebbed away?
What was the gift that they handed down from patriot sire to son?
The blessing of blessings beyond renown that their splendid service won?
'Twas not to start at a whistle's toot
Or sound of an engine bell;
'Twas not to crawl in a magnate's suit
Or a combine's vassals swell.
But 'twas liberty, liberty, that they sought, the gift of the great, white God,
And they held it naught, as for it they fought,
that their life-blood stained the sod.
And we, who are sons of these heroes old, how do we hold the prize
That they bought for us where the red blood welled 'neath the arch of the azure skies?
What do we do with Freedom's name, the name that they loved so well?
Is it our honor, or is it our shame, the tale that the swift years tell?
Oh, some do start at a whistle's toot,
And some for an engine bell,
And some would kiss the toe of the boot
That tramples them down to hell;
But liberty, liberty—God of Light, all broken and shamed are we,
Yet we swear by right of our fathers' might that our children shall be free.

Woman's Intellectual Place

Some time ago I wrote—rather satirically, I suspect—for The California Weekly, a brief disquisition on the subject of man's self-heralded intellectual superiority over woman. The Christian Science Monitor pleasantly introduces and republishes the article, at the same time, filing the following exception:

"One would concede on the other side of the argument, however, that there is certain evidence of the slower development of masculine intelligence as applied to book lore."

The Monitor is right; there is evidence, and a great deal of it, of the slower development of masculine intelligence as applied to book lore. But why confine the assertion to book lore? Is it not rather disingenuous, at least, to admit woman's intellectual superiority just as long as statistical comparison is possible, and then, as soon as such comparison no longer is possible, contend that man is the intellectual superior? Granted that man's intellect develops more slowly, have you not noticed that not infrequently it develops so much more slowly that it never catches up?

This is an age of wonders, and most tremendous of them all, it seems to me, is the intellectual advancement which woman has made in hardly more than a half century. Through countless generations she was, because of physical inferiority, held as either plaything or slave for man. Then the silken or iron bonds were loosed, and, almost before we realize what is taking place, she stands as man's intellectual rival, sometimes his superior, often his equal, rarely his inferior, in nearly all vocations wherein mind counts. She has produced no Shakespeare, they say. No, and it took man a hundred or a thousand generations to produce just one "sweet Will." If she had produced such an one in but two or three generations it would have been not a wonder merely, but a miracle.

Clubs for mental self-improvement, those organizations which are calculated to hold to the truth that there is something better than dollars or dress in this world—is their membership composed of men or women? Far more than men, women are endeavoring to elevate the intellectual standards of our age; men being too intent upon grubbing for dollars and more dollars, lost in the lure of the fire-gilt game.

Woman man's intellectual inferior! Why, her mental progress—from abject dependence to splendid independence—within two generations puts to shame, by comparison, all that man has done in any ten generations that could be named.

The Opinions of Rufus

Haste makes waste. Prob'ly that's the reason why a fat woman hardly ever seems to hurry.

I don't s'pose the Almighty would ask anything better fer some folks than that they'd be es careful of their character es they are of their repytashun.

Christianity's consider'ble like muscle—don't amount to much if it don't git exercised.

Their's lies an' they's 'quivocations, the difference mainly dependin' on whether your neighbor tells it or you do.

"Reason is the life of the law;" an', consid'rin' the amount an' quality of it that she's fed in some of our statutes an' court decisions, I don't wonder that the poor creecher's lookin' kind o' peaked lately.

I reckon that lookin'-glasses wouldn't be es much in demand es they are if we hadn't all of us got so used to seein' fools that we don't mind it much.

I've 'most made up my mind that if a feller's got nothin' to say it's 'bout es well not to say it—but lots of campaign orators an' other authorities don't agree with me.

Josh Bings says that sence he's known a self-made rich man that was unselfish, he's willin' to concede that the grace of the Lord can work any miracle.

They had a May Day picnic back East where I was born, but they had to give it up 'cause the thoughtless little boys took to snowballin' the Queen.

I s'pose the feller that said they's reason in all things would have admitted that a hen settin' on a doorknob strained it consider'ble.

With most of us the Golden Rule an' a rainbow are a good deal alike—more likely to be admired frum a distance than any other way.

The Kiss Unstrained

(A Harvard professor—may his tribe increase!—declares that scientists have erred recently in asserting that bacilli hold their chief conventions on ruby lips, thus making kissing a dangerous exercise.)

Oh, the kiss unstrained, and the kiss unpaired
By fear of the dread bacilli,
The kind we got when our blood was hot.

Or, at least, it was far from chilly.
Ah, the maiden was sweet, and the maiden was fair,

And we never once thought that bacilli were there.

For her lips were red, and I would not suggest

By bacilli and bugs they were all-possessed.

But the doctors did,—
Oh my! Oh fie!—

And I'm glad to hear
That they told a lie,

Oh, the kiss unstrained, and the kiss maintained

In spite of the doctors' warning,
The kiss elate at her father's gate

Some time 'twixt the eve and morning.
Ah, I saw her home—'twas a lang syne

night—
For the meetin' was done, and she said I might,

And her lips were so red—well, if germs were there,

I think that I proved that I did not care.

Then 'rah for the doctor,
Big-souled, big-brained,

Who says that a kiss
Need never be strained!

A Conversation in the Garden

Adam Glavis—You picked the apple; you know you did.

Eve Ballinger—I—I—well, I'm standing on my rights.

"I saw you pick it."
"I don't care; I'm standing on them."

"What are they?"
"The Keeper of the Garden has issued me a certificate of good character."

"It is dated before the apple tree was planted."

"I—boo-hoo!—I'm standing on my rights."

Cheap Chickens Some Time Ago

Unconscious humor is the richest of humor, and the very quintessence of unconscious humor is that which is displayed when crass ignorance would pose as erudition. Witness the following sparkling gem which was culled from that most unlikely of places, a poultry advertisement:

"One of our secrets of success is to save all chicks fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick, and believed to be the secret of the Ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen."

The ancient Egyptians sold chicks at "10 cents a dozen" and so did the Chinese, although I consider it highly probable that either or both of the ancient peoples may sometimes have referred to the price of the Egyptian or Chinese chickens as a dime or a short bit. Here's erudition on a runaway horse, information out for a joy ride, but it is no use to talk about it; if "the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen" does not strike the reader as funny, words cannot make it so.

Great Excitement in London

London, May 14.—Much interest is excited in political circles by the news that William Randolph Hearst and Theodore Roosevelt will arrive in London next week.—As published, with a flourish of corresponding headlines, in the papers owned by Mr. Hearst.

A wee, little bug—but I much dislike
To mention its name; I sure do, Mike!—
Once journeyed a bit with a traveler where
The man was on foot and the bug in his hair,
And they came to a burg which in grandeur arose—

The man didn't know of the bug, I suppose.
Then the Bugville Self-Scratcher ('twas owned by the bug),

With many a smirk and with many a shrug,
Announced to its readers—it took a "scarce-head"—

The fact that I quote in the words that they read:

"The city of cities awaits in amaze
The honor that's coming to gladden its days,
There's thrill in the daytime, there's tremor
at night,

And everyone's waiting expectantly, quite
There are some hold their breath, and some hit the booze,

And some the high places, because of the news
Which nothing suppresses, and nothing can drown,

That William R. Bug and the man are in town."

Just the Thing for Fatima's Hat

Fatima, the Beauteous One, sat upon the housetop and gazed longingly upon Halley's comet.

"It is beautiful," she murmured to herself, "oh, it is beautiful! It would be just the thing. I wonder if—if—"

Her words ceased, but she still thought deeply.

"Of what are you thinking, Pride of the Orient?" the Sultan inquired.

"Am I indeed your treasure?" she tenderly murmured.

"You bet you are! If you could see the bills you never would doubt it."

"Have you noticed the comet? How lovely it is! Its tail is so graceful and sweeping, and—oh, Mohammed, it would be just the size and just the thing to decorate my new hat, and no other woman would have anything exactly like it, and—"

But—would you believe it?—the brute refused to get it for her.

Buddleigh says he fell in love with Miss Bjings at first sight.

"Yes?"

"Yes, but he fell out again."

"When?"

"At the second sight."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Labor's Legislators The Law and Legisla- As Labor Sees Them tive Committee of the San Francisco Labor

Council has made a report touching the conduct of labor's legislators in the last session of the Legislature of California, or such of them as were sent up from San Francisco. Forty-three measures, in all, were taken as tests of legislative loyalty to labor's interests, although in the Senate only 35 were available for making the test. Judged from labor's point of view, Marc Anthony made a score of 33 good votes out of a possible 35; Eddie Wolfe, 29; Finn, Hare and Kennedy, each 21; Welch made a score of 18; Burnett, 19 good votes and one bad; the irrepressible Gus Hartman, 15 good and one bad; Reilly, 13 good and one bad.

In the Assembly there were 39 votes available for making a test and, according to labor's view, Beatty cast 37 good votes; Callan, 35; Nelson, 33; Cullen, 29; Macauley, 28; Gerdes, 27; Pugh, 26; Wheelan, 25; O'Neill, 24; Black, 21; Collum, 20; Hopkins, 15; Lightner, 20 good and one bad; McManus, 21 good and 2 bad; Coghan, 4 good and 4 bad; Beban, 16 good and 4 bad; Schmidt, 14 good and 5 bad; Perine, 24 good and 6 bad. Very much depends on the point of view, but, considering labor's point of view as reasonable, the above record will be hard to get away from.

Legislative Soldiering Laying aside, for the Under Condemnation moment, labor's es- pecial point of view, not too much can be said in commendation of this committee's censuring of absenteeism in legislative work. In going over the above record, for instance, it will be noted that, adding the good votes to the bad and subtracting from the whole number of test votes, leaves, in many cases, a wide margin of votes unaccounted for. In these cases the members either dodged deliberately or, from one cause or another, were absent from their places when the votes were taken. There is the case of the eloquent Coghan, for instance, who, according to the view of the committee, voted right 4 times, wrong 4 times and not at all 31 times. Beban is recorded as voting right 16 times, wrong 4 times and not at all 19 times, whereas Beatty lost only two chances to vote and Callan only four during the session. "Day after day," says the report, "during the largest portion of the session, a bare majority of members in each house, just sufficient to constitute a quorum, transact all the legislative business on the principle of unanimous consent. Moreover, this bare majority is constantly changing in personnel through the practice of members repeatedly flitting in and out of the chamber, in and out of the record, in fitful variety, very few remaining steadily at their post of duty. We believe that from the standpoint of public interest faithful attendance at legislative sessions is above all things desired from the men who make our laws." There are occasional excuses for being absent and not voting, but where, in the above cases, the discrepancy between possible votes and votes recorded exceeds five or six, the non-votes should be counted as bad votes.

A False and Narrow View For labor to judge of the con- duct of labor legislators solely by the way they voted on labor legislation is to take a false and narrow view of the responsibility of such legislators. No legislator can be true to labor who is untrue to the broader interests of the general public. Such a legislator will make enemies for labor in that broader constituency to which we all belong. Mr. Franklin Hichborn, in his "Story of the California Legislature of 1909," has judged these same men by a broader and more righteous standard. It will be instructive to institute comparison between the two standards.

Out of a possible 16 votes for Progress and Reform in the Senate, Marc Anthony voted right 7 times, wrong 8 and was absent once; Senator Wolfe voted right 3 times and wrong 13; Finn voted wrong 15 times and was absent once; Hare voted right 3 times, wrong 10 and was absent 3 times; Kennedy voted right 5 times, wrong 10 and was absent once; Welch voted right 4 times, wrong 9 and was absent 3; Burnett voted right 5 times, wrong 7 and was absent 4; Gus Hartman made 16 straight wrong hits; Reilly, 12 wrong, 2 right and 2 absent.

Mr. Hichborn's Assembly test comprises eleven measures of vital public importance. On these Beatty voted right 6 times, wrong 3 and was absent 2; Callan voted right the whole eleven test votes; Nelson voted right 4 times and wrong 7; Cullen voted wrong 9 times and was absent 2; Macauley voted wrong 10 times and was absent once; Gerdes voted right 9 times, wrong once and was absent once; Pugh voted wrong 8 times, right once and was absent twice; Wheelan voted right 2, wrong 5, absent 4; O'Neill voted right 2, wrong 7, absent 2; Black voted right 2, wrong 7, absent 2; Collum voted right 4 times, wrong 5 and was absent 2; Hopkins voted right once, wrong 4 times and was absent 6; Lightner voted right 7 times, wrong 3 and was absent once; McManus voted wrong 10 times and was absent once; the eloquent and unstable Coghan voted right 2, wrong 8 and absent one; Beban voted 10 times wrong and was absent once; Schmidt voted right 2, wrong 6 and was absent 3; Perine voted right 4 times, wrong 5 and was absent twice.

Our fellow citizens among those who labor with their hands will find the Hichborn record much the safer one to apply to their representatives. Voting at enmity to Progress and Reform is not a good way to make friends for the cause of labor, and California has a right to expect a higher order of men, representative of labor, than have heretofore been commissioned to Sacramento by the labor vote of San Francisco, although some of them, as the Hichborn record shows, have done exceedingly well.

Especially Remarkable At the Fairmont Hotel, Friday evening of last week, a banquet was given by the Unitarian Club in honor of the presence in the city of the Pacific Unitarian Association. There were in the neighborhood of 150 guests present, some doubtless from outside the State and so not participating in the expression of political sentiment within California. There were 126 votes cast and, for once, all the ladies present were permitted to cast their votes and have them counted. It would be unwarranted to say that the results of a straw ballot taken in this selected assemblage of men and women would be indicative of the sentiment of men throughout the State, but it is not too much to claim for it that it does represent the sentiments of similar groups of men and women of the highest intelligence, culture and moral purpose as related to public life. It would not be easy to get together in all California a group of persons equal in number ranking higher in all that makes for good citizenship. In fact, it probably could not be done without combing the State with that purpose alone in view. Well, here is the vote: Bell, 3; Anderson, 4; Curry, 4; scattering, 3; Hiram Johnson, 112. Is it not remarkable that such unanimity of sentiment should be found in any assemblage of persons, outside of a Johnson club, however called together? And yet this assemblage was brought together with not the remotest relation to the pending campaign. Hiram Johnson represents not alone the better element in our political life, but The Best element wherever that element may be brought together.

The Crooked Made Straight Dr. David Starr Jordan has been a consistent Republican for twenty-five years, as he himself says, voting his party ticket straight, but he makes it straight by scratching all the crooked Republicans off it and putting straight Democrats on in their places, if there are straight Democrats from whom he may select. If there are not, then he votes for the Democrat, anyhow, because he does not wish his own party to be burdened with the responsibility of a crooked man in office. When party patriotism reaches this degree of fidelity in the minds of all voters it will be seldom that any voter will be required, in good conscience, to scratch his party ticket in order to make it a straight party ticket. It will be recognized by everybody that to put a crooked candidate on a ballot will be to invite his being slaughtered without any greater remorse than was exhibited by the famed king of the cannibal islands.

Alameda's Ordinarily the election of coroner Coroner of a county is a county affair, but when the contest for such an office involves elemental decencies of political life the issue transcends county boundaries. It is so in Alameda. No one dare say that the influence of Coroner Tisdale in the political life of Alameda county is exerted for good. On the other hand, no one dare say that the influence of Dr. T. B. Holmes, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League candidate, is ever exerted for anything that is not good. The issue between Dr. Holmes and Dr. Tisdale is an issue as plain as between white and black, good and evil, Right Things vs. Wrong. There can be no extenuation, excuse, palliation or apology made by the Republicans of Alameda county if they fail of making the nomination of Doctor Holmes well nigh unanimous.

Not Ritter, There is talk of bringing out Ed- But Silver ward M. Ritter, an attorney at Sunol, for the Republican nomination for assemblyman for the forty-sixth district. Mr. Ritter may be a good man for all that The Watchman knows to the contrary, but that district was well represented in the last legislature by Thomas H. Silver. He got off wrong once or twice in the voting, but the best men in the assembly learned to appreciate his good intentions, and it will be safer to send him back than to try to break in a new man.

The League The non-partisan character of For Shaw the influence of the Lincoln- Roosevelt Republican League, in relation to judicial candidacies, is well exemplified in the case of Justice Victor E. Shaw, of the second appellate court district. Justice Shaw obtained his nomination at the hands of the "organization" forces at the Santa Cruz convention, of unsavory memory, but he has made good on the bench, which is the crucial test, and the League in that district will put up no candidate against him.

Weed Must Senator Abner Weed, from the Be Beaten Second District, must be defeated for re-election. He is a materialist in business and politics, uninspired by any of the progressive ideals of modern life. In his capacity as a lumberman he slashes the forests for all there is in them, with no thought of any duty to society or to posterity. As a Senator, he swallows machine program whole and cheerfully, not through any innate dishonesty, but because his bent of mind makes him at home with the crowd that "fixes these things up in a business way." He is out of place and out of date in the present era of moralizing business and politics, with a mind as unfertile and unresponsive as unleavened bread. In the Legislature his record has been consistently bad. In district politics he has played the worst kind of "practical" politics. It was he who ran a trainload of Greeks in on a Republican primary to defeat a decent man a few years ago. Which suggests that his opponents had better make sure that there is a free election and a fair count when he runs this time.

Men Who May The men who are being Go Against Him urged by reform Repub- licans in Weed's district to make the race against him are W. W. Barham and H. R. Raynes. One or the other of these men will probably be induced to try the issue. Whichever goes up, he should be supported against Weed. And if Weed wins the Repub-

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

Republican primary it is the plain duty of every Republican who recognizes a moral obligation toward society to support, at the final election, anybody short of a scalawag that the Democrats may nominate. The probable Democratic nominee is Charles J. Luttrell of Siskiyou County, who is one of the best products of the Democratic party, and infinitely preferable to Weed. Another Democrat mentioned is T. W. H. Shanahan of Redding, Shasta County. Shanahan is less desirable. Politically he is worn out.

Assemblyman In the Sixth The Sixth Assembly District contest for the lower house of the Legislature is taking shape in the probable candidacies of W. D. L. Held as Republican and J. E. Pemberton as Democratic candidate. Held is a puzzle. In the Legislature he has thrown his vote and his influence for good and for evil with such impartiality as to baffle the judgment of both his friends and his enemies. Pemberton is the man who wrote the model anti-saloon ordinance now in force in Mendocino County. Formerly the Royal Arch got out an injunction to stop every proposed election on the question of regulating the liquor traffic, and the saloon influence in politics was feared. Under Pemberton's ordinance, the securing of the signatures of 25 per cent. of the voters of the county to a request for such an election automatically compels the saloons to close until they have secured an equal number of signatures to a petition calling for an election to determine whether or not they may open again. The saloons have been dodging this club ever since it was fashioned, and their political influence is now relatively small. So much can be said to the credit of Mr. Pemberton.

Hoping Chandler May Run Again The progressive Republicans of Fresno county outside of the city of Fresno—that is, the Sixtieth Assembly District—are urging that either W. F. Chandler or Newton Johnson be their candidate for the Assembly. The Watchman does not know Mr. Johnson, but the proponents of his candidacy are sufficient guarantee that his character is right for the job. But the Watchman does know Mr. Chandler, both personally and by his record, and unhesitatingly affirms that there is no better man in public life in California today. He is aggressively honest, intelligently progressive, and one of the ablest men in the State. His record in three previous terms in the Legislature is without spot and is that of a leader for Right Things. The Sixtieth District is at present represented by a political cipher who merely happens to be also a Democrat. That district is normally Republican, and went to Mr. Odom only because of a temporary breeze of resentment at Coalinga over the matter of county division. It should be returned to the Republican column this year, but especially it should be represented by a man, like Mr. Chandler, who is representative of progressive political ideals.

W. A. Sutherland In the Sixty-first The Fresno city district—Sixty-first Assembly District—may offer W. A. Sutherland as a successor to A. M. Drew, who aspires to the Senate. Mr. Sutherland is a young attorney who is associated in business and politics with the progressive Republican element now in control of the Republican party in Fresno. He has no political record, but his personal record is good. He has intelligence and character, and could be counted on to stand right in the Legislature.

Morgenstirn Has Been Endorsed Alfred L. Morgenstirn of Alameda has been endorsed by the Alameda Good Government Republican Club as candidate for the Republican nomination for Assemblyman from the Forty-seventh District, and is now making an active canvass in opposition to Sumner Crosby. Morgenstirn is a clean, forthright progressive, and has the right backing. The man whom he hopes to succeed is Frank Otis, who may be endorsed next Wednesday for Senator from that district.

Democratic State Central Committee The Democrats have not taken up the matter of candidates for the State Board of Equalization, but Albert M. Smith of Oroville is prominently mentioned in the northern district, and Thomas O. Toland of Ventura in the southern. Nobody has appeared in the lists as yet from San Francisco. It is possible that other candidates will be discussed informally at the meeting of the Democratic State Central Committee in San Francisco next Monday. This meeting is called to comply with the provision of the direct primary law which requires the State central committee of every party to call a State convention to be held after the candidates have been nominated. But naturally a good deal of politics will be done on the side at the meeting.

Johnson Meetings The Independent Republicans of Healdsburg met Wednesday evening and organized for local work in the interest of Hiram Johnson's candidacy for governor. A similar meeting was held at Sebastopol last night. Tonight Hiram Johnson addresses a mass meeting at Santa Rosa.

Why Edw. Rolkin Was Endorsed The endorsement of Edward Rolkin for member of the State Board of Equalization from the first district, given by the Central Executive Committee of the Independent Republican Clubs of San Francisco, has called forth some criticism. This criticism is based on the assertion that Mr. Rolkin was a Ruef man and that he supported McCarthy in the last election. The first assertion is simply untrue. Mr. Rolkin voted against Schmitz three times. The story of his support of Ruef arose from the fact that the notorious fire commissioner Parry was in charge of the Winchester, one of the Rolkin hotels, at that time. But Parry merely leased the hotel from Mr. Rolkin, and they had no other connection. Mr. Rolkin did support McCarthy in the last election—and soon regretted it after McCarthy's election—but that support was perfunctory. His real interest in the last campaign was the election of Francis J. Heney, whom he ardently supported to the end. Aside from those things, on the question of fitness, Mr. Rolkin was endorsed for three reasons: His extraordinary reputation for honesty and fair-dealing, his great business ability and experience, and the fact that he was by all odds the best of the candidates in the field. His two opponents are Scott and Graybill. Scott was a Ruef man of the most vicious type, and a most unsatisfactory person for such an office—or any office, for that matter. Graybill is the "mayor of Cow Hollow," and is as deficient in ability as Scott is in qualifications of another sort. Mr. Rolkin is a self-made man of ability and honesty. Hence his endorsement.

E. O. Miller Will Not Run It was not always that State Senator E. O. Miller could be counted on to stand firmly for Right Things in the political, commercial or social life of state or community, but with that development of character which attends growth and added years, E. O. Miller has come to view life and its problems from a different vantage ground, with the result that his term in the state senate has been of great value to the state and a credit to the thirty-second senatorial district comprising the counties of Tulare, Kings and Kern. His only serious error in the last session was in voting for the change of venue bill, to be accounted for on the ground that he has, during his professional career, been called upon to defend many persons criminally charged and has perhaps come to be imbued with the conviction that all the odds should be in favor of the defendant. Senator Miller's many friends will learn with regret that his health has so suffered of late that he does not feel equal to making a campaign and therefore, after having announced his candidacy, renounced it and has gone to the springs that he may recuperate his strength and health. He is a man of fine mental endowments and he will be missed.

E. O. Larkins To Take E. O. Miller's Position Reports from the thirty-second senatorial district give encouragement to the hope that E. O. Larkins of Visalia may consent to enter the race for the Republican nomination as candidate to succeed E. O. Miller in the state senate, Miller having been a Democrat. Mr. Larkins is a fellow townsman and practitioner at the bar with Miller, and is in every way worthy to succeed him. He also is able and all his life he has stood for Right Things. He is so independent as not always to take program, even if he has had a hand in making it, but was never known to lack the courage of his convictions. He is a good lawyer, a good citizen and, if nominated and elected, will make a valuable legislator, but he has all his life been so disinclined to accept political responsibilities, in the way of office, that The Watchman will not feel sure of his candidacy until he shall have announced it and entered upon his campaign. He is comfortably circumstanced without being rich, has reached the maturity of his powers and, as we see it, owes a duty to the commonwealth and community that he can discharge in no better way than by announcing his candidacy and entering upon it with zeal. He is an all-right man for the place.

Working On John D. Works John D. Works, Lincoln Roosevelt Republican League candidate for Republican endorsement for the United States senate, is a man of independent mind. He has said and written much on public affairs, and he has kept up with the times. It is possible to take the writings and sayings of any such man and, comparing them with other writings and sayings, find inconsistencies in them. This is possible with any growing man, any man who is wiser today than he was yesterday. The only man who is immune from that form of attack is the one who waits with his mouth shut tight until some boss or leader emits a sound that he may echo, until the "straight dope" is passed out from the head of some political bureau. And they are working on Judge Works! Of course it is covertly done. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is to be fought from the underbrush and not in the open, by starting injurious rumors, confessedly as rumors, but starting them often in diverse places. It is the policy of "whispering down," and if it can be followed by the aid of putative friends to the progressive movement so much the more effective. To all of which The Watchman wishes to say that John D. Works is an independent thinker, a courageous and independent-minded worker in the cause of right, and if he has had opinions of his own, and the courage to express them, even in superabundance, he will, when he goes to Washington, so supplement the lack in this particular of our senior United States senator as to raise the general average for our senatorial delegation materially and beneficially.

CARNATION WHEAT FLAKES

For Breakfast and Dessert

Pacific Cereal Association

Bay and Taylor Sts.

San Francisco

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly

IS PRINTED BY

Donaldson & Moir

PRINTERS

330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

The Complete Text of the

REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

26 Montgomery St.

San Francisco

CALIFORNIANS STUDYING EUGENICS

Says the New York Sun.

Eugenics, for some time a much used word in England, is coming into its own over here. Recently a national society to promote the study of the science has been formed. At its head is the Association of Collegiate Alumnae, which is composed of about 5000 members, who will test the law of heredity by an investigation by its members of their antecedents back three generations or more.

The national organization committee which met recently in Cincinnati is made up of Alexander Graham Bell, Luther Burbank, W. E. Castle, C. R. Henderson, A. Hardicks, R. H. Johnson, V. L. Kellogg, Adolph Meyer, J. Archer Thompson, W. L. Tower, H. J. Webster, Frederick A. Woods, C. B. Davenport and David Starr Jordan, president of Leland Stanford University. Dr. Jordan is chairman of the committee, whose chief object is to collect data to be used in the study of human heredity.

The committee has prepared record blanks which can be procured from Dr. Charles Benedict Davenport, Cold Spring Harbor, N. Y., in which information is asked concerning certain characteristics of a family for three or more generations. The questions asked refer to place of birth, residence, occupation, disease, death, personal characteristics, etc., of the recipient, his parents and grandparents. It is said that so far some long steps have been taken toward producing the future perfect man.

A few of the aims and objects of eugenics and what it really is as a science are thus outlined:

Eugenics is the science which deals with all the influences that improve the unborn qualities of a race—also with those which develop them to the utmost advantage. Qualities include health, manliness, energy, ability and courteous disposition.

The aim of eugenics is to bring as many influences as can be reasonably employed to cause the useful classes in the community to contribute more than their proportion to the next generation.

Historical inquiry into rates with which the various classes of society have contributed to the population at various times in ancient and modern nations.

Systematic collection of facts showing the circumstances under which large and thriving families have most frequently originated. Families may be considered large which have not less than three adult male children.

Eugenic belief extends the function of philanthropy into future generations; it renders its action more pervading than hitherto by dealing with families and society in their entirety and it enforces the importance of the marriage covenant by directing serious attention to the probable quality of the future offspring. It brings the tie of kinship into prominence and strongly encourages love and interest in family and in race. In brief, eugenics is a virile creed full of hopefulness and appealing to many of the noblest feelings of our nature.

The first meeting of a committee of eugenics in New York City was held recently at the home of Mrs. John H. Huddleston, 145 West Seventy-eighth street, at which the record blanks were circulated among the members for the purpose, as one woman present said, "of setting about to dissect our ancestors."

Dr. Jordan and Mr. Burbank are both deeply interested in eugenics and have advocated it in the lecture field. In speaking of the subject, which he has very much at heart, Dr. Jordan says:

"Three years ago I was made chairman of the committee on eugenics of the American Breeders' Association. The purpose of this committee is to gather facts and to diffuse information which should be helpful in aiding future generations to be well born.

"The laws of heredity, all of them, in all their details, apply to men as well as to lower animals. The results of experience and education are not inherited in any degree, but each child is the son or daughter of what his or her father or mother ought to have been, barring such disease as may injure or destroy early nutrition or development, irrespective of heredity.

"A large number of facts and laws are already known, and it is part of the work of our committee to put these facts into circulation for the use of the people. Of course it is not possible to take the human race in hand, as Burbank takes the cactus, and by breeding superior individuals make a race of superior men.

"In the first place individuals who would allow themselves to be thus handled and manipulated would not be superior. The two highest elements are power of initiative and power to love, and both these would be bred out by a race of artificially handled 'supermen.'

"The line of investigation indicated in the blanks was started by the secretary of this committee, Dr. Benedict. These blanks were drawn up by him—undertaken on his own account but in behalf of the committee. While personally I had nothing to do with them or with the results of his investigation, I am in hopes that some important facts may be deduced from them."

When asked for an expression on eugenics, Mr. Burbank sends it under the heading, "The Training of the Human Plant." In part, he says:

"In the course of many years of investigation into the plant life of the world, creating new forms, modifying old ones, adapting others to new conditions and blending still others, I have constantly been impressed with the similarity between the organization and development of plant life and human life. While I have never lost sight of the principle of the survival of the fittest and all that it implies as an explanation of the development and progress of plant life, I have come to find in the crossing of species and in selection wisely directed a great and powerful instrument for the transformation of the vegetable kingdom along lines that lead constantly upward. The crossing of species is to me paramount. Upon it, wisely directed and accompanied by a rigid selection of the best and a rigid exclusion of the poorest, rests the hope of all progress.

"Before passing to the consideration of the adaption of the principles of plant cultivation in a more or less modified form to the human being, let me lay emphasis on the opportunity now presented in the United States for the observing and, if we are wise, aiding in what I think it fair to say, is the grandest opportunity ever presented of developing the finest race the world has ever known out of the vast mingling of races brought here by immigration.

"There is not a single attribute which, lacking in a plant, may not be bred into it. Choose what improvement you wish in a flower, a fruit or a tree and by crossing, selection and persistence you can fix this desirable trait irrevocably. Pick out any trait you want in your child, granted that he is a normal child, be it honesty, fairness, purity, loveliness, industry, thrift, what not.

"By surrounding this child with the sunshine from the sky and your own heart, by giving the closest communication with nature, by feeding him well balanced nutritious food, by giving him all that is implied in healthful environmental influences, and by doing all in love, you can thus cultivate in this child and fix there for all his life all these traits. Heredity will make itself felt first and as in a plant under improvement there will be certain strong tendencies to revert to former ancestral traits, but in the main with the normal child you can give him all these traits by persistently, patiently guiding him in these early formative years.

"Heredity is simply the sum of all the effects of all the environments of all past generations in the responsive, ever moving life forces," says Mr. Burbank. "Put a boy born of gentle white parents among Indians and he will grow up like an Indian, showing that no matter what birth may be environment is everything. As time goes on its endless course environment must crystallize the American nation; its varying elements will become unified and the weeding out process will, by means of environment, influence and selection, leave the finest human product ever known."

Miss Celia Haag is deputy tax collector of Carlyle, Ill. Her father is the collector, having just been re-elected for his third term. Though Miss Haag is only 22, she has had entire charge of the financial end of her father's business for several years and is said to give such satisfaction as deputy collector that the voters of Carlyle refuse to consider her father's opponent for the office.

IMPENDING CHANGES IN THE CONSTITUTION

INEVITABLE READJUSTMENT OF FRAMEWORK OF GOVERNMENT TO MODERN CONDITIONS.

By WARREN OLNEY, JR.

President Woodrow Wilson, in his collection of lectures entitled, "Constitutional Government in the United States," speaking of the relation of the States to the Federal Government, says: "The general lines of definition which were to run between the powers granted to Congress and the powers reserved to the States the makers of the Constitution were able to draw with their characteristic foresight and lucidity * * *. It is clear enough that the general commercial interests, the general financial interests, the general economic interests of the country were meant to be brought under the regulation of the Federal Government which should act for all."

Most of you, I imagine, will off-hand agree with this statement. It represents your first impression of the sphere of our Federal Government. In fact, you would probably go further than President Wilson, who subsequently modifies his statement, and say that it is the sphere of the Federal Government to regulate such matters as pertain to and uniformly affect the whole country. You might even, although not so probably, say that the province of our State governments is in general the regulation of local matters.

Theoretical Rights of the States

Yet emphatically this is not the legal theory of our institutions. The functions of the Federal Government have no such general scope as that which Mr. Wilson's statement would indicate. Matters of commerce, of business, or property, of non-political crimes, of social and domestic relations, all these, except in a few instances, belong not to the Federal Government but to the States, no matter how universal the subject may be or how desirable that it be regulated by laws harmonious and uniform over the whole country. The subjects with which in theory the Federal Government has to do are comparatively few in number and are chiefly political. Madison, in the Federalist, expresses the idea as follows: "The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are reserved to the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on exterior objects, as war, peace, negotiations, and foreign commerce, with which last the power of taxation will for the most part be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which in the ordinary course of affairs concern the lives, liberties and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement and prosperity of the State." This language is borne out by even the most casual examination of the Federal Constitution.

At the risk of being commonplace and wearisome to the lawyers and to all who have given the subject any consideration, I am going, for the sake of emphasis hereafter, to give a little further attention to the limited character of the functions of our National Government.

Theoretical Limits of Federal Power

The rule, thoroughly established by the decisions of the courts, is that the Federal Constitution is fundamentally a grant of powers to the Federal Government. Beyond these powers, and such as are properly implied as incidental to their full enjoyment, the Federal Government cannot go. It is not, as are the State governments, a repository of general powers which do not have to be affirmatively granted in order to be possessed. A State legislature has the right to legislate as it may see fit for the benefit, real or pretended, of the commonwealth, subject only to such constitutional limitations as may have been put upon it. This limiting of powers otherwise naturally inherent in a State legislature, is one of the primary functions of a State constitution, and the extent to which the people of the different States have found it advisable to tie their legislatures, as shown by the extent and variety of the limitations set out in the various State constitutions, is in itself a sad commentary on our success so far with democratic government. But however this may be, subject to these exceptions, the general power of legislation on all subjects is in the State legislatures and not in the Federal Congress. The latter is limited to the subjects expressly enumerated in the Federal Constitution.

Political Powers

An examination of these subjects will show their small number and also in general their political or semi-political character. Thus the power is conferred on Congress to declare war, to provide for the maintenance and governance of armies and navies, including the militia, to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises for the purposes of the Federal Government, to coin money and regulate its value and punish counterfeiting, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization and to establish post offices and post roads. So also the President is given the power with the Senate to make treaties and choose our foreign representatives and the other appointive officials of the Federal Government whose selection is not otherwise provided for. He is also commander-in-chief of the army and navy and of the militia when called into the service of the United States. Upon the Federal Judiciary is conferred jurisdiction of matters touching the Federal Government, its laws or treaties, and of controversies between the States.

Semi-Political Powers

There are also, it is true, other powers which are not purely political. To a large extent these are necessary or natural incidents of political powers granted. Thus Congress is given the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, and the Federal Judiciary is given jurisdiction of all cases affecting the official representatives of foreign countries, of controversies between citizens of this country and foreign states or the citizens of foreign states, of controversies between citizens of different States, and of cases of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction. These powers frequently touch the individual citizen directly in his business or social relations, but they are nevertheless granted in furtherance of the idea that the Federal Government shall exclusively represent us in our foreign relations and shall also be the means of regulating the relations between the various States.

It should also be noted that there are certain powers conferred on Congress of which I think it cannot be fairly said that they are either political or semi-political. But these are only two, the power to establish a uniform bankruptcy law, and the power to pass copyright and patent laws. There are also certain important rights guaranteed the citizen, such as the right of free speech, of bearing arms, of not being twice put in jeopardy of life or liberty for the same offense, etc. It is worthy of passing note that these guarantees were not originally found in the Constitution, but were subsequently incorporated by amendment.

But these non-political powers of Congress and these guarantees to the citizen are very apparently exceptions to the general scheme. Taking it all in all, the powers of our Federal Government as they appear upon the written page of the Constitution, without the coloring and proportions given them in actual use, are very limited in number and scope. They are important in any view, tremendously important as they have been actually developed, but they are in the main concerned with, first, some governmental agency, such as the post office or the coinage; second, our relations with the outside world; and, third, the relations of the States, both as to the Federal Government and between themselves. But the power of legislation as to matters of business, of finance, or commerce, of property and of person, the most vital affairs of life, is not in general with the Federal Government, no matter how nation-wide the subject is or how great the necessity for a uniform regulation.

Radical Variation of Constitution and Practice

Well, you ask, what of it? Of itself there is nothing of it, but there is, I believe, considerable of the fact that such a man as President Wilson could make the statement which I quoted at the opening of this paper and that anyone could even casually have the same idea when the legal fact is so different. It is significant of a great and real difference between the original conception of our Federal Government as set out in black and white in the Constitution and our Federal Government as it actually works. It is significant of an even greater difference between the legal view of the province of the Federal Government and the popular conception of that province. It is just such differences as these between the actual form of government and the people's idea of what it is or should be that make constitutional history. The written Constitution must, either by construction or amendment, follow, although perhaps very tardily, the conceptions of the people.

Fundamental Constitutional Changes Impending

The point of my paper is that the American people have reached a situation in which the legal framework of their government differs so greatly from the popular conception of it, and also differs so greatly from the practical requirements of their changed economic and social conditions, that a fundamental change in such framework is sooner or later inevitable.

I am afraid that I have offended and will later offend still more in traveling over already familiar ground. But certainly it needs no exposition by me that the great fact determined by the Civil War was the constitutional one that we are a single nation. Nor does it need any discussion by me that the things which made the outcome of this struggle inevitable were the industrial progress of the North and the growth of the spirit of nationality. These in turn were due most largely to new methods of communication, to steamboats, to railroads and the telegraph. Not that the country would not have developed without these agencies, or that the settlement of the Western States would not have gone on. The prairie schooner is not an insignificant vessel in historical importance, even if it is in size. But steamboats, railroads and the telegraph stimulated into remarkable proportions a movement that would otherwise have been necessarily slow. Along with this they brought each section into close business, social and political relations with the rest of the country. Particularly was this true between the North Atlantic States and the great States of the Middle West. The country was knit together in sentiment. The citizen felt that he was primarily not a citizen of a State, but of the United States, and he viewed the United States as essentially a single commonwealth. To him the plurality of name, the United States, was historical merely, denoting the origin of the nation, not its existing character.

Disappearance of State Lines

Since the Civil War these same forces have gone on with tenfold vigor and speed. The country has grown in population and wealth until we are amazed at ourselves. With this growth the means of communication have kept pace. Railroads now reach everywhere and their speed, capacity and comfort have improved beyond all comparison. Every little hamlet has instant communication with the rest of the world by telegraph and telephone. Business has become nation wide. It is a small house that does not do business outside the State in which it is located. We are all engaged in interstate commerce. State boundaries mark no differences in business or social relations or in the characteristics of the people. This is not saying that there are no differences in character between the peoples of different sections, but these sections are large and come under such general classifications as the Atlantic States, the Middle West, the South, and the Pacific Coast. But the differences are not according to State lines and, such as they are, are small and unimportant compared with the points of similarity and are yearly growing less. We now constitute as homogeneous and closely knit a people as ever existed. Our enormous size both in numbers and geographical area is more than compensated for by our means of communication.

Effects Upon Popular Idea of Government

The results of all this upon the Federal Government and the States are clearly evident. The State governments have shrunk in relative importance, both actually and in public estimation, while the Federal Government has greatly increased. Every now and then some appeal is made on behalf of states rights, some protest against a new extension of the Federal Government, but such appeal or protest finds no popular response. On the contrary, the public is apt to view with considerable impatience any limitation put upon the Federal Government. Witness the reception of the decisions of the courts declaring the employer's liability act and the white slave traffic act invalid as trenching upon the province of the States. Witness also the reception of the decision of the United States Supreme Court holding that Congress has no power to levy a direct income tax.

Extensions of Federal Powers in Practice

The Federal Government has now extended in certain most important particulars beyond the province of political or semi-political powers and has engaged in the regulation of the general affairs and welfare of its citizens. Our tariff law is an example of this. Ostensibly it is for the purpose of raising revenue merely, but it was early warped into a means of fostering particular industries. This was not done without protest that it was an extension of the powers of the Federal Government into an unauthorized field, and upon this ground South Carolina in the time of Jackson endeavored to nullify the acts of Congress. It is more than a mere coincidence that the party of protection has always been the party of centralization. The trend of things is shown by the facts that we still have a protective tariff most emphatically and that the party of protection and centralization has been in power for forty-two years out of the last fifty.

The conservation of natural resources is unquestionably a matter for the respective States, if we are to follow the original theory of our Government; yet the good faith of those who advocate at the present day that this important matter be left to the States is doubted, probably with justice, and no matter what the immediate outcome of the Pinchot-Ballinger affair may be, the Government is committed to the policy of no longer disposing of public lands freely to the individual, but of retaining them in large part for the people as a whole. In other words, such matters of internal policy as the development of power plants and mines and the cutting of timber are to be regulated by the Federal Government.

As another instance of the same thing, we find the Federal Government endeavoring to look after our morals by suppressing lotteries through the means of prohibiting them the use of the mails. In the same manner it has endeavored to protect the individual citizen against fraudulent business schemes. We have a Federal Agricultural Department and a Bureau of Corporations. Under the guise of regulating interstate and foreign commerce we have the Federal Pure Food Law and a Federal Inspector of Slaughter Houses.

In fact, this power of regulating interstate and foreign commerce has been the most potent means of extending the sphere of the Federal Government. The regulation of the railroads by means of the interstate commerce acts and the Interstate Commerce Commission directly affects business in every portion of the country. Furthermore, the railroads and the telegraph have made it possible for a single business concern to cover the whole nation. As a result, combinations and trusts have arisen to seize the opportunity, and to counteract them we have the Sherman anti-trust law.

Practical Limits of Federal Power

When we consider these instances of Federal aggrandizement and their importance and character, and particularly when we consider the tremendous forces in our political life of which they are the result, it is no wonder that we are apt to say with President Wilson that the general business, financial and commercial interests of the country are entrusted to the regulation of the Federal Government. But in so saying we have overlooked the size of the field upon which the Federal Government has entered and the limitations upon its general extension into it. The instances in which the Federal Government has gone or can go beyond its political or semi-political powers and engage in the regulation of the general affairs of the country, while of very great importance, are after all comparatively limited in number and in scope. We are bound by our Constitution. Fortunately a broad and liberal construction has been given to it, a service that entitles Chief Justice Marshall to be ranked near Washington and Lincoln in the estimation of his countrymen. By means of such construction the powers of the Federal Government have up to the present time been extended as far as they have without the necessity of amendment. But there is a limit to this, and it would seem as if we had about reached that limit. Beyond it there are great fields in which a homogeneous and united people can naturally and profitably be governed by general and uniform laws enacted by a single legislative power.

Constitution Must Change, Events Will Not

Nevertheless, although we cannot proceed much further without change in the Constitu-

Rubber Stamps

10 CENTS PER LINE

AT

Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do. To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING

CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 435,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy. Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909.....38,610,731.93
Total Assets41,261,682.21

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President, Emil Rohde; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, George Tournay; Assistant Secretary, A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohde, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager. RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Hever, Manager.

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

J. Downey Harvey S. G. Murphy
John A. Hooper James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper J. H. Skinner
Thomas Jennings Rudolph Spreckels
James K. Lynch John W. Van Bergen
Walter S. Martin Clinton E. Worden
J. K. Moffitt George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

(Continued on Page 414.)

IT'S git'n of the fust thousand or two that grinds a feller," he has been heard to say, "but fitted out with that much coin, if a feller can't git his toes in somewher's and stick and hang 'till he gits on his feet good and solid, it's 'cause the right stuff aint in him, and if 'taint, why 'taint, and that's the whole on't, and he might's well trail after some other feller's lead fust as last, fer trail he'll have to." Old Blomfield has spoken so often of the difficulty of one's getting his first thousand or so of dollars, that it has been surmised that his own start in business life came hard, but only recently have the facts become available.

Issacher Blomfield was a forty-niner. He made his way from Pennsylvania to the Missouri River, where he united his fortunes with the fortunes of a company of emigrants, and duly set out for the land of gold. The journey across the plains was an unusually hard one, but it had at least one element of happiness in store for Issacher, for, on the way, he wooed and won Annie Giddings, as hearty and true a specimen of young womanhood as crossed from the States that eventful year.

Mr. and Mrs. Blomfield arrived in the Golden State in anything but a golden state, though eager enough for a tussle with fortune. They had the tussle, and for a succession of years fortune had the better of the argument. Time and again he was forced to see opportunities that were golden slip away unimproved for lack of a few hundreds in ready money for investment. Sometimes, with Annie's help, he had almost capitalized himself, but always some mischance befell, and forced them to begin at the bottom.

Finally, Issacher, with Annie and the baby, drove stakes at Rickett's Cove, a newly opened mining camp not far from Janesville. Issacher went to work in the shaft, and Annie furnished meals to miners in a rickety little shanty fashioned from poles, tent cloth, and pine boughs. When they had richer grown, a little, Issacher "built on," and put in a modest stock of such rugged wares as miners have need of, and for a time the venture prospered.

Ricketts was rich. He had struck a rich lead, and had followed it far into the mountain side, and as it gave no sign of "petering," no man knew how rich Ricketts was, or might yet become. But Ricketts was not so rich that he could contentedly see another gleaming from his own field, as it were. So one day he dropped into Blomfield's store, priced his wares, haggled a little, but finally took the whole stock at retail prices, letting our hero out of business slick and clean; and, that very night, wagons arrived from Stockton with a much bigger stock of goods than Issacher had been able to carry.

Leaving Annie to continue feeding the miners until he should "get his toes in" somewhere else, Issacher took the stage for Stockton, and that night found himself hobnobbing with Wirt Hoadley.

Wirt Hoadley came across the plains with Issacher, and the two had been great cronies; so what more natural than that Wirt should bring out the apple of his equestrian eye, a young California horse, of whose mettle he never grew weary of boasting, that his visitor might look upon him approvingly? The horse was fleet of foot, and "good for a hundred miles 'twixt sun and sun, agin any hoss on the slope for any sum in reason," Mr. Hoadley unhesitatingly affirmed.

"Old" Blomfield, of course he wasn't old in those days, being scarcely more than a boy, knew something about a horse, even in those days, and was greatly taken with the animal. Tired though he was with the long stage ride, he vaulted upon Pico's back, and scurried over the adjacent prairie at a great pace, much to the delight of the horse and his proud master.

Somehow the likeness of Hoadley's horse came into Issacher's mind many times that night, as the wheezy, stern-wheeled boat laboriously churned its way down the slough and through the bay, and always when he fell asleep it was to dream of being astride of Pico scurrying over the dusty plains of the San Joaquin, but when morning came, and he awoke to find the boat moored under the hills at San Francisco, horse and dreams were speedily forgotten.

Our hero had been "knocking about" the little city the greater part of the day when his attention was attracted by a rapidly increasing crowd in front of the Gold Hill Bank, and, crossing over, he was astounded to learn that the bank's doors had just been closed by attachment. The Gold Hill had been regarded as one of the stanchest banks in the territory, and what was more, it had a branch at Janesville. Every spare dollar in that and adjacent camps was in the strong box of that institution, Issacher knew very well.

OLD BLOMFIELD'S RIDE

BY

ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY

He clapped his hands to his temples and thought a moment. If attachment papers were to reach Janesville in advance of the news of the bank's failure, it would be all up with Janesville depositors. There was neither telegraph nor telephone to Janesville in those days. The boat and stage afforded the quickest transit, and more than likely the bank's creditors would send a deputy marshal with a writ of attachment by the first boat.

"What is the time, stranger?"

"Five minutes to four."

"And the boat leaves at four?"

"Yes."

Away sped Old Blomfield. He had covered scarce half the distance to the landing when the boat's whistle blew. Every nerve was strained now, but as he ran he could hear the boat's wheel swashing the water against the pier preparatory to starting. The lines were cast off, the keeper was in the act of throwing the big gates to—whiz-z! a puffing, wheezing body shot by him, cleared ten feet of intervening water space, and landed sprawling upon deck, cheered and comforted by the shouts of on-lookers.

It did not take Issacher long to ascertain that a deputy marshal was indeed on board, and not only equipped with the papers necessary for seizing the bank at Janesville, but that he was accompanied by a half dozen heavily armed men, whose mission it was to emphasize the behests of the official documents, if need be. These men would be certain to take the first stage to Janesville, and unless Issacher could get the news there ahead of the stage, he might as well let the officers carry it. But how was he to get it there?

The boat was due at Stockton at 3 o'clock a. m., while the stage did not leave until 6. Would it be possible to beat the stage to Janesville? He thought of Wirt Hoadley's horse, but could one horse however mettlesome beat the stage on a ninety-mile run even with three hours start? The stage changed horses every ten miles, while Issacher would be in great luck if he were able to change at all.

The boat had no sooner jammed its nose against the muddy bank at Stockton, than Old Blomfield leaped ashore, and went flying up the street as fast as ever his short legs could carry him, and a moment later was pounding away at the door of Hoadley's stable.

"Well, what's broke loose now?" demanded Hoadley from within.

"Is that you, Wirt?" Issacher squeaked in reply in his high keyed voice. "Roll out quick, old fellow, I want Pico."

"The deuce you do!" Wirt growled. "I've seen whole families who wanted Pico, but I take notice nary one of them ever got him away from me yet." While Wirt growled busily enough, he as busily drew on his clothing, lighted his lantern and opened the door.

"What! is that you, Blom?" queried Wirt, shading the lantern with his hand and peering into Issacher's eyes. "Killed somebody, or stolen something? Which is it, eh?"

"Neither one, Wirt. Gold Hill Bank's busted, 'n 'bout every dollar in Janesville is in the branch up there. Pico'n I have got to let the boys know afore the stage gets there er they're nipped. Gang of officers on boat with guns 'n papers."

"Can't do it."

"Got to."

"You'll kill hoss."

"Sell him to me."

"N-a-w. Get into bed there and go sleep. Let toughs have Janesville. Janesville no good no how. Rather have hoss."

"Give you hundred fifty for him, Wirt?"

"N-a-w."

"Make it two hundred then?"

"N-a-w."

"Two hundred fifty, Wirt? Every infernal dollar I've got. Be a man now and give the boys a show."

"Two hundred fifty's good. Fork over," and the shining slugs and twenties slipped from Issacher's hand into the capacious palm of Wirt Hoadley's, and, a moment later, Old Blomfield and Pico were flying along the road toward Janesville.

The first dash over, Pico swung into an easy machine-like canter, which made the trees along the stage road rush by them in the murkiness of the morning like a flock of goblins on a stampede.

"A little slower, Pico," and the rider reined his horse in a trifle, patted him on the neck, and, talking to him, checked him down into a single-footed gait, easy for horse as well as rider, but quite fast enough for an all day's jaunt.

"Ninety miles in twelve hours, Pico, old boy, with barely half an hour for grub. Can we do it, old fellow? It will test those dainty, flat legs of yours, my California gentleman, but we can make it if Wirt Hoadley hasn't been humbugging about your staying qualities. But if he has, I know a feller about my size that'll have to pound rock again, and a fellow about your size that'll go to the bone yard before this day ends. Do you catch the idea, my pretty broncho?"

If the horse did not understand he seemed to, Old Blomfield says, for he did not miss a measure until the Stanislaus was reached, at 6 o'clock, a good third of the distance being covered.

The morning's ride had been an exhilarating one. It was in the dawning days of California summer weather, not yet hot. Clouds still gathered in little knots above the mountain tops and floated lazily along from peak to peak, catching an instant upon the crest of one, then whirling languidly away to the next, as cakes of ice catch and whirl upon the bosom of a drift-obstructed stream. No one had yet been astir upon the stage road, and the only sounds to break the stillness were the rhythmic clatterings of Pico's hoofs and the ill-natured cries of taciturn little ground owls whose meditations those clatterings had disturbed.

As day broke, the snowy summits of the high Sierras stood out in bold relief above the lower and darker ridges, faintly traceable, lying in shadow. The recent warm weather had melted the snow upon the lower mountains, and the Stanislaus was running bank-full Issacher found, and very swiftly.

"O-o-o-ver!" he called again and again, but although he whooped and yelled and screamed at the top of his voice, the ferryman would not "o-o-ver" and the only answer which came across the turbid stream was the disconsolate howl of a hungry hound keeping watch upon the farther bank. Precious moments were passing, yet were not wholly lost. Issacher had Pico's saddle off in a jiffy and, between yells, rubbed the perspiring animal until his soft, brown hide glistened like polished mahogany.

It was plainly of no use waiting there, and there was nothing for it but swim or give up, and Issacher chose to swim, hazardous as it was in that chill and rapid current. Pico boldly plunged in, but horse and rider had gone no more than a length or two when both went under. Issacher slipped quickly from the saddle, caught a stirrup and swam by the horse's side. Down, down the stream they went, carried by the swift current, but when it seemed they must be swept under the high bank and upon the rocks below, Pico's hoofs caught upon the slippery bottom in shallow water, and horse and master dragged themselves, panting, upon dry ground.

It was a severe trial, but the cool plunge, followed by brisk rubbing and a lively canter, seemed to invigorate rather than exhaust this wonderful little horse, and Paradise plains were crossed, and more than half the entire distance to Janesville covered, in a little more than five hours from time of starting.

At the Tuolumne a half hour's stop was made. Pico thoroughly groomed and fed a measure of barley; but soon they were swinging along the hard-beaten road again, fresh as ever, it seemed. Issacher rode slower now, and was fully three hours in reaching Snelling, a distance of twenty miles. He had determined to secure a fresh horse at Snelling if possible, but a disposition to have him taken into custody upon suspicion of having stolen Pico was so manifest that he watched for an opportunity, and slipped off without pressing the matter further.

He had now come sixty-six miles in a little more than eight hours, and there remained barely four hours in which to accomplish twenty-four miles over a rough mountain road, and upon a tired horse. Pico was allowed to trot leisurely down the hills, cantering through the intervals, but when they came to a long up-grade, Old Blomfield slipped off the horse's back, and with the bridle rein over his arm, led the way on foot, Pico walking by his side. It was a toilsome journey, that last twenty-four miles up the "grade," but when it seemed that they could go no further, they had really gotten up the very last ridge, and there, less than a mile below, lay the pretty little "flat," its wondrous beauty all spoiled by the unsightly mining camp of Janesville.

From the summit of this ridge one may look far out upon the San Joaquin plains, and here and there come into view little links and stretches of the road over which our travelers had come. Old Blomfield scanned the way, shading his eyes with his hand. Yes, sure enough, there was the stage, far below, just coming round a sharp point of mountain. It made but the merest speck in the road, and the thinnest possible film of dust blew out from the mountain and pointed like a finger to the south, but Issacher knew what it was. It would take the stage more than an hour to reach Janesville, and Issacher had won. He shook his fist at the stage, and made faces at it, swung his hat and squeaked a little tired hurrah, then, getting into the saddle once more, trotted down the slope.

Reaching the end of the street, Old Blomfield rose in his stirrups, and, swinging his hat, cried out at the top of his squeaky voice, "Run to the bank! Run to the bank! Gold Hill's busted! Gold Hill's busted! Run! run! run! Ring the fire bell! Call the people out! Officers coming on the stage!" And away he went, stopping now and then to send a messenger post-haste to some mining camp near by, then pushing on, throwing his arms and screaming, nor did he stop until the outskirts of the town had been reached, and every soul in Janesville had heard the news.

In five minutes' time dozens of men were running to the bank bearing hastily scrawled checks in their hands, and the astonished cashier was busily paying the money out. It chanced, too, that the parent bank had sent a large sum of money to this branch only the week before, presumably to have it out of harm's way, so there was enough funds in hand to pay the Janesville depositors in full.

Ricketts was the farthest depositor from the bank, and about the heaviest, too, and Issacher, so soon as others had been given word, jumped upon a fresh horse and carried the word to the cove; and, just as the heavily loaded stage teetered and swung over the brow of the long hill, and came bowling down the slope with crack of whip and toot of trumpet, Old Blomfield and Ricketts plunged round the corner riding double, in the very nick of time, for, a moment later, the stage thundered up, the marshal and posse crawled out, and leaped upon vaults as bare as the traditional cupboard of Old Mother Hubbard.

The marshal was thunderstruck. "How in the name of the honorable, the circuit, and district court of the United States of America, which I represent," he cried, turning toward the crowd of grinning by-standers, "did you fellows get onto this, I'd like to know? Did the spirits tell you?"

For answer, all turned toward Issacher, who, exhausted now that his errand was done, had sunk down beside the hitching post where Pico stood, scarcely cognizant of what was going on.

"How did you do it, Squeaky?" Gus Hansboro asked.

"How did I do it?" Old Blomfield repeated, in a querulous tone. "I found it out in 'Frisco yesterday, came with them fellers on the boat to Stockton last night, bought Wirt Hoadley's crack hoss, though it took every red I could scrape to do it, and that critter standing there that you fellers ain't payin' no 'tention to fetched me every lick of the way from Stockton since 3 o'clock this mornin'—that's how I did it, if you want to know."

How quickly those hardy miners gathered around that horse! How tenderly they cared for him! They stripped the saddle off him in a trice, and some set to rubbing and others to feeding him. They fairly loved him, those burly men, nor did they entirely forget Old Blomfield, or the part he had played.

"Three cheers for Squeaky Blomfield!" some one cried, and the cheers were given heartily; but Gus Hansboro, springing upon a dry-goods box, called out, "Hurrahin' is all very fine, men, fer them as likes it, but if we fellers don't do something more substantialer like fer Squeaky right here and now, we ain't fitt'n to dig pay dirt, and probably shan't have no luck from this time on. Now I 'spect I'm the meanest durn'd man in this here crowd, but mean as I be, I'm going to offer Squeaky two hundred and fifty dollars fer that hoss, cash up." And Gus surveyed the crowd with the air of an old-time auctioneer. "Who'll raise me?"

"Who'll raise me?" he demanded again. "Squeaky's done what nary 'nother man in these diggings er'd a thought could a been done, and he's saved us a powerful sight er money by the means. Come, Old Ricketts, with fourteen thousand there in yer sack, what be you goin' ter do 'bout it? Yer ain't going ter be as mean a man as I be, 'taint likely."

Ricketts raised the bid to three hundred, but had to go a hundred better still before the horse was knocked down to him.

"Now, Ricketts," cried Gus, as he handed that worthy the halter, "do the handsome. 'Taint likely Squeaky really wants ter part with a hoss that has carried him through like that one, so whatever you do, don't be mean, but do the handsome."

Ricketts winced a bit, but caught the idea, and, stepping across to where Issacher sat, "I haven't done hardly square by you, Mr. Blomfield," he said, "but here is your horse back again and welcome, and Gus Hansboro will have to quit a heap of his meanness before he will do as well by you in future as old man Ricketts. I'll give him a dead pointer on that."

A hearty laugh went up at this sally, but the selling of Pico went on. He was sold once at three hundred and fifty dollars; once at three hundred; a time or two at two hundred and fifty dollars, then on down the scale at two hundred, one hundred and fifty, and one hundred dollars, Gus admonishing each purchaser to "not be mean, but do the handsome."

This episode marked the turning point in the fortunes of Old Blomfield, for when he was carried away in state that night to Annie and the baby, he carried with him more than two thousand dollars in slugs, twenty and ten dollar gold pieces. Being thus capitalized, he gave his head a business turn, put up a lumber mill in the mountains, opened a store, invested his savings in corner lots in San Francisco, and soon, as people said, became "richer than Ricketts."

("Constitutional Changes"—Continued.)

tion itself, the same forces that have brought us thus far have not ceased, but are pressing us on with increasing force. Who can prophesy how long it will take or how much it will cost twenty-five years hence to go from here to New York, or to send a ton of freight from here to New York, or what the means of communication of speech between here and New York will be? Yet these things revolutionize the activities of a people, and the activities of a people determine their institutions.

Now I know that the role of a prophet is rarely acceptable to the prophet's fellow citizens, yet I venture. I believe this much is certain—the functions of the States as they now exist must in large part go. When distances are great in time, labor and expense of travel, when communication of speech is slow, when as a result different sections differ substantially in their characteristics and views, separate States, each one governing the general affairs of its people, are natural. But when these conditions do not exist, when you have a single people with swift, easy and cheap means of communication, with intimate business and social relations between the various parts, and with ideas and purposes in common, it is natural that such a people should have its general affairs governed from a central single source. This I believe is the end of the road along which the forces of the present day are driving us, with greater and greater rapidity.

A Coming Change in Government

It is an end which means a radical change in our form of government. I do not mean that the State will be wiped out entirely. It will continue to exist, but it will continue chiefly for the administration of local affairs. The general affairs of the country and in particular the power of legislation upon matters of general concern will be entrusted to the central government.

The demand for this change is evident in many different and otherwise unconnected ways. We are face to face with problems which require for their solution the extension of the powers of Congress.

Railroad Regulation a National Problem

One of the most important is that of railroad regulation. The railroads must be subject to governmental control and this control must be effective. There is no alternative other than State ownership. The railroads have become such tremendously important agencies, their powers are so great, and the abuse of these powers is so harmful to the public that the public cannot afford to permit them to continue except under careful restraints effectively enforced. But such effective enforcement is hardly possible when the authority over every road is divided between the Interstate Commerce Commission controlling its interstate business and a State commission or other State agency controlling its business within the State. The business and operations of a railroad do not permit of any such division. Take for example the matter of rates. As it is now, we have the Interstate Commerce Commission regulating interstate rates and the State Commissions regulating intrastate rates. But for any just and reasonable regulation, all the rates of the particular road must be considered. The first principle of rate regulation is that the company is entitled to a fair return on its investment and no more. This return on the investment depends of course on the earnings of the whole road. Accordingly, in order to determine whether any particular rate is fair, one must first determine whether all the earnings of the road yield a fair return, and then whether the rate in question is fair and reasonable in connection with all the other rates which produce these earnings. For any effective and reasonable regulation, it would seem as if one tribunal must be given authority over all rates, both State and interstate.

Also Taxation of Railroads

Much the same situation presents itself in the matter of the taxation of railroads. Is there anything more absurd than our present method of each State endeavoring to put a value upon the particular portion of an interstate railroad which is within its limits? How is it possible, for example, to assess the portion of a railroad which crosses the State of Nevada? The country is mostly desert. Taking merely such business as originates or terminates in Nevada, the railroad is worth practically nothing. But as a portion of an interstate railroad, it is extremely valuable. But is the value of the railroad company's terminals, feeders and connections in the rich State of California to be considered for taxing purposes in Nevada? As a result you have the spectacle of a railroad company claiming before the Nevada State Railroad Commission in connection with fixing rates, that its road in that state is worth $150,000 a mile, and a few months later claiming before the State Board of Assessors of the same State that for taxation purposes the value of its road does not exceed $18,000 a mile. Who can say which figure is correct? The fact is that neither figure and no other figure is correct. It is an attempt to value separately an inseparable part of a larger whole. It is like assessing the value of one leg of a horse. The only reasonable thing is to tax the road as a whole. Summing it up, the difficulties of a divided authority over railroads are so great that comparatively soon, I believe, both the public and the railroads themselves will demand relief from the situation by giving exclusive control over them to the Federal Government and that later this will be followed by giving the exclusive power of taxing railroads into the same hands. It is to be noted, however, that this will be giving the Federal Government the power to regulate not merely interstate commerce, but commerce in general.

Other National Problems

Another instance where power must be given the Federal Government is the protection of aliens. In dealing with foreign governments we of course act exclusively through the Federal Government and through it we are responsible for the protection of foreign citizens within our borders. Yet the Federal Government is powerless to provide for their protection. That is left exclusively to the State and if the State fails to do its duty, as in the case of the Italians who were mobbed and murdered in Louisiana, the country at large is helpless. All we can do in such a case is to shamefully confess our weakness and try to escape with a money indemnity, which falls not upon the State which has failed in its duty of maintaining order, but upon the country as a whole. If we were not so big ourselves some powerful nation might well say to us some day: "Your constitutional limitations or omissions are no concern of ours. You fix it so that you can protect our citizens and do it quick." We ourselves cannot endure this situation indefinitely. Sooner or later the Federal Government must be given power commensurate with its responsibility in this respect. Yet the doing of this will give the Federal Government what is practically police power within the States.

Another problem certain to arise is that of rights in the waters of a stream flowing from one State into another. In such a case is each State to be looked upon as an independent sovereignty? If so, each has apparently the unqualified power to regulate the taking of water from the stream within its own borders, provided only such taking does not interfere with navigation, and the State which is the higher on the stream may permit the diversion of water regardless of the State below or the injury that will be done the latter's inhabitants. This is manifestly not just. This question was presented in a recent case in the Supreme Court of the United States wherein the State of Kansas, on behalf of its inhabitants along the Arkansas River, sought to enjoin the diversion of water from that river in the State of Colorado. The injunction was denied, but on grounds that leave the question undecided. Manifestly the matter is one that cannot be regulated by the law of either State. It should be regulated by an authority superior to them both, and undoubtedly in time it will be. But it will be an unmistakable invasion of the sovereignty of the States.

Demands for Other Federal Laws

As another illustration of the general trend, there has been going on for years an endeavor to have the States adopt a uniform system of law governing negotiable instruments, but with little success. It is something much needed, as the rights and obligations pertaining to them should be the same everywhere. They are the substitute for money, and just as the matter of money is most fittingly a concern of the Central Government, so also the law of negotiable instruments should be its concern.

There is also the demand for a uniform divorce law, for a Federal corporation law, for child labor laws, for an extension of the powers of the Federal Government so that we may more effectively suppress the so-called white slave traffic and for laws for the prevention and decision of labor disputes. Some of the laws so proposed are at present limited so as to bring them possibly within the interstate or foreign commerce powers of Congress, but others are wholly beyond any of the powers of Congress, even under the broadest possible construction, and, one and all, they would constitute an encroachment upon the authority which so far has always been exercised by the States.

Such instances, however, are hardly needed to prove my point. The whole tendency of the times is in the direction indicated. On the one hand State lines come to mean less and less, and on the other hand the advantages of a central government with strength and uniformity of administration become greater and greater. Is not the time certain to arrive when these advantages will be so great that we will seize upon them? It will not come in all probability by any single act, by any one general amendment of the Constitution. But will we not, as the necessity for it grows pressing in each particular case, strip one by one the general powers of the States from them and transfer those powers to the National Government?

Can We Endure Success?

It would extend this paper to an unreasonable length to consider whether such a change will impair or invigorate the capacity of our people for self-government, although I am not unaware that this after all is the most important thing in connection with it. My object at this time is simply to point out that whatever may be the effect of such a fundamental change in our institutions, the change is on the way. I cannot, however, refrain from saying that we must not conclude that because heretofore a strong central government governing a great dominion has usually, if not always, been accompanied by a loss of political vigor in the people and been followed by disintegration, the result with us will probably be the same. Such a form of government is usually the flower of great growth in wealth and power. It comes as an incident of the nation's success. This wealth and power are in themselves the greatest factors that make toward weakness and decay, and if free government is to fail in this country, I believe it will be by reason of them and not by reason of any form into which we may cast our institutions. Primarily the problem is not, can we endure a free and upright people under a central form of government? Such form is but the natural expression of great strength achieving great results. Our problem is simply the old one, can we endure success?

[Mr. Olney's article was originally an address delivered before the Commonwealth Club. It is published here as it was delivered, and without an opportunity for Mr. Olney to change it to the form of a general article.—The Editor.]

("Virilizing Schools"—Concluded.)

selves, and that a board of control should be appointed by them, who should take under advisement all matters governing the club and should establish a standard of membership.

"The Board of Education have given their consent that such a clubhouse should be built on its grounds for the purposes for which this was intended. Your committee went into the discussion of the requirements for membership, as to whether there should be dues, or whether membership should be free; but we thought best that all matters of this kind should be left for further consideration, as also finally the matter of financing such a gymnasium. We felt that the good sense of the people of Alameda would approve of such a plan and that it would be a matter of no very great difficulty to finance such a scheme, embracing, as it does, the very broadest ideas of education and manhood; and we earnestly pray this committee that you adopt some such scheme as this, and take immediate steps to put it into execution. We believe that it should not be on a small scale, that our clubhouse and gymnasium should be one of the very best in the country, fully equipped as to its gymnastic features, with shower baths, swimming tanks, bowling alleys, checker rooms, reading rooms, and every innocent amusement which appeals to young men."

A further recommendation was endorsed, calling for the naming of the institution the Alameda Gymnasium.

It will be noted that the plan combines some of the essential features of a municipal recreation center with some of the features of a boys' republic. But the important thing, aside from its value as a means for providing wholesome and innocent amusement for the boys, is that it gives a large part of the boys' days to companionship wholly with other boys and with men. By this means the lack of masculine, virile influences in the school will be supplied.

Whatever its result in this respect, such an institution will instill itself on other grounds.

But it is in this respect particularly that its results will be especially noteworthy in the future, for it may demonstrate new and unsuspected usefulness in the idea of having boys trained by men and associated with men.

It is announced that Lodi soon will have a new bank with a paid-up capital of $100,000.

The Rickey Land and Cattle Company has sold its 33,332 acres of land in Bridgeport and Antelope valleys to Paul M. Nippert of San Francisco.

Ross Valley Real Estate

PUBLIC AUCTION

OF FURNISHED COTTAGES ON

50-FT. LOTS.

SUNDAY, MAY 22, 1910, 1 P. M.

3 minutes from Escalante station. Every ad reads that this property must be sold, but in this case it is a matter of fact; it is going to be sold; 20 per cent cash. M. GALLICK, auctioneer. Free lunch at 12 noon.

GET A LOT OR HOME AT YOUR OWN FIGURE.

KINFIELD REALTY CO., OREGON

J. E. LEWIS, Pres.

ORPHAN NOTICE

The Boys' and Girls' Aid Society

The following have been received since the publication of the last notice:

Half Orphans
Greenwood, Thomas	10 yrs
Johnson, Luther	13 yrs	4 mos
Moser, John	9 yrs	11 mos
Nissen, Abraham	9 yrs
Whiting, David	10 yrs	4 mos
Whiting, Berard	9 yrs	5 mos
Abandoned
Smith, Robert	12 yrs	1 mo.	4-13-41

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

Estate of GEORGE E. WOODBURY, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administrator with the will annexed of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within ten months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of Oliver Ellsworth, Room 824, Mills Building, corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco, Cal., which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.

A. M. HAINES,

Administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, May 2nd, 1910.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH, Attorney for Administrator, Mills Building, San Francisco.

5-6-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF CHARLES H. MORRELL, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Rhinette Morrell, executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said executrix at the office of Joseph Hutchinson, rooms 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

RHINETTE MORRELL.

Executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

Dated San Francisco, April 20, 1910.

JOSEPH HUTCHINSON, attorney for Executrix, 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, Cal.

NOTICE TO STOCKHOLDERS OF GIGANTE MINING COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in accordance with a resolution of the Board of Directors of Gigante Mining Company, duly adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, held on the 31st day of March, 1910, a special meeting of the stockholders of Gigante Mining Company will be held on the 14th day of June, 1910, at the hour of two o'clock P. M. of that day, at Room 269 in the Kuss Building, on the west line of Montgomery street between Pine and Bush streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the principal place of business, and the office of said corporation, and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet. That the object and purpose of said Stockholders' Meeting is to take into consideration and then and there act upon a proposition to increase the capital stock of said Gigante Mining Company by the amount of $25,000.00, that is to say, from $100,000.00, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each, its present capital stock, to $125,000.00, divided into 125,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each.

Dated at San Francisco, California, the 31st day of March, 1910.

AUG. WATERMAN,

Secretary of Gigante Mining Company.

4-8-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Protections and Punishments

The success of the direct primary law is dependent upon the faithful performance of a great many duties by a great number of persons. If any considerable number of such persons are careless, incompetent or willfully derelict in their duties the direct primary will go awry and the preferences of the people may be thwarted. It is well, therefore, to have the law safeguarded in its operation by all the power the State possesses.

Wisely, the law strives to prevent certain kinds of errors or wrong-doing in advance, and so section 27 provides that whenever it shall be made to appear by affidavit presented to any court of record, an error or omission has occurred, or is about to occur, in placing any name on a primary ballot, or that any wrongful act has been or is about to be done by any person charged with any duty concerning the primary election, the court shall hear the matter summarily and order corrections made and the wrong desisted from. Any person who shall fail to obey such court order shall be in contempt of court and liable to summary punishment at discretion of the court.

It was rather openly known that in the primary election held in San Francisco last fall certain persons picked up a few dollars of easy money by signing nomination papers at 50 cents each, particularly when there was some difficulty in getting signatures and some need of haste. Evidently they had not heard of section 32, which provides that "any person who shall offer or, with knowledge of the same, permit any person to offer for his benefit, any bribe to a voter to induce such voter to sign any nomination paper, and any person who shall accept such bribe, or any promise of gain of any kind in the nature of a bribe, as consideration for signing any nomination paper, whether such bribe or promise of gain in the nature of a bribe be offered or accepted before or after signing, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." Every voter who accepted 50 cents for signing up a bunch of nomination papers, and every person who paid it, was punishable and should have been punished.

The section goes on to say that "upon trial and conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not less than $25 nor more than $300, or by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than ten days nor more than 120 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment." The signing of nomination papers is a public duty and not a private snap.

It would be quite easy, if the law did not provide adequate protection, for some officer in possession of nomination papers of some candidate conveniently to neglect to file them until too late. Paragraph 2 of the above section declares such neglect or refusal to file such papers a misdemeanor and imposes a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, imprisonment in a county jail for not less than one month nor more than six months, or both such fine and imprisonment.

It is to be hoped that, in the interest of a fair trial of the direct primary plan, district attorneys will be vigilant and courts severe in meting out punishment where there has been either willful wrong-doing or culpable negligence in the conduct of the primary election.

The third paragraph in the above section throws a blanket protection over the direct primary law by declaring that all of the laws for the protection of general elections, and punishments provided, except as specially provided above, shall apply to the protection of primary elections as well as general. This is sufficiently sweeping to cover all requirements if the officers of the law, and good citizenship generally, will do their duty in vindicating this new method for ascertaining the political will of the people.

Nevertheless, we all know that election frauds are frequent and not often punished. In fact, illegal voting and making of false returns are frequently looked upon as good practical jokes on the other side. A main opportunity for fraud is in mis-reading ballots and mistaking the same. This requires that the whole election board be corrupt, but rascals seldom respect party lines and bosses of opposing parties too often work in harmony for the purpose of thwarting the popular will. This has been especially true in California, where the political bureau of a great corporation has assumed to conduct the affairs of both the great parties to effect offensive and defensive relations with manipulators in both parties. In such cases it does little good to have the election officers divided equally between the two great parties. However, good citizenship must do its best and let it go at that.

After all, the greatest danger that threatens the direct primary, in common with other elections, does not lie in the direction of positive offenses committed against it, nor yet in the dereliction of public officers charged with important duties, but rather with an indifferent, a selfish, negligent and unpatriotic citizenship that suffers professional politicians to run its government for it instead of taking the duty in hand itself. Neither the direct primary nor general elections will serve their full purpose without being somehow reinforced by some system of compulsory voting. The right to vote should never be separated from the duty to vote, and all the power that law can wield will not prove too great for making careless or indifferent citizenship perform its full duty to itself and to posterity.

Because of its newness there is hope that, this year, the direct primary will call out a full vote and, if it does call out such a vote, there is little reason to fear that thoroughly good tickets will not be nominated, but when the direct primary gets to be an old story, as old a story as the indirect primary has been in past years, the danger is that only a light vote will be cast at the primaries and that the vote will be cast by those who can least well be trusted with the welfare of the State. As a common experience only 25 per cent of the full voting constituency votes at a primary election, and that per cent is precisely that portion of the voting constituency that could best be dispensed with altogether. The crime against the direct primary most to be feared is that of not voting at all, an offense very serious and reprehensible but difficult to punish adequately.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary $50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE

Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.
1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

148 OAKLAND 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: MAY 27: '10

FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH·GOOD COURAGE·GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 27.

Every Precaution Taken

WE ARE ASSURED by the "scientists" in charge that every precaution will be taken to prevent accidents in the "contest" to be "pulled off" between the two heavyweight champions of manhood in San Francisco on the Fourth of July. Competent physicians will make physical examinations of the contestants at the colossal laboratory to be prepared for the purpose in advance of the scientific experimentation and, mayhap, the coroner afterward. What more?

How Aldrich Caught Taft

IT HAS COME to the knowledge of this paper, just how is immaterial, that Nelson W. Aldrich caught President Taft on the soft side of his impressionable nature by making confession of religion and a determination to devote the remaining years of his life to such penitential good works in legislation as an humble believer may render with the aid of divine grace re-enforced by the admonitions of advancing years and impaired health. This is good, but its effect might have been somewhat modified on the mind of the President had he recalled the case of the man who, believing himself to be in extremis, sent for his enemy, made confession of contrition, craved forgiveness and, being assured of it, and having shaken hands and said goodbye, raised himself upon his elbow and feebly called, "See here, old man, if I get well this business don't go, you understand." There are evidences that Mr. Aldrich's health has improved.

Needed Fumigation

FORMER GOVERNOR ROLLINS of New Hampshire lately returned from Europe, where he had been with his family. A high tariff man at home, he is reported to have proved himself a rank free trader while returning home by having his personal effects, and even his own person, infected with dutiable commodities he was trying to smuggle in. He is said to have been much humiliated by the liberties the customs officials of New York took with him. It had been better had he landed in prison, so that those who wish to commiserate him might know where to find him.

A Danger To Conservation

THERE IS DANGER that practical legislation in relation to conservation of our nation's resources may run aground on the rock of widely diversified, but sympathetically co-operative, greed. As all property owners in San Francisco were more than willing, after the fire, to have all streets widened on which they owned no lots, but were implacably hostile to having any street widened upon which their property abutted, so there is a general willingness throughout the country to have the other fellow's resources conserved, with a marked hostility to having any conservation of procurable wealth in sections of the country where such wealth abounds. Except our national government present an adamant front to every compromising interest little will come of its conservation policy other than regrets over what might have been.

Graciously Permitted To Pay Bills

IN THAT DOLOROUS SPIRIT which so characterizes all his public utterances, President Ripley, of the Santa Fe, sarcastically remarks that at all events railroad regulation by legislation is likely graciously to leave to the railroads the power to pay bills without interference. The distinguished mourner may find no little comfort in the reflection that in no single instance has a legislative remedy been proposed to be applied where there was not a public wrong long endured at the hands of an autocratic and unprincipled railroad management. Chickens are coming home to roost.

The Oblivious Mr. Anderson

MR. ALDEN ANDERSON'S keynote address, delivered at Sacramento Saturday evening last, appears to have been chiefly remarkable for what it did not contain. According to the Bee of that city, Mr. Anderson "did not extend to the one root-searching topic (whether or not California is to be bond or free) the passing tribute of an incidental nod." To be perfectly fair, how could he, in view of the very patent fact that his candidacy is being brought forward and sustained by the Political Bureau that, for forty years, has held the political life of the state in bondage? As that control is not susceptible of being defended, what other recourse has Mr. Anderson except to ignore the issue?

Not Guiltless

FOR THE SPILLING OF BLOOD and devastations of war renewed in Nicaragua the Great Republic cannot wash its hands of responsibility. What grown brother, seeing two of the little fellows of his family seeking to slash each other with knives, will not interfere to put a stop to the strife, restore order and maintain it, by superior force if need be? The performance of a similar service is due from Uncle Sam to the adolescent peoples to the southward and he cannot be held guiltless of their blood if he withholds his hand.

If the Election Were Held Tomorrow

WHETHER OR NOT the pending campaign be one of Hiram Johnson against the field it is manifestly one of the field against Hiram Johnson. If the primary election were held tomorrow Hiram Johnson would sweep the state with a clear majority over all competitors of all factions and all parties. But it is yet eighty-one days to the closing of the polls primary evening and what the field can do, what unlimited expenditure can accomplish, what a submerged, intricate and state-wide ramified political machine can bring about to poison the public mind against Hiram Johnson, and what he stands for, and to beguile public sentiment into a false feeling of security in political conditions as they are, will be done. It would be a marvel if all these efforts made no headway. It has been demonstrated before our eyes here in San Francisco that money enough, lies enough, ink enough, social pressure enough, re-enforced by enough of financial pressure of a materialistic character, can corrupt an effective plurality of an elective constituency. These are the forces of evil arrayed against the candidacy of Hiram Johnson and the cause of emancipation which he has so bravely espoused. Shall they be withstood? They can be and they must be if California is to be made a free state. If the reader can not help the cause in any other way let him induce some good, negligent man to go at once and register as a Republican that he may vote for Johnson and the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League ticket at the primary election.

Another Learned Profession

For three hundred years anyone anywhere in the world, who wanted a farm of his own, had only to move out upon one of Uncle Sam's unoccupied farms and make it his own by living on it. From the four corners of the earth men flocked to America with their families to secure this boon theretofore unknown in the history of the world, and this has been the most stupendous fact in the civilization of Europe and America during three centuries.

But the free farms are gone. That escape valve from extortion and tyranny, however and wherever practiced, has been bolted shut. If the conditions of labor are hard, and toil unremunerative, men of Europe and America may no longer turn to the free lands of America to seek and find liberty and equality and a home of their own without paying tribute to any lord or landowner. Whatever new land is brought under cultivation now must be redeemed from swamp or aridity, from brush or rocks, and at so great a cost as to be beyond the reach of moneyless men.

The result of this changed condition is manifest in what amounts to a land craze sweeping over the country. The advance in the price of farms in the Middle West well-nigh equals that of corner lots in boom cities. The agricultural schools are booming. Fifteen years ago those whom the Agricultural College of California sent out to aid the farmers in their work had to catch the farmers where they could find them and hold them almost by main strength in order to get a chance to talk to them. Now when one of these professors goes out among the farmers he can hardly get away from them, so eager are they to have perplexing questions answered. The demand that the schools shall teach what the child of the farmer needs to know is becoming insistent, and men who can think and observe, figure and plan, are being attracted to agriculture as never before. The outlook is hopeful for those who can get to the land, but full of forebodings for those who can not, or for those who, being upon the land, cannot hope to own in fee any part of the earth's surface. Nowhere has a renter population been permanently free or far removed from penury. We must fight landlordism in America as we would fight peonage. Unresisted, the one will result in the other.

The enhanced price of land is going to shut the "fool farmer," the man who farms because he is not intelligent enough to do anything else, brother to the ox, having only muscle to sell, out of independent proprietorship. The capitalist is going to buy him out so quick that it will make his head swim, with the result that he and his family will soon find themselves in the unskilled, day-labor market, never more than thirty days from possible poverty. Per contra, the man who buys hundred-dollar land must know all that science can teach him of agriculture or lose his investment. The day when farming is to be one of the learned professions is at hand.

The Road to Nowhere

No man ever went into the presidential office with a clearer idea of what he wanted to accomplish during his administration than President Taft had when he was inaugurated, and no administration program ever outlined had more in it to commend it to the consciences and patriotisms of the people than the program which President Taft submitted for the consideration of Congress.

It will be useful to review this program lest we forget the splendid policies it so clearly outlined. Enthusiased, they were as follows: A new tariff so protective as to maintain the cost of production at home and abroad and leave a reasonable profit to American capital; the submission to the people of a constitutional amendment legalizing a national income tax; a corporation tax partly for revenue and partly for putting the government in posses-

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News orders and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

sion of information relating to corporations, the better to aid government in such control of corporations as will safeguard the public interest; a bill for the more adequate regulation of railroads as common carriers discharging a public function; such a Federal incorporation law as will permit great centralizations of industry, but prevent monopoly and punish extortion; such a reform of the land laws as will permit the development of our nation's resources and yet prevent waste and the imposition of extortionate charges for the use of the common heritage; statutory sanction for the executive withdrawals of public lands from entry pending needful legislation for their wise disposal; the establishment of a postal savings bank system for the convenience of small depositors, energizing latent capital and the relieving of government from bonded debt carried as an artificial and unscientific foundation for a currency system; such a law relating to injunctions as will prevent tyrannous conduct on the part of courts partial to property interests and unmindful of the higher rights of citizenship; a rectification of antique governmental methods that result in duplication of effort and extravagance in cost of operation; a broad and general advance in the powers of the Federal government commensurate with the requirements of a great and growing nation.

Does not the mere reading of this schedule of administration measures warm the heart of patriotism and fan the flame of enthusiasm?

But, "if to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches and poor men's cottages princes' palaces."

There were two possible courses open to the President through which he might hope to secure the crystallization of his splendid program into statutes. Thanks to the Roosevelt influence and his own, the essential principles of his policies had been embodied in the Republican national platform and the party committed to them. The President had a right, therefore, to appeal to the party management to redeem the party pledges, whatever the personal opinions of those party managers might be and notwithstanding any private or special interests they might wish to save. The only other course open to him was to appeal to those persons in Congress who favored these policies on principle without regard to party lines, and to appeal to the American public, likewise without regard to party lines, to sustain his policies and seek to force them through Congress by power of public opinion. The President, imbued with the false assumption that ours is a government wholly by party instead of being a government by public opinion, chose the course first above outlined with what probable consequences to his policies and the welfare of the nation no patriotic American can contemplate without concern.

He took into his cabinet Frank Hitchcock, a professional politician, whose rawness of method is scarcely exceeded by that of our own Lieutenant Governor. On the advice of Hitchcock the President selected for the Interior portfolio, to further the interests of conservation, a man out of that portion of the country that is least in sympathy with conservation and most eager to enter upon exploitation of national resources, with consequences to the future to be left to the future. To prepare legislation for the restraint of predatory corporate interests he selected an attorney general trained by those interests and schooled to the idea that those interests ought to have what they want. Tariff revision he placed in the keeping of the finest representative of the economic philosophy that production is the only good, that profit on capital is the paramount concern and that if the multitude can get wages it is an impertinence for it to ask more. In charge of legislation for the control of railroads he placed one of the great railway feudal lords of our land, a man who stands for railroad control of government rather than for government control of railroads. And so on to the end of the chapter.

If the President had studied how not to accomplish the splendid program to which he had committed his administration he could not have prearranged his own defeat with greater certainty than he has done by the methods he has pursued. Not one man upon whom he has relied to bring his policies to fruition is a whole-hearted believer in those policies or will, if he can help it, permit more than the most meager pretense of those policies to be crystallized into law.

This does not imply the faithlessness of the President to the splendid policies he so early and so clearly proclaimed, but it does imply that he is a better judge of measures than of men, and that he lacks that mastery over forces at his command without which no man can be a doer of great works. A splendid subordinate, as he has again and again demonstrated himself to be, except he turn about, retrace his steps and choose the alternative course of action open to him at the start, the history of his administration will be written in terms of failure as an executive as humiliating as those scored by James Buchanan. Where the ways parted William Howard Taft took the road that led nowhere.

Merely a Contest

Mr. Supervisor Herget is authority for the statement that gentlemen Jeffries and Johnson are not to fight in San Francisco on the Fourth of July, or elsewhere or at all. They are merely to contest. Largess to Herget for his discovery!

We are also to understand from this that David did not go out to fight Goliath, but only to contest with him, that the American colonies contested with the mother country for eight years as the Netherlands contested with Spain for eighty years and with the sea unto this day. The war between the States which raged for four years was not in fact a war, but only a contest, and Theodore Roosevelt did not in fact establish peace between Japan and Russia, but instead merely brought the contest to a termination. Great is Herget. By the time he has finished softening the asperities of the English language, nothing will mean anything any more, and it will be impossible to employ the English language for describing a fight, if such a phenomenon should unhappily occur, by reason of not having words fit to convey the meaning, even as the verb "to kick" is inexpressible in the lingo of the French.

But cannot Herget and his McCarthyite associates be somehow taken at their word and the public assured that Jeffries and Johnson are, in very truth, not to fight? It will kill the pugilistic event deadlier than putrid mackerel. Assured that it is only to be a sparring match, not a hundred persons would cross the bay, to say nothing of crossing the continent, to witness the "contest" or pay more than fifty cents admission to get in if they arrived at the door of the hippodrome. To speak of the "contest" as "scientific" is also to take unwarranted liberties with our mother tongue. Not so much of science will be involved in the encounter as would suffice for mauling a tough beefsteak into tenderness with a rolling pin, for these pugilists get tougher and tougher the more they are mauled.

Away with such insincere pottering with our language! That event is either to be a fake or a fight. If it turns out a fake, thousands will be robbed of what they have come far and paid much to see, and if it turns out to be a fight to a finish of human endurance, it will prove an exhibition of brutality demoralizing to our national life, subversive of cordial relations between two races and a disgrace to a city that has been too much in the glare of reproach to endure greater degradation without danger of irreparable injury. San Francisco is accused of having no moral sense, and if that fight—"f-i-g-h-t," Mr. Hergert—comes off on the anniversary of our nation's life, there are millions who will accept the accusation at par value.

The Need and the Waste

Our "backbone" article for the week, from the pen of Mr. William Kent, has to do with those deeper concerns of the social whole which the law is little likely to reach and which must be dealt with, if at all, by what we may call the genius of our national life. "As a man thinketh so is he," and as a nation thinketh so is that nation. The wastes and burdens of our American national and industrial life are terrific. To be heedless of the fact is to be as irresponsible as the spendthrift and as certainly foredoomed to a heritage of poverty for the many and of indolent affluence for the few. The greater half of the problem of treating a disease lies in making a correct diagnosis. This Mr. Kent has done with an insight that is as creditable to his humanities as to his mental endowments, both not inconsiderable. There are those among us who would regulate and legislate these maladjustments out of the social body. They are the osteopaths of political economy and statesmanship, and they are not wholly in the wrong, but the malady lies deeper than massage can reach. It has its seat in the soul and is to be reached mainly by that subtle influence that has been pervading the vital earth for nineteen centuries, if not longer, like leaven hidden in measures of meal. We hear much of Christian socialism, but not as much as we need to hear of that Christian democracy that will make every man ill content to be either an industrial drone or a soldier in the countless host of the malemployed. The gospel of useful service needs a million advocates every day in the year.

United States of the World

The communication, in another column, expressing the hope that Theodore Roosevelt may see his way clear to head a movement for the formation of the United States of the World, and that he may be the first president of it, will strike a responsive chord in many hearts, but the brain of our correspondent is not the only one in which the idea has been incubating. It would probably be within bounds to say that it has taken a more or less definite form in the minds of millions in Europe as well as in America, and it cannot be that it has not had a place in the thinking of Theodore Roosevelt himself.

Theodore Roosevelt is now the most striking personality on the globe, but he has done nothing so far that entitles him to a permanent place in history shoulder to shoulder with Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Lincoln or Grant. He has planted much and tilled well, but except there be a harvest all his effort comes to naught and, except there be a permanent enrichment of the world because he has lived, he will not live in that select "Who Is Who" that survives the ravages of time. Caesar, Napoleon, Cromwell, even Wellington, all these have carved their names enduringly in the history of the world, but not yet Theodore Roosevelt. If he retire now it will be difficult a generation hence to point the spot where the wave of forgetfulness rolled over his devoted head. The man of the hour he has proved himself, but not the man of his time. In the heyday of life, good fortune favoring, he has time for that yet, but for it he needs a broader stage than this continent affords. He must become a world character or perish.

There is just one service, above all others, for the performance of which the world waits. Heavier almost than the burden of sin, harder almost to be borne than the burden of greed, rest upon the back of humanity the armaments of the world, maintained for wars that never come off, and need never. Almost the net results of the toil of two continents goes for the maintenance of that military and naval preparedness for war that no one wants, and as a prevention against war that is almost as costly as war. Our own peace-loving nation is about to contribute $134,000,000 to be thrown into the sea as propitiation of the god of war that he may grant us peace.

Almost anything can be done if only someone will do it. Secretary Philander C. Knox looms relatively small upon the globe's horizon, yet he is meeting with encouragement from the nations in his efforts to secure the permanency of The Hague Arbitral Court of Nations. Were Theodore Roosevelt, as special ambassador to the great nations in the interests of a permanent court of nations and a parliament of the world, to throw his transcendent personality into the scale in favor of a limited armament and federation of the great nations in the interests of world-order and world-peace there is no fore-knowing what results might follow. Much as we need him in the White House, now that conservation and regulation are at sixes and sevens, we can spare him for this greater task. It were ignoble in him to do this that his name may live, but if he do it his name will live, taking rank second only to that of the Prince of Peace.

Memorial Day Thoughts

Protest was made lest the orator of memorial day in San Francisco make the solemn ceremonial the occasion for expressions touching on morals or religion. There are elements in our social life that accept every such reference as directed to themselves, and with reason. Being under condemnation they wince at every tingle of the lash of criticism. When they hear a "Woe unto you, pharisees, hypocrites," their flesh quivers and their hearts quake.

But what shall any orator say on Memorial Day, that can be worth being said, if he take not for his text the eternal truth that, "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people," and seek to thrust the fact upon the consciousness of his hearers in all the ways that intelligence or genius may devise?

It is well to speak of the personal bravery of those who went forth to strive against an enemy that dared to meet them in the open field, but far more to the purpose to speak of that subtle greed and ignoble scheming that forced the war upon a long-suffering people; to speak of that commercial poltroonery that would have suffered the Union to be dismembered, and men to be held in bondage, lest business be hurt. All honor to those who bore the brunt of that conflict! All dishonor to those who paltered with wrong-doing that they might make a profit out of it, that debased statesmanship rather than vindicate the rights of man! Unless Memorial Day be the occasion for a searching of the souls of men it were better that it passed unobserved.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The writer well remembers the first time he saw the subject of this sketch. He was carrying an armful of fodder across the barnyard to his horse. Tall and slender he was then, but well made and active. The writer drew rein and chatted with him awhile, finding him intelligent and well informed about the things by which he was surrounded. He knew the good land from the poor, the crop that would pay from the one that would not, and nothing delighted him better than to get hold of a wild colt that he might break him to saddle.

But his father was concerned for him. He was given to hanging around Chinatown at the little city just springing up a few miles away and it was hard to keep him steadily applying himself. He never missed a dance within reach, and the father was afraid that the son might walk in his own footsteps, but he didn't. He came to himself within a few years and made a stalwart man of affairs.

Another picture the writer has of him as first baseman in a ball game. That position requires stability and reliability and he made good. When it came his turn at the bat the field men quickly scattered, for, if he did not sliver the bat or fan the air, he was certain to send that ball higher or farther than any other man on the team.

He was a practical man of affairs and yet cherished ideals. When he saw a piece of land he saw what it was good for and nothing suited him better than to marshal the forces of nature and of men, of horses and capital, to make that land productive, and he succeeded. He scored few failures and many successes, was always an unhurried man who, nevertheless, kept things humming in many activities. He cherished ideals and thought things out. His influence was on the right side, notwithstanding that many of his associations were commercialized to the last degree. It was profitable to consult him on almost any affair where common sense was needed. His education was only that of the common schools, and perhaps the business college, but he read much and ruminated over what he read to good effect. Sufficiently affluent to live where he cared to and go where he wished, he traveled some, shifted from place to place, wound up most of his enterprises and took things easy while yet in the very prime of his manhood. Who would not have written opposite his name in letters of gold that consummation of the American ideal—success?

When the change began to take place the writer knows not, for the subject of this sketch had passed out of the writer's orbit save as now and again chance threw them together as ships passing, greeting and going on, but certain it is that there was a disintegration. Purposeful hitherto, he began to take hold of affairs with nerveless hand. Steadfast theretofore, he began to flit from one enterprise to another, only skimming the surface of any, soon tiring and quitting. A mild cynicism began to manifest itself and then rumor hinted at a nervous breakdown followed by months of retirement during which his old associates knew not where he was. From this he by and by emerged to dabble a little in affairs. Then he stripped himself to his under garments, turned on the gas jets, stretched himself upon the floor of his room and the tragedy was complete. Majesty in ruins!

Who sinned, this man or his father, that failure should be written in terms of suicide? His father was a dipsomaniac, at any rate, a periodical drunkard. Somehow there was a deterioration of nerve element, a breaking down of fiber, a virility that sufficed only for youth and early manhood, a robustness that was more apparent than real. Or was he called upon to pay the penalty of refusing to pull his weight in the world before advancing years gave him a right to retire? It is not often that the world loses in a taking-off through suicide, as it probably did not in this instance, for he had quit. Inquests in such cases should be held by psychologists, alienists and moralists rather than by coroners. The suicide problem requires scientific research.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Government by Commission Increases

The growth of the commission form of government for municipalities, since it first was tried in Galveston, Texas, has been remarkable. Texas herself, having the first and closest view of the practical working of the plan, has given it her unqualified indorsement by adopting it in every city and town of any importance in the state. Kansas is not far behind, ninety per cent of her cities of any size now being operated under this form of government. Then comes Iowa, with more than three-fourths of her urban population governing itself in this manner. These are the states in which the plan has been most widely adopted, but there is hardly a state which contains no cities thus governed. Thus far some seventy of our cities have adopted the plan, these including a considerable number of 75,000 to 160,000 each. At present Buffalo, with a population of about 400,000, is the largest city with such a government, but although large communities move slowly, it is not the less a fact that they do move, and so it is reasonable to presume that a conception of the value of the Galveston plan gradually will work its way into the perceptions of the urbanites, and they then will adopt it. It was good seed that the once-demolished Texas city sowed, and it is spreading mightily.

They Voted the Devil In

The wicked agnostics who have insisted that there is no such thing as a personal devil may as well go 'way back and sit down in the seats of the scornful where they belong. They have been voted out, and at the same time the devil was voted in, by an educational council; and it must be admitted that those who educate the people should know what ails the people. It came to pass in Budapest, Hungary, in the following manner: A boy asked a certain professor whether such a thing as a devil exists. "No," the professor replied. "No sensible person believes in the existence of the devil." It chanced that religious exercises came next, and the boy sprung the professor's heresy then and there on the gentleman who conducted them. The class was dismissed immediately, the conductor presumably feeling that he could not conduct religious services without a personal devil. After that the war was on. A meeting of all the Budapest teachers was called, and the friends and enemies of his Satanic Majesty had their hands full for a time. Hot words were poured out like water, and the disputants exchanged uncomplimentary opinions of one another which were not under the sacred seal of confidence. Then a vote was taken, and the brimstone despot won out, his existence being affirmed. It grieves, however, to narrate that he did so by a close scratch, having a majority of but two. A variation of only two, and the Evil One would have been put out of business by educational fiat—and then how would a person account for some of the business he sees transacted?

Estimates of City Population

Neither official nor semi-official estimates of the population of the chief cities of the United States can yet be obtained, but a certain amount of subdued interest pertains to the estimates formed by statistical experts and based on such more or less accurate information as they can obtain. The population of the eleven largest cities of the country according to the census of 1900 and their population, thus estimated, in 1910, follow: New York, 3,431,202 and 4,730,350; Chicago, 1,698,575 and 2,610,681; Philadelphia, 1,293,697 and 1,545,800; St. Louis, 575,238 and 750,000; Boston, 560,892 and 629,478; Baltimore, 508,957 and 650,000; Cleveland, 381,768 and 550,000; Buffalo, 352,902 and 460,000; Pittsburg, 321,616 and 580,000. The interesting feature of these estimates is the relative standing of the various cities in 1900 and 1910. New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and St. Louis retain their places at the head of the list, Baltimore and Boston exchange fifth and sixth places, Pittsburg leaps from eleventh to seventh place, and Cleveland, Buffalo, San Francisco and Cincinnati drop a notch apiece in the scale. Pittsburg, it will be noted, has been "going some;" at any rate, if the estimates are approximately correct, but how crude and unreliable they are will be appreciated when it is observed that a number of the cities (San Francisco, for instance) are "lumped off" in hundreds or fifties of thousands of population. We shall know more about it after Uncle Sam has made his announcements.

The Increase of Insanity

Insanity is steadily increasing in our country. That is to say, it increases more rapidly than the population. This is the report from nearly or quite all of the states, but a few illustrations will be cited to show the degree of increase. During the last two decades the population of the state of New York increased 53 per cent; insanity increased 97 per cent, or nearly twice as fast as the population did, and there is one lunatic to every 340 inhabitants. In Idaho the proportion of insane in state charge in 1880 was as one to 1300 of population, in 1900 it was one in 769; in Washington in 1880 it was one in 695, in 1900 one in 402. About thus the record runs in all of the states. Heredity is the chief cause of insanity, but alcoholism is a close second. Here is a fact that is worthy of note: In 1900, 80.5 of our population of ten years of age or over were native born, and 19.5 per cent were foreign born. But only 65.7 per cent of the insane in public care were of native birth, while 34.3 per cent were of foreign birth. That is, the proportion of foreign born insane was more than double that of the native born. The deduced argument in favor of more stringent regulations to guard ourselves against inoculation with this virus of insanity seems to be difficult to answer. In a country where mad and unreasoning hurry trends toward insanity anyway, we cannot too carefully guard against introducing more.

The Earth's Hot Interior

It is warm down stairs, provided the stairs go deep enough—which is merely a metaphorical method of announcing the long-recognized fact that the interior of the earth constantly grows hotter as its center is approached. Recently, by means of a hole bored near Czu-chow, Upper Silesia, its temperature has been taken at the greatest depth yet tested by man. The hole is about six inches in diameter, was bored for the sake of obtaining scientific data, and it was the original intention that it should attain a depth of 8,200 feet, but the increasing difficulty of boring put an end to the work at 7,456 feet. At that depth the temperature of the earth was 182 degrees, Fahrenheit, above zero. The test agreed with those heretofore made in determining that the temperature increases a degree with every 54 feet of descent. The tests were official, inasmuch as they were made under the authority and control of the Prussian government.

The Horse Still Is Here

When the bicycle came in many people said, "Well, the horse will have to go," but the horse stayed. Then the automobile came, and more people said, "Well, the horse certainly will go this time." The horse still is here, but it may be mere justice to the prophets of equine-disaster to say that his numbers are decreasing in the great cities. For instance, ten years ago there were 450,000 horses in the city of London, and now there are but 110,000; more than three-fourths of them are gone. More and more the horse will become a rarity in the cities, but the country will not lose him, and he still will continue to render his valuable services unto mankind.

David Belasco is going to change the name of his Forty-second Street Theater in New York back to the Republic, and the present Stuyvesant on Forty-fourth street will hereafter be the Belasco "Home" Theater.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

IT'S OUR MOVE

TO OUR NEW STORE AT

42 and 44 CALIFORNIA ST.

One half block off Market St.

Calendars, Pocket Diaries
Office Diaries for 1910

LE COUNT, CLARK & ORMOND

STATIONERS AND PRINTERS
San Francisco

MAGAZINE

Subscription Agency

216 OAKLAND BANK OF
SAVINGS BUILDING

Cor. 12th and Broadway
Oakland

We take subscriptions for any Magazine or Paper published in the world at reduced rates.

TELEPHONE OAKLAND 3786

BRANDON & WATSON

A Post Card will bring our 44
page catalogue to your door.

"We Hold Thee Safe"

QUEEN

INSURANCE CO.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

ROLLA V. WATT

MANAGER

N. W. Corner Pine and Sansome Streets
SAN FRANCISCO

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

COSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

SEA-SLEEP

By Thomas Lake Harris

Sleep, sleep, sleep
In thy folded waves, O Sea!
Till the quiet breathings creep
With a low-voiced melody,
Out of the glimmering deep.
For sleep is the close of life;
'Tis the end of love, and its birth;
'Tis the quieting of strife,
And the silencing of mirth.
Hush and sleep!

Close thou thy lids, O Sea,
On palaces and towers;
Dream on deliciously
Deep in thy dreamland bowers.
Waken us not again,
Beating upon our shore,
Rousing the strife in men
With full and thunderous roar.

Drop from thy crested heights,
To still repose and rest;
Fold us in hushed delights,
With dream-flowers from thy breast:
Not as the poppies are
But lilies cool, that weep
Tears that as kisses scar
To soothe for slumbers deep.

Hush thou the little waves,
Hush with a low-voiced song,
Till the Under-Deep that laves
Thy lucid floor lifts strong;
Till the Under-Word is borne
To this weary world of ours,
And lives, for love that mourns,
Fold as as the dew-dipped flowers.

Rest thou in time's unrest,
In the bloom-bell and the brain;
Then loose, all silver-tressed,
The streamings of thy mane:
Gliding, dissolving so,
That we at peace may be,
Sleep in thy silver glow,
Thy azure calm, O Sea;
Make lullaby!

"REPRINT" BOOKS

A new field of profit for authors and publishers, and a new source of enjoyment for the public, has been opened up in recent years through the development of the practice of making cheap "reprints" of popular novels. The first editions of nearly all novels sell for $1.50 a copy. Most novels do not last longer than one year. Those that do sell for a greater length of time may continue to be profitable at that price for two or three years longer. But, except in the case of an extraordinary novel, that is the limit of potential sale at such a price.

Until lately, the reaching of this point in the career of a book meant the end of it as a commercial asset. But a firm of young men in Philadelphia conceived the idea of buying the plates of books that had reached this stage, and making very cheap reprints from them, to be sold by the retail trade at 50 cents a copy. The idea seemed fantastic when it was first suggested, but some remarkable results have been achieved with it.

For instance, there is a book called "Freckles," a very pleasant little story that was published four or five years ago without making any particular stir in the world. It sold fairly well—say ten thousand copies. That is a moderate success. The book went to the end of its rope as a selling proposition at the regular price, and was about ready to die peacefully and noiselessly. Then the reprint men came along and bought the plates. They agreed to pay the original publishers a small royalty, and the author an equal amount, on every copy they should sell. They have lately sold the one hundred and sixtieth thousand of this cheap edition, and see no indications of a failing sale of it for years to come.

This is only one example of a more and more frequently recurring phenomenon.

ADVANCE ROYALTIES

Authors whose books sell from 80,000 to 100,000 copies receive from $25,000 to $30,000 royalty on each novel. Royalty to authors of this rank is 20 per cent of the retail sale price, or 30 cents a copy. There are not many writers so successful as this, but John Fox, Jr., James Lane Allen, Ellen Glasgow, Mrs. Humphry Ward, Winston Churchill and several others, sell this well.

An incident in this connection is the payment to such authors of royalties before they are earned. Any of the writers named above can go to their publishers and ask for an advance on the royalties of a forthcoming novel. Some of them have received as much as $20,000 in advance royalties on a book that they have not only not written but whose subject, even, they have not decided upon.

PLACING "DAVID HARUM"

It is not generally known that the manuscript of "David Harum" was turned down by practically every publisher in the United States before it was finally printed, but such is the fact. After several years of travel from "reader" to "reader," the author took it back to Appleton's, who were the first people to read it. He asked for one more examination of it. The answer was this: "Our regular reader has turned it down, and to please you we have had it re-read by five or six men in the house on whose judgment we finally rely. Every one of them says it is no good. But if you insist on it, and it will make you any happier, we'll put it on our list, but we warn you it will never pay the cost of printing."

The author did insist, and the book was an instantaneous success, selling more copies than any other book ever published sold in the same length of time. To date, including the cheaper reprint editions, "David Harum" has sold more than a million and a half copies. The author's royalties, had he lived to enjoy them, would now amount to about $300,000.

REFORMED JUDAISM

A large share of present-day Jews have reinterpreted the religious literature of Judaism, and have altered many phases of the orthodox faith. A leader in this movement is Dr. Joseph Silverman, rabbi of the Temple Emanu-el of New York. The New York Times, which is owned by a Jew, gives the following account of this liberalizing movement:

"In furtherance of their ideals, Reformers have distinguished in Judaism between the essentials and the non-essentials, the essentials being as follows:

"First: Acceptance of the belief in the unity and spirituality of the Godhead, based upon the Biblical doctrine: 'Hear, O Israel! The Lord our God, the Lord is One.'

"Second: Worship of God through suitable prayers and ceremonies in harmony with modern conditions, based upon the Biblical doctrine: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul and with all thy mind.'

"Third: Obedience to the moral law, especially the Decalogue, based upon the Biblical injunction: 'These are the laws which thou shalt keep in order that thou shalt live through them; thou shalt love thy fellow-man as thyself.'

"Fourth: Salvation or spiritual regeneration through righteousness, based upon the Biblical phrase: 'He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?'

"Fifth: The law of eternal progress, leading us ever nearer to perfection, based on the verses: 'And God through Moses told the children of Israel that they should go forward.' 'The path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.'

"Sixth: The ultimate redemption and the unity of all mankind, based on the Biblical teaching: 'Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us all? Why, then, shall we deal treacherously one against the other?'

"Seventh: The mission of Israel as the world's priest people, based upon the doctrine of the Bible: 'Ye shall be a kingdom of priests and a holy people,' and upon the words given to Abraham: 'Through thee shall all the nations of the world be blessed.'

"Eighth: Belief in the Messianic era fore-shadowed by the Prophets, a time when men shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruninghooks and learn the arts of war no more.'

"In the spirit of these principles and ideals reformers have revised the Jewish prayer book, have eliminated from it every expression of a purely national character, the prayer for the rebuilding of the Palestinian kingdom, for the coming of the Redeemer to Zion, for the restoration of the ancient temple, the prayer for the resurrection of the dead, and have retained or substituted prayers for the welfare of the country in which we live, for the establishment of God's kingdom on earth, for immortality of the soul.

"Reform Judaism has ceased to keep a day of mourning for the loss of the ancient Palestinian kingdom, because it accepts the decree of heaven, the logic of incontrovertible conditions, and looks forward with hope of success to a spiritual conquest of humanity.

"Reform Judaism is not destructive, as has been often claimed. It is not a negation; it is a positive constructive religion. While it has permitted laxity in the practice of the dietary laws and the performance of certain rites, while it may have abrogated other laws and practices, it has on the whole not taken away anything from Judaism that was essential for the preservation of its essence; but has rather engrafted upon it many new forms that have redounded to the dignity of the religious worship and the permanent benefit of the faith. It has removed the hat-covering from men in the synagogue, and has abolished the women's gallery, instituted family pews, prayers and sermons in the vernacular, the organ and the mixed choir, with modern music, in addition to traditional tunes. It has given us the institution of confirmation for boys and girls in place of Bal Mitzvah for boys only. It has retained the historical Sabbath, and every festival that teaches an eternal truth, like the truths of freedom, revelation, repentance, reformation, thanksgiving, and loyalty to one's convictions. It has instituted late Friday evening and Sunday services and lectures. It has given us the modern religious school, has emphasized the ethical points of our religion more than the ceremonial, and has taught that the ceremonial is only a means to an end, a vessel to carry the spiritual truths to the mind and the heart in plastic form, and when the vessel has become impaired it may be changed for a better one.

"Reform has, above all, insisted upon the precept and practice of the doctrines of truth, love, charity, patriotism, justice, humanity, as the Bible has taught. It has insisted upon teaching that God is Truth absolute, Love absolute, Justice absolute in the universe. And we find all that in essence in the Bible and the Talmud."

LOST LINES OF "ELEGY"

The following lines were dropped from Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," because they retarded the movement of the poem. Lowell said of them that they could not be obliterated from the memory of man, even if Gray did run his pen through them:

"There scattered oft, the earliest of the year,
By hands unseen are show'rs of violets found;

The redbreast loves to build and warble there,
And little footsteps lightly print the ground."

A new Dooley book, to be called "Mr. Dooley Says," by Finley Peter Dunne, is to be brought out soon. These, the latest and some of the best of Mr. Dooley's sayings, include his opinions on Divorce, Glory, Woman Suffrage, The Bachelor Tax, Panics, Ocean Travel, Work, Drugs, the Rising of Subject Races, and many other things.

ALLISON WARE

AN EDUCATOR WITH PROGRESSIVE IDEAS ABOUT HIGH SCHOOLS

Mr. Allison Ware is an educator with ideas as well as ideals. He has worked with his hands as well as with his head. He has seen life as a college student, as a day laborer, as a citizen of a boom mining camp in Alaska, as a teacher in the public schools, and as a teacher of teachers in the State Normal School at San Francisco. He has thus been steeped, not only in education for life, but in life as an education.

He has thus had the full advantage of a technical training for the technical profession of teaching. But he has, in addition, retained the openness of mind to new ideas that comes only from practical experience in the world of men. These new ideas have taken form in definite plans for progress in the practice of teaching in the public schools. It is to attain the opportunity to present these plans to the teachers of California that Mr. Ware has listened to the persuasions of his friends that he run for the office of State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Before discussing these ideas, however, let us run over, briefly, Mr. Ware's career. He is thirty years of age; born in Santa Rosa, he was there educated in the public schools, and thence entered the University of California. After two years and a half of college work, he left the university, and married. He entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Company as a fireman on the trains running out of San Francisco. After three months labor as a coal-passer, he joined the first big gold rush to Nome, Alaska. There he did many things. He went to practice law, but there were neither law nor courts. He dug for gold. He traded in miner's outfits. He sold steamship tickets. For a time he worked as a common laborer on lighter barges, landing goods from ships. One day he worked twenty hours at a stretch, but as longshoremen earned $1.00 an hour, that was not so bad.

Alaska did not give Mr. Ware a fortune, but it did give him enough to pay for his return to the University of California, and the completion of his course. He now determined to teach school until he could save enough to permit him to settle in some county seat and hold out until he could build up a practice as a lawyer. His teaching experience of a year each at Lemoore and Hanford in Kings county, decided him to stay in the teaching profession. He had found his life work.

Five years ago, immediately following his term at Hanford, Mr. Ware was offered a position as assistant to the principal of the San Francisco State Normal School. Here he has been ever since. Here his mind has become broadened, his reputation has gone out over all the State as a thinker, as a brilliant speaker and as an unusual instructor.

To return to Mr. Ware's ideas, he was astonished to find that the school statistics of California show that 70 per cent of the boys who enter high school never finish the course, and that a smaller, but not less significant, percentage of the girls also drops out. Mr. Ware then searched the curriculum of the schools to find the reason. Here is the condition that he found:

All the courses of study in the ordinary high school have been planned with an eye single to the purpose of preparing students for the universities, and the courses of the universities have largely been designed to graduate specialists in scholarship.

Now, said Mr. Ware, it is not more reasonable to expect that all boys and all girls shall wish to be specialists in scholarship than it is reasonable to suppose that all boys and all girls shall wish to be specialists in medicine, or law, or farming, or blacksmithing. Specialists in scholarship are indispensable, but they are a very small proportion of the people.

Why not, then, alter the courses of instruction in high schools so as to bring them closer in touch with the life which the average high school pupil means to lead?

Some steps have already been taken in this direction. Manual training has been tried, but there is still much to do before it will be a practical, effective preparation for life needs.

Polytechnic high schools were founded. They have been eagerly patronized, showing that they answer a genuine need, and that, for a percentage of the students at least, they have brought high school instruction into touch with real life. Besides these, there should be opportunity for boys and girls to learn industrial trades, and in each populous farming district there should be an agricultural school where farm life is given the study it deserves.

But, most important of all, the ordinary courses in high schools, thought Mr. Ware, could be so altered as to bring them into intelligible relation to life, so that students would find them so interesting and so useful that they would be anxious to fill out the full four years of high school study. There is,

MR. ALLISON WARE

he says, a useful culture and a useful scholarship of worth to all of the boys and girls of the land. For instance, consider how English is taught in the high schools, and how it might be taught. The student in high schools as they are is introduced to English literature with Milton's "Lycidas," "Paradise Lost" and "Comus." These poems have their interest for the specialist in literature, and for those of mature taste and large reading, whose appetite for books has been refined and educated to a point where they can appreciate them. But the young mind, overflowing with energy, and fresh from contact with the contemporaneous world of vivid realities, finds in these English songs only a puzzling medley of long forgotten gods and strange inversions of archaic English, that do not sing to him of things present or things familiar.

In the schools as they are, too often the student is introduced to the English novel through the medium of one of the worst novels conceivable for the purpose—"The Vicar of Wakefield," which also deals with obsolete customs, strange peoples and the unfamiliar past.

Why not, says Mr. Ware, give American boys and American girls an introduction to English literature through the old, world-worn poetry and legend and literature of the race, as well as through the best of contemporaneous writings which sing or tell of American, local, familiar things and people in stirring modern English? For example, a student is far more likely to acquire a taste for fiction if the first novel that he reads be one by Owen Wister or Winston Churchill, than if it be by Goldsmith or Fielding.

Again, consider history as it is taught and as it might be taught. The history that is dinned into pupils of the high schools is the history of age-old kings and governments, of Carthaginian merchant princes, Pharaohs mummied and unnamed these two thousand years. Children early in their teens are taught of charters, treaties of peace between puny European states, petty rulers, interminable and meaningless dates.

Can children be expected to acquire a taste for history with such an unreal and unappetizing introduction as this? By no means. Why not begin the teaching of history in the high schools with the period of McKinley's first election, and teach the children facts about American life as it is lived now by their fathers and mothers, American life as they will live it ten years from now, using the familiar names and incidents of which they hear daily at their homes, giving form and substance and continuity to the facts which they have already largely in their minds in rough outline? Then, as they advance in grade, trace back into early epochs of American history movements and men that shape this time as we find it. Advancing further still, trace back American origins into English history, and, last of all, join this knowledge of the present and the immediate past with the long and dimming perspective of universal history.

The schools teach modern science. They do so in response to a demand that became effective twenty-five years ago—this same demand that education be brought into closer relation with life. The science courses, also, have been edited by specialists in scholarship. The specialists have removed from the courses all those things that have anything to do with every-day life, and have left only the technical skeleton of science—the laboratory demonstrations of abstract principles. For example, high school students perform laboratory experiments to determine the relative resistance of various substances to the passage of a current of electricity. It is to be doubted if one student in a thousand who performs these experiments successfully was ever told that the homely incandescent lamp is one of the practical applications of that knowledge. It is certainly improbable that Edison knew as much about resistance, when he invented the lamp, as the average high school student is taught in his physics class.

Life is full of science, but it is science applied. It is applied in the work of conservation, sanitation, good health movements, and in all the marvelous and wonder working inventions of the age. Let boys and girls who are to understand the world today be taught the applications of science rather than the technical scientific scholarship that deals with abstract principles unapplied to human use.

These examples only illustrate Mr. Ware's idea of the radical deficiencies in high school instruction, and of a remedy for them. They do not give anything like a complete expression of his ideas, but, as Superintendent of Public Instruction, Mr. Ware would be in a position to expound these ideas with the entire public school system of the State for his interested audience. Undoubtedly, he could thus perform a great public service in bringing the common schools closer to the needs and uses of the twentieth century.

Another idea of Mr. Ware's relates especially to the function of State Superintendent. That office, in California at least, has hitherto been mainly engaged in clerical duties. It has had little influence in unifying the practice of teaching in California. It has gathered sta-

(Continued on Page 431.)

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Honey, Mah Honey

Honey, mah honey, de ebenin' shades am fallin'.
De shaddahs gittin' longah an' de air am growin' chill.
An' Ah heah de ghost ob voices dat am callin', dey am callin'.
De voices unfohgotten dat forebahmo' am still.
Ah am waitin' foh de summons w'en de dulles' ear mus' listen;
Mah haht am beatin' slowah dan hit ebah use ter do.
An' at times de teahdrops gaddah an' upon mah cheek dey glisten.
W'en Ah'm yeahnin', oh, mah honey, Ah am yeahnin' unto you.
Ah wants to hol' yo' hand in mine,
Ah wants to see yo' deah eyes shine
Wid lub dat made mah life divine,
Mah honey, oh, mah honey!

Honey, mah honey, mah haht am cryin',
"Lonely!"
An' Ah listen foh an ansah from de lan' beyon' de mist;
But dah isn't any ansah 'cept de night win's sighin' only,
An' only in mah dreamin' by de lips ob lub Ah'm kissed;
De feet dat use ter hurry dey am totterin' on de highway,
An' Ah nebah see de faces ob companions dat I knew,
An' de great, broad road ob libin' am a narrer, narrer byway,
An' Ah'm yeahnin', oh, mah honey, Ah am yeahnin' unto you.
Ah wants to meet yo' on dat sho'
Whah dah's no pahtin' ebahmo',
An' lin' de lub dat went befo',
Mah honey, oh, mah honey!

Thoughtful Man on the Situation

"The country must be saved," said the Thoughtful Man; "it must be preserved—not necessarily in alcohol, as my friends of the Royal Arch feel would be best, but preserved from the hoi polloi. Who are the hoi polloi, do you ask? Sir, they are the people. Who are the people? Sir, they are the hoi polloi. The country must be saved from them; saved by the few deft individuals who have learned how to manipulate it.

"This talk of surrendering a government of the people, by the people and for the people, to the people must be nipped in the bud, sir. The people are unworthy to rule themselves. If they were not, do you suppose that for thirty years they would have submitted to be ruled by a handful of men distinguished for cash more than for brains and for acquisitiveness rather than for conscience? Can a people who have, with bovine placidity, submitted to such self-stultification be capable of governing themselves? Not on your life! The men who are willing to govern them for the proceeds really are doing them a favor.

"We stand ready, sir, to govern these people who have during thirty years demonstrated their incapacity to do anything for themselves. Curry is ready, so is Anderson, so is Stanton, so is Ellery (in his dream), and, above all, so is Herrin. With these ready, what more could we ask? Any one of them would fill the breach, and, as is well known, Herrin already fills the breaches. You are with us, are you not?"

"Yes, but so was a carbuncle with the man's neck," said I.

Hot Air

Congressman Sylvester C. Smith, whose vocation, aside from politics, is that of editor, recently announced that if he were running for mayor he would, as a sort of preliminary, desire to slap the face of every editor in the threatened city.

Shall we, then, fear when Smith's around,
And plead for Heaven's care?
Ah, no! From Bakersfield he hails,
And merely gives what there prevails—
Hot air.

The Opinions of Rufus

Consid'rin' es evil communications corrupt good manners, I'm blowed if I see how some married folks keep es respectable es they do.

The man whose opinions are too sot sometimes is unpleasant company, but he's a kingpin compared with the man that never has any opinions till he finds out which side is payin' the most.

A hen's cackle ain't es musical es a canary's warble, but, with eggs at present prices, it's fully es soothin'.

It's said that all things come to him that waits, but I can't help noticin' that some of the things that come don't justify much hangin' round for 'em.

When I hear a man sayin' mean things 'bout women I can't help wonderin' 'bout his mother.

When I see one criminal goin' to state prison an' another criminal settin' at educational banquets—well, I can't help thankin' God that his justice ain't claimed to be the same es man's.

The man that looks with suspicion on all men may be mistaken, but I'll bet he's middlin' well acquainted with himself.

I come a long way frum losin' all confidence in any man whose wife an' children believe in him.

'Bout the only brilliant thing 'bout some people I've met is the diamonds they wear. Prob'ly you've noticed the same kind, ain't you?

If we folks could see each other jest es we reely are—well, where do you reckon would be the best place to hide?

They Saw the Comet, but—

The record of one of the best truthful stories I have heard concerning comet-gazers runs as follows:

Some thirty or forty people who reside near the intersection of Ellis and Gough streets, San Francisco, decided that they would see the comet before daybreak of the 16th instant. So about 2 or 3 o'clock a. m. they crawled out of their warm, comfortable beds, donned clothing sufficient to pass muster in the eyes of a critical, comet-gazing world, and went out on the chill and inhospitable streets. It was so c-c-c-cold! You have no idea how c-c-c-cold it was unless you were out.

And the worst of it was that they couldn't find any comet. This was very disappointing, and they tried to run down several stars and make comets of them, but they didn't succeed, not strikingly so, anyway, for the stars preferred to remain just common, ordinary stars. Finally one of these incipient astronomers discovered something.

"Why, girls," she said, "see what a perfectly lovely searchlight there is above our heads!"

The other scientists said that it was, indeed, perfectly lovely, and they fell to wondering where it originated. Some thought it came from Goat island, others from a man-of-war, and yet others from the chutes, but finally all agreed that they couldn't afford to be monkeying with a searchlight when a comet was waiting to be found, and so they returned to their labor of trying to attach tails to several of the fixed stars. They retired from the unsuccessful field about sunrise, and they were a unit in agreeing that comets don't repay the labor people expend upon them.

But when I told one of these embryo astronomers that the searchlight she saw was the comet's tail all that she said was, "Why, how funny, ain't it!"

A Literary Star Rising

"I reckon Si's boy 'll be a editor."

"What makes you think so?"

"I seen that he has a signed article in the paper every day now."

"Shucks, you don't say so! What's he writin' 'bout?"

"'Bout how Snooks' pills has regerlated his liver an' made him take a reel int'rest in livin'."

The Road to Yesterday

(Will F. Griffin, who formerly wrote a daily "feature" column for the Milwaukee Sentinel, and whose work has been widely republished, sends me the following beautiful little poem, with the suggestion that he has no particular use for it just now and that some day when I feel like it I may publish it as my own. I publish it with pleasure, and with regret that I did not write it, and I hope that the "Press Humorist" boys will pass it along, remembering that Will F. Griffin is its author.)

Ashes there are and ruins old,
And crumbled walls that once were fair;
Bleak and barren the lea and cold,
And wilted blooms are everywhere.
Hopes that lived when the blood was wild
Are lost, forgotten upon the way;
Gone are the dreams when fortune smiled
Upon the road to yesterday.

Gone are the songs we used to sing,
The songs we heard when twilight fell;
Gone is the laughter's cheery ring,
And the blossomed paths we knew so well.
The causeway stones wound weary feet,
The skies, once sunlit, now are gray,
And eyes and lips no longer meet
Upon the road to yesterday!

The Big Things and the Little

Long years ago, Elnathan, when I was younger than I am now, I used to find much pleasure in contemplating the big things I would do in life. I knew that I could do these big things, for I had met several people who did them—but not as big things as I was going to do—and I had observed that they ate, slept and wore clothing much as I did, and hence it followed—but why should I continue the argument when already you can see the unanswerable force of it?

There was one serious defect in these big things I was going to do; they didn't arrive. Each day was fairly jammed full of little things of no particular importance—such things as earning a living and performing the trifling duties of the moment—and, as I couldn't afford to spare time to them, about all I could do was to wait for the big things, which didn't arrive.

Elnathan, they have not yet arrived, and I have become terribly tired in waiting for them. More than that, as the years have passed, the conviction has been beaten home to me that man attains the big things only by plodding wearily along a highway of little things, for by worthiness of the petty he demonstrates that life safely may bring him face to face with the great.

Get busy with the little things, Elnathan. Don't neglect them. Some of us old duffers have done so, and, with such regret as we do not often express, we are paying the price. Nothing great comes to him whom ten thousand wee things have not tested. If there are exceptions to that rule there are not enough so that you are likely to catch any of them. Carry your grains of sand for life's Supreme Builder, and perhaps when you have carried many you will be surprised to find there are enough to make a noticeable addition to the structure He builds.

The Cause of the Haste

The Devil one day was bossing a job,

And had it in personal care.

He had a big cauldron outside of the Pit,

(For they do not keep water in there)

And little red demons were running around,

As busy as busy could be,

Bringing water and lime from holes in the ground,

And mixing, with chortles of glee.

"Now, prithee, Sir Satan," I cried unto him,

"What meaneth this hurry below?"

"Ha ha ha! ho ho ho!" he straightly replied,

"A hurry-up order, you know.

A learned committee full soon will report—

Now hurry, you demons! and race!

And the stuff I am mixing they'll need in that court—

'Tis whitewash for Ballinger's case."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

It Is Not the Cost But Is the Smut The unavailing efforts of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau to find a candidate to try conclusions with Judge John D. Works before the people for endorsement for the United States Senate is at once amusing and instructive. Has it come to pass that men disdain a seat in the Senate of the United States? Has an office that was held to confer honor upon Clay and Webster, Calhoun and Benton, been so emptied of honor that men are no longer attracted to it? If so, why so? The pretense that it is the inordinate cost of making the campaign before the people under the direct primary law that deters men is not to be taken seriously. Whoever spends as much as $3000 in making such a canvass should be deprived of his office as obtained on the score of being a lawbreaker and not a law maker. Judge Works will make his campaign for a sum entirely within the law. The fact is that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company can not fetch out a candidate without having it thoroughly known that that bureau fetched him out, and to be brought out by that bureau is to be daubed with the soot, the smudge, the axle grease of railroading, not at all objectionable in a man who is a railroader and not ashamed of his calling, but galling to a man who is a railroader and is ashamed of it. Practical railroading and political railroading are different in that the one is honorable and useful, the other dishonorable and a never ending disgrace to any one caught in the act. That's why men, real men, shy at the senatorial toga when proffered by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. It is reason enough.

His Platform Of Principles Charles F. Curry is a fair spoken man. If he could take all the voters in California aside, singly and alone, he would make his platform to fit the views of everyone of them hand-running, not so much because he is insincere as because his mental processes are all political, and it is politic to agree rather than to disagree with those one wishes to have vote for him. Not being able to meet his constituency man to man, Mr. Curry has attempted to agree with them en bloc through 28½ inches of fine type in the San Francisco Call of Sunday last. He has succeeded admirably. Only in relation to two issues raised by Mr. Curry can there be any conflict between him and any citizen of California. One is as to its being the duty of the Governor, under the law as it is, "to supervise every institution and utility the State controls and upon which it expends public money, to command the conduct of prisons and reformatories, to direct the expenditures of funds upon State utilities and enterprises, such as water fronts, harbors and roads." The other is "the restoration of district fairs accompanied by State aid." There may be those who object to the first issue raised by Mr. Curry on the ground that the laws of California provide an elaborate system of institutional boards, commissioners, directors and regents upon whose shoulders, rather than upon those of the Governor, is placed responsibility for the conduct of State institutions. As to these boards, the Governor maintains only an advisory rather than a directory relation under the law. It might work better to make the Governor the whole thing, the more certainly if Mr. Curry happened not to be made Governor, but it is not so nominated in the constitution or the laws of this State, which the Governor will be sworn to uphold. The second plank in the Curry platform over which there may be controversy is the restoration of the district racing system accompanied by State aid, yclept district fairs. To be sure, the law declared that the State's money should not go to support racing, but, in practice, it got there just the same, albeit by a circuitous route. Mr. Curry's attitude on this issue is to be accounted for by reason of his predilection for whatever measure carries an appropriation for him to have a hand in expending or that creates a job that he may help to fill. But for these two sources of possible controversy, Mr. Curry's platform is as unobjectionable as a last year's almanac.

Important Function Performed by Proxy By death a vacancy has been created in the board of supervisors in Orange County. By neglect of the law to provide other method of filling the vacancy, it must be filled by the Governor of the State. The Governor of California does not know the needs of the third supervisorial district of Orange County and is therefore incompetent to discharge the duty imposed upon him by the constitution, in the absence of a statute in such case made and provided. Therefore, he serves notice upon the Republican county central committee of Orange County to convene and advise him whom to appoint and he will appoint that person. The Republican county central committee represents only Republicans of the whole county and not of the third district alone. The appointment made by it will be wholly political and unlikely to be such as the people themselves might elect to make. The whole concept is wrong. The Governor should have nothing to do with filling that vacancy and neither should the central committee of any party. Either the supervisors should order an election in that district or else the board should elect some one to fill the vacancy until the next general election. This is only a minor instance where duties are imposed upon the Governor that should not be, but it gives rise to enough vexation and petty politics to warrant the enactment of a sensible law on the subject. Things done by proxy are seldom done well.

William J. Bryan Misses the Point On the eve of sailing for Europe Mr. William Jennings Bryan spoke hopefully of Democratic success in the presidential election of 1912, but declared that all would depend upon the record to be made by the next Congress, which he hoped would be Democratic. Whether the Republican or Democratic party succeeds in the next election is quite beside the point at issue, which is whether or not the resources of this country are to be conserved for the enjoyment of all the people or mainly for a few privileged corporations as a means of taxing the people for the necessities of life for generations to come. That is not a party issue. It is an issue involving the Rights of Man, and in its consideration party should be forgotten in the interests of the country. Whenever this line of cleavage is drawn it cuts rights down through both political parties, leaving the multitude on the one side and most of the money, at least organized capital, on the other. It may never be possible to make party lines coterminous with this line of cleavage for the reason that the moment any political party begins to show that it possesses real power, selfish interests will rally to it for the purpose of using it to their own advantage. Hence most victories of Right Things over wrong will have to be won with small regard to party lines. It is not party success that we are so much concerned for, Mr. Bryan, as it is the success of the upward movement of the human mass.

John Fairweather For the Assembly Honest John Fairweather is out for the Republican nomination for the Assembly in the Sixtieth district, and we are entitled to hold the opinion that grass is not growing any in those streets of Fresno over which it becomes necessary for John Fairweather to speed in search of signers for his nomination papers. He is a laggard neither in love, in war nor in politics. Nor is the Assembly chamber a stranger to his voice. A low tariff man by inheritance and nativity, for he was born in England, he used to be a Democrat and, as such, served one term in the Assembly, but he appears to have recanted his Democracy by coming into the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League two years ago. He will try conclusions with Mr. W. A. Sutherland in his race for the nomination and already has his nomination papers quite well along.

His patronymic is not wholly indicative of his character, for, if things do not go as John Fairweather thinks they ought to, it is likely to be squally in his vicinity until things are put to rights. He is neither a cipher nor a knot-on-a-log, and wherever he is there is something doing.

Clerk Keyes Is Not Off Wrong A fortnight ago The California Weekly stated Clerk Keyes of Los Angeles County was off wrong in that he had declared against filing supplementary petitions if, after inspection of the nomination papers, he found that the papers of any candidate fell short of the required number of verified signatures. We are advised that, so far, there has been no need for refusing to receive additional names inasmuch as all petitions filed in that county have had more than enough names after being verified. Furthermore, while advised by the office of the District Attorney that the intent of the law is that petitions shall not be filed piecemeal, Clerk Keyes has not refused to accept any supplemental petitions made necessary by falling short of the required percentage after verification. We hope he will not. Every candidate should make sure of having enough before he files, but it would be a hardship to deprive a candidate of a place on the primary ticket for the reason that, after elimination through verification, he was found to lack half a dozen names.

Opposition Fizzling Out Even Democratic opposition to J. C. Needham appears to be fizzling out, and there has not been any determined opposition to him in the Republican camp, even among the Lincoln-Rooseveltters, who do not all approve his stand-pat proclivities and yet would dislike to see him displaced by a man new to legislative halls. Senator Holohan feels that he does not come from the right end of the district to be able to try conclusions with Needham to an advantage and that it should be a valley man to go up against him. And, besides, Senator Holohan has two more years in the State Senate to his credit which he feels that he can use profitably for the State. His record in the last Legislature was a good one. Senator Cartwright would be the natural candidate against Needham, being from Fresno and identified with those industries which have been looking to Needham for protection, but Mr. Cartwright prefers to go back to the State Senate if he can beat A. M. Drew, which he will have to do to get there. Again, his health has not been the best and he can make a canvass of a senatorial district much easier than of a congressional. Probably somebody will be found to make the fight, but neither of these men will enter the lists.

William Kent For Congress The Watchman incorporates in his Table Talk for this week Mr. William Kent's announcement as candidate for the Republican nomination to represent the Second district of California in the House of Representatives at Washington. His "organization" adversary will be Duncan E. McKinlay. All the power that the administration at Washington can bring to bear on the issue will be exerted on behalf of Duncan E. McKinlay. McKinlay attached himself to Taft personally very early in the latter's campaign. He has proven himself a faithful servitor of the President at all times and in all ways and the President can hardly do less than his uttermost toward securing the re-election of his most obedient servant. Mr. Kent goes into the campaign fully cognizant of the advantageous situation of Mr. McKinlay, and yet nothing daunted notwithstanding.

If Mr. Kent's campaign has no other result it will at least place before the voters of the Second district ideals relating to our political life that should appeal to the best there is in them. A fundamental difficulty with legislation at Washington has been, and now is, that a special privilege or benefit conferred upon a home interest has taken precedence over casting one's vote for those larger policies that embrace the well-being of the nation and the race. Mr. Kent bravely promises at the outset that, if elected, he will not do that thing. It is time some seeker after a legislative office manifested the courage to take that ground. It will be refreshing to the constituency of the Second district to have a candidate come before it standing for ideals that mark the difference between time servers and statesmen.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

A man of wealth, Mr. Kent, like Rudolph Spreckels, has "gone back on his class," because he had to in order to be true to his own instincts, which are democratic, and true to those democratic institutions to which this nation was dedicated. He is rearing his sons "next to the land" in the hope that they will be scientific, educated, trained cultivators of the soil. He asks no more for them than any farmer or mechanic may ask for his son, a fair sharing of opportunity under equal laws equally enforced. Mr. Kent's candidacy, whatever comes of it, will mark a new era in the political life of this State. The advent of a wealthy man in politics, for a purpose other than to pour in dollars and take out some special advantage, will be newer to our political life than it ought to be. The California Weekly commends William Kent to the favorable consideration of voters of the Second Congressional District of California.

William Kent's Announcement "Certain of my fellow citizens have continuously urged that I go before the Republican primaries as a candidate for Congress from the Second California District. Perhaps they feel that the views I hold concerning national affairs are the views they wish to express through their representative at Washington. I have consented, and here state some of the opinions which will go toward the making of my platform.

"I do not believe that present artificial conditions permit a fair sharing of our country's opportunities. I believe that the Roosevelt-Pinchot policies of conservation of our national resources against waste and greed are the most necessary, insistent and immediate policies for our nation to enforce by legislation and administrative action. All our experience would prove that the law is not rigid but flexible, and that the interpretation of the law depends upon the animus of the interpreter. As the obvious intent of and only excuse for the law is to 'promote the general welfare,' I cannot indorse the policy of stretching it to promote private interests against the general welfare. Laws should be passed concerning the public domain that cannot be misconstrued by agents of greedy persons or corporations, whether these agents be in or out of public employment.

"It would seem obvious that Congress, as a self-respecting body, should provide its own rules and methods of procedure, and should be free from domination by the Speaker. When that domination is exercised against the public interest it becomes doubly intolerable. If elected, I shall not vote for Joseph Cannon for Speaker or for any man who holds his views of parliamentary organization or national policy.

"The Aldrich-Payne tariff law is, in my opinion, a violation of sound economics and the Republican platform. The burden is distributed in such a way as to increase the gap between wealth and need. No tariff bill should emanate from the counsels of its beneficiaries, but should be the product of a board of disinterested experts granted fullest powers and facilities.

"Log rolling' is the most insidious form of corruption. If elected, I should consider that I held a commission from my district to do my best for the whole nation. What just and proper special service could be rendered the district, with this proviso, I should be diligent in seeking to perform. This is not a district that would ask its representative to betray the nation for a chance at the 'pork barrel.'

"Corporations are granted corporate privileges that they may serve the general welfare. With increasing power they require more and more control. It is monstrous to suppose that, escaping moral responsibility, they should partake of the freeman's political rights. If to run the government, or to attempt to run it, is a part of their 'business,' it is time that such 'business' should be disturbed.

"It is beyond question that the strength of the Republican party grew out of the ideals of human service held by the founders and by Abraham Lincoln. Such portion of the party as has entered into the service of special privilege is false to the party's traditions and has no right to assume the name.

"If my ideas seem independent or radical and if, by chance, I may be listed as a prospective 'insurgent' I shall accept the epithet as a high compliment and shall hope that it may be my privilege to bear some little aid to those who, while serving the nation, are incidentally tending to dignify and save the Republican party."

(Signed) "WILLIAM KENT.

(Dated) "Kentfield, Marin County, Cal., May 23d, 1910."

A Lot of Sorrow At Sacramento If one sign every paper that comes to him he'll be sorry. Almost any prominent man at Sacramento will say as much from bitter personal experience. Charles F. Curry has been eleven or twelve years nailing things down at Sacramento on his own behalf mainly through being purchasing agent for the State, and he has been able to nail a good many Sacramentans to his cause so securely that if they get away it will be personally and alone in the lone watches of the voting booth. Meantime they "dassent say a word." Now a good many of these business men of Sacramento are personally friendly to Alden Anderson and not seriously opposed to Southern Pacific domination of the politics of the State, but whatever encouragement they give Anderson has to be given when he and they are alone with nobody listening.

STILL LISTENING

Now Anderson got the bee in his bonnet early and got up a spontaneous demand for his candidacy circulated and signed by as many Sacramento business men as were not committed to Curry. Then Johnson's candidacy was announced! Half of Curry's nailed-down constituency is at heart for Johnson, and half of Anderson's list of endorsers could not have been hired to sign his petition to become a candidate if they had dreamed that Johnson would be a factor. So goes the tug of war. Curry is trying to keep the hatches down on his bunch that wants to divide with Anderson, and Anderson is clinging hard to keep his petitioners from going to Johnson.

There is a good deal of mumness and suppressed sorrow in political circles at Sacramento, and the next man who comes along with a paper to be signed will be met with the stony stare. Meantime, Johnson's friends are not worrying, for they know what his friends, at present detained in opposition camps, will do when they find themselves alone with their God and their ballot. Outside of the business circles, and all over the county, where men haven't signed anything and voters are free to say what they think, the Johnson sentiment is carrying everything before it. Sacramento County will be for Johnson.

An Anderson Feeler Cautiously Ventured At Sacramento, on Saturday evening of last week, Alden Anderson put out a cautious feeler to see if it would be profitable for him to go before the people openly and above board, as Hiram Johnson is doing, or make his canvass through the still hunt and underground methods peculiar to the Herrin political tactics. The result was not reassuring. Clunie opera house, that was filled to overflowing for Johnson, was scantily filled for Anderson, and what applause was given was given more as an expression of personal regard, deservedly cordial, rather than as an expression of enthusiasm for what Mr. Anderson stands for in this campaign and for those that stand with him. The star speakers advertised to be there, Victor Metcalf and John S. Partridge, failed to arrive. Mr. Anderson's appointments for a whirlwind speaking campaign over the State have not been announced and are not likely to be. The trouble with his candidacy is that it is devoid of a reason for being.

Hiram Johnson's Word of Warning Having completed a first tour covering the greater part of the State, Hiram

Johnson feels much encouraged with the prospects of the cause he is championing and stands in fear only of one adverse influence and that is that systematic vilification and whispering down to which he is being subjected, with little or no chance for defending himself because the charges made are not made by persons who can be held responsible for them. But of this we let him speak in his own way through a circular letter being sent out of the following import:

"I can say positively that the fight is won today. There is just one problem and that is as to what can be accomplished by a purchased press to poison the minds of the people in regard to my candidacy and the principle for which I stand. Already the subservient papers of the State have begun a system of vilification and abuse in the effort to befog and becloud the minds of the people as to the dominant issue involved. I do not intend to be swerved from this great problem by any such methods. I am going forward along the same straight line as that along which I began this campaign, endeavoring to return to the people their government and take it out of the hands of the Southern Pacific and William F. Herrin, and I shall not be diverted by the approaching swarm of false and mendacious statements emanating from a poisoned press.

"I wish to warn the people, however, that systematic efforts will probably be made to discredit me and my candidacy. Outrageous falsehoods concerning the campaign and even in relation to myself, personally, will be circulated with vindictiveness and bitterness and an abandoned mendacity seldom paralleled in any campaign. I cannot, of course, in detail, respond to false accusations or charges, and I must depend upon the good sense of the people and their desire to see the right prevail."

Barndollar Or Hinshaw The sixth-ninth Assembly District will probably be represented at the next session by a man who will be able to determine how he shall cast his vote on important matters without consulting the "leaders" of the machine who keep their eyes on the progress of legislation at Sacramento. Harry Barndollar, who represented that district in the session of 1909, was one of the first members to circulate petitions for renomination, but he will have a hard path to travel. His opponent will be N. E. Hinshaw of Long Beach, Barndollar's home town, who has been indorsed by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. Mr. Hinshaw is well known throughout his district as a clean-cut, progressive citizen who has no use for the Southern Pacific political outfit. In drafting him, the progressive Republicans of the

(Concluded on Page 430)

CARNATION WHEAT FLAKES For Breakfast and Dessert

Pacific Cereal Association

Bay and Taylor Sts. San Francisco

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly IN PRINTED BY Donaldson & Moir PRINTERS 330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY The Complete Text of the REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

"Three Dragons" and Mrs. King!

How can she be a "Kav" and point to such a dark ages' kitchen? As a start, we will say that Professor Fleming of Chicago University is correct in that man in tribal relations went out to fight, to exert, and to bring in the food; woman desired, for reasons, a permanent home, and she organized and reigned in it.

Now if Mrs. King desires to set the woman back two centuries, let her be just, and peg the man back two centuries or more. Seat him out of the offices and the professions. If these are but poorly filled now, think by women, the blight of former usurpations will soon wear away; the girl-pleasure in schools and numerous places is a voucher. In tribal relations the sexes were equal in their spheres.

There is reason for sending man out to strenuous toil, for he is of the hard, straight frame built for physical exertions. He has had his way and day; the result is the rottenest politics of the world's age, poverty undermining every nation, vices graduating practically every tenth man for the shotgun—if he got his deserts!—and, the organized sale of women! These are his results.

Man should be where he sweats, eats and—goes to sleep. Otherwise he "raises the devil"! Hiss? Hear ye any tramp of men countrywards? Not a bit of it! And, Mrs. King, you will not hear the tramp of any women feet toward that Purgatorial Economy Shop that you—some transmutatory ghost of ten centuries ago!—call—heaven save the mark!—a kitchen! Yet I have gumption enough to say that Mrs. King's kitchen is—why, the poor dear! And lest I be not competent I went over and asked a woman, a lady, who once regularly got up at 3 a. m. and milked eight cows to help her husband "get along"; we agreed that RATHER than go back to Mrs. King's "kitchen," it were best to stand the men all up in a row—and shoot 'em! We also agreed that there was seldom a good cook without a cranky husband! And look what good cookery has done to Taft politics—not crankiness, but "sort of blind staggers"!

Mrs. King's "Three Dragons" will eventually be "eat" by the telephone, the mail order, and the co-operative nucleus that has raised the Danish nation to a position of wealth relatively above that of France—without making a "pig-hog" of the husband and a slave of the wife!

Rhetta Dorr's exposition of women does not point to Mrs. King's "kitchen." And thirty years ago I pointed out to Mrs. Stanford, what was Greek to her and will be Esperanto to the kitchen-world some day, not because of me, but because of IS—The Skil jacrue, the life-long home and maternal thought for kitchen workers, raising them to the basis of other professionals and standing between the worker and employer; it was outlined once in Everybody's.

Our Chinese cook once replied to my mother, "Oh, famine in China allessame good; too muchee Chinaman!" This seems to be Mrs. King's theory when she would "SAVE" in her own and her friends' "kitchens." What of those other workers cut off? And man?—all the creature needs is plain food. In all this fan-fare of "Economists"—never a word about—FUEL? FUEL? My husband says, "Huh! buy ten cents worth of beef and spend twenty cents cooking it! What's the matter with them?"

Suppose the man does spend "fifty per cent of his income" for things—how many other mouths does he feed? That is co-operation—as yet bungling. And as for her "husband toiling and moiling"; that's good for him—per Roosevelt! Dr. Asa Clark was once heard to say that he had doctored many an overworked woman, but never an overworked man! If it isn't true of today, let man taste his own pie! Sauce for—the goose?—no, indeed, the goose has "done got wise"!

Let man kill "special privilege," and not "the woman"! See Edmund Norton, La Follette's, May 14. Norton does not call this masculine special iniquity a—a—bedbug, but I will! It is quite as prevalent in effect among the Poor, is quite as extraordinarily difficult to kill, and it bites "awful hard"! No use giving it a new gender in Mrs. King's "kitchen"!

Give us "NO PRIVILEGE and the divisibility of a dollar!" A. A. M.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen:—Your letter of April 27th has been received. I inclose herewith check for $2 in payment of a year's subscription to The California Weekly.

I enjoy this paper and I think you are doing some good work. I trust you will pardon me if I suggest that it occurs to me The California Weekly could do greater good if it showed less of a partisan spirit. It must be known to you that the organization of the Democratic party in California at this time is in the hands of men who stand for clean government, and all friends of good government must stand together in the redemption of California from the present conditions. It seems to me that I have noticed in your paper from time to time an inclination to not give the California Democracy full credit for the splendid efforts being made in the interests of good government. For example:

I notice in your account of the recent Democratic conference in Los Angeles that in making mention of that portion of our platform referring to the initiative, referendum and recall, you refer to it as "populistic." In the same issue reference was made to the fact that one of the candidates of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League was an advocate of the initiative, referendum and recall, and you commended very highly his stand on this question. It occurs to me if direct legislation is a good thing it is good whether advocated by a Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate or by the Democratic party in conference assembled, and I hope you will not think me unnecessarily critical when I suggest that your influence for good government would probably be somewhat enhanced if you gave equal credit to all friends of good government, whether they be Democrats or members of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League.

Very truly yours,

J. O. DAVIS.

Hollister, Cal.

The offending reference to the initiative, referendum and recall was made to imply how far our modern, progressive, California democracy has gotten away from traditional democracy, a very good and hopeful divorce, as it seems to us. We quite agree with Mr. Davis that whatever there is of patriotism, single-mindedness and loyalty to country that is able to rise above mere loyalty to party must be encouraged and made use of wherever it may be found. The "interests" have no regard for parties unless they can make use of parties to their own advantage, and the rest of us may profit by their example.

California Weekly, San Francisco, Cal.

Gentlemen: Referring to enclosed: Have esteemed California Weekly above the average of its kind, but recently have questioned: Is it one-sided? Can it not see honesty in any aspirant for political favors who does not belong to, or rather does not affiliate with the L. R. League? My reason for wondering if you are fair, is your attitude toward Alden Anderson, who just now has an honorable ambition to be Governor, and who is entirely able and worthy, and an acquaintance with him of several years convinces me that he is incorruptible, just as independent as any of the aspirants, and he has been tested by political preferment, and found not lacking civic virtues. He has all qualities (in greater or less degree) other aspirants possess, and more the others do not. He would make an excellent Executive, and his election would assure all classes the "Square Deal." Here's bidding Godspeed to every good man (in this particular preferably Mr. Anderson) and may your own success be not less but in success manifest a little more tolerance and keener discernment of men irrespective of party affiliation. "For a man's a man for a' that." Be fair. Remember Pardee. He was similarly assailed.

Very truly yours, W. W. HINSEY.

Fairoaks, Sacramento, Cal., May 6, 1910.

Regarding Mr. Alden Anderson as a gentleman and citizen this paper entertains only the highest respect for him, not unmixed with admiration; but in his candidacy for Governor of California his personality becomes a negligible quantity. He has permitted himself to be brought forward, and his candidacy to be advanced, notoriously by and through the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, however indirectly it may have been brought about. Because of that origin of his candidacy it becomes our duty to oppose him with all the power we can muster. In our judgment the issue involved is elemental. It is as to whether or not this commonwealth shall be bond or free. In the face of such an issue no personal friendship, no business or social relationship, no ties of blood, must be allowed to stand between a patriotic citizen and his duty to his commonwealth. This paper does not intend to be narrow, and it does not intend to be intolerant of anything except disloyalty to free government and disloyalty to those Rights of Man which transcend all other rights and legalities however sanctioned by time or immemorial custom. As championing the newer Republicanism, Mr. Anderson would be an acceptable candidate for Governor of California. His candidacy is objectionable solely because of its source and inspiration.

California Weekly:

Gentlemen: It is a privilege to read and subscribe for your valuable paper, so independent in spirit, so truly reverent in its treatment of the many sided problems of life. The charm of your paper is that its judgments seem to be formed with the editorial eye on the Eternal Righteousness above rather than on the office receipts below.

Sincerely yours, W. H. MORELAND,
Bishop of Sacramento.

May 25, 1910.

We could wish that the "Eternal Righteousness above" could be coined into cash for meeting needful expenditures as well as "office receipts below," but therein lies a difficulty that refuses to be ignored.

Lottie Collins, an English music hall singer, died in London last week. Everyone who went to the theater or who whistled 15 years ago will recall her as the woman who introduced the song, "Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay" into this country. It was written by H. J. Sayers, a member of George Thatcher's minstrel company, and Miss Collins first scored with it in 1892 at the Gaiety Music Hall in London, where she was receiving a salary of $20 a week. The week following the introduction of the song she demanded, and received, a salary of $600. She came over here in the fall of that year at a salary of $1000 a week and sang the song between the first and second acts of "Jane," a comedy running at the old Standard Theater in New York.

NEED AND WASTE

AND THE PROBLEM OF THE MALEMPLOYED

By WILLIAM KENT

[This article is the Phi Beta Kappa address delivered by Mr. Kent at Stanford University on the evening of last Saturday, May 21st.—The Editor.]

Democracy is the goal to which the world is tending, and equality of opportunity is its prerequisite. The needs of a democracy comprise those things that the average man may reasonably expect to obtain by an amount of effort that shall neither blight his health, nor narrow his life. The old aristocratic scheme, under which the lord ate the chicken, while the gizzard and feathers were for the mob, is abhorrent to our thinking. While it is practically impossible to draw sharply defined lines between the needful and the useless, we may at any rate suggest some approximations.

The Need for Food

First of all, we require food, wholesome, palatable, and in adequate quantity. Doctors and faddists will wrangle eternally over what is wholesome. It is a consoling fact that all over the world are well developed and vigorous people who have adapted themselves to what is at hand. There are mild eaters of meat and ferocious drinkers of milk. There are insect eaters, and wild honey people. Our race has grown great on a mixed diet of bread and meat. One thing in common is shared by all men, the necessity of repairing to the earth for food. Hardship follows when this is made difficult. Man also needs a varying amount of clothing. This need is not dependent upon fashion, as a traveler from Mars would suppose, but upon climatic variations; for this, too, he must go to the land, and the same is true of shelter and fuel. Unless we believe that certain men should be starved or frozen or forced into servitude, we must accord equality of opportunity to seek the bounties of our common mother earth. That mother cannot furnish the average man such banquet dishes as Roman emperors considered needful. Palo Alto would exhaust the supply of nightingales' tongues in a day and without appreciable benefit. The earth cannot provide cigarettes for all vain women, or game preserves for all men who joy in killing. We have never tested the measures of earth's bounty. Instead of cherishing her, we have often looted her, and upon us and those after us must fall the burden of her quiet punishment.

For the sustenance of life, we must look to the great mother and to her husband, the great, good sun. For whatever else, we must look to ourselves and to each other and to the power behind all that works for righteousness. We must not, like apes at a banquet, grab and destroy, but we must conserve and share in good will, else many suffer and the successful have little joy of their success.

It is required in a democracy that there should be a happy childhood, of long enough duration that little shoulders shall not be bent by overloading.

The Need for Work

It is required that there shall be a busy youth and prime of life, with a chance to work, so that the work shall count in the general product, and so that the fruit of toil may go to the producer without diminution from unproductive privilege. It is no less a requisite that man should be able to look serenely forward to a well provided and self-respecting old age, and further, that he be defended against the want that may come from the accidents of life. These provisions are now monopolized by the well to do, who often fail to see how needful they are to the happiness of all.

The Need for Good Will

Length of days may be but elongated lethargy, or misery. It is of no value for or in itself. Life has other dimensions than those of the line. It is more than a connection between the prenatal and post-mortem mysteries. The primal social need is good will to men, and good will is not born of want or of repletion, of successful greed or of sullen envy. It must rest in a sense of justice that keeps alive a righteous dissatisfaction, until equality of opportunity is the common lot. That smug so-called philanthropy which is evidenced by the bestowal of surplus and perhaps ill-gotten or unearned wealth, can never take such pleasure in obsequious expressions of gratitude as may come to every one of us when our fellow men say, "Neighbor, you have tried to help; brother, you have played fair."

Knowledge adds to the breadth of life and should be denied to none. Our public education is as totally withdrawn from the overworked as from those living beyond its pale. The fine arts should be the common heritage of all of us just as they served the whole people of Athens.

Waste Must Be Eliminated

These are some of the real needs of democracy. They can only be met for this and coming generations by a system, a scheme of things that will conserve and develop what is worth while to the elimination of the useless. Weeds and melons cannot grow in the same bed. However generous the earth may be, there cannot be support for drones except at the cost of workers, and the workers must employ themselves productively else they, too, are but a burden on those well employed. The waste in the world is the world's great problem. Our country is doubtless the most prodigal of all. Its developing riches have thus far saved some of us from the pinch that will, ere long, teach the lesson that all of us must learn.

In outline let us consider a few matters that seem to disclose our prodigal heedlessness, our economic blindness, and suggest the way that we must travel.

The food supply of civilization is the joint product of land and labor. Upon that food supply rests human life and all its content. Lacking rice, fish, and millet, the voice of Confucius would not have been heard.

Lacking grain and meat, there would have been no theater to echo the philosophy of Shakespeare; spectral bards would have sung to an empty world, and the great message of love would have been undelivered.

The ancient nation-cities sent their armies and navies to loot the world of food. They enslaved men that they might fill the mouths of non-producers and finally they went down to destruction under the artificial conditions they had created.

Sometimes there has been too little land, at other times too little labor; there has been soil exhaustion and erosion, and the drying up of water sources, and always, everywhere, an overwhelming burden on the food supply. Mechanical reapers and mowers, gang plows, wonderful systems of transportation come to relieve the situation, but the relief seems but temporary even in our favored country, and now we are facing the great problem of an increased cost of living, not only in terms of dollars but in terms of day labor, which is life.

More Eaters Than Producers

We who have been the greatest exporting agency in the food market are feeling the pinch with all the rest of the world. In a market more clearly open to the play of supply and demand than is any other market, we are bidding up the staples of life. Many factors enter into this problem, but the one most frequently neglected is the many-phased factor known of old, the excess of demand over supply, the disproportionate increase of the army of eaters, relative to the army of producers. To this is related certain increased costs of production despite the advent of labor-saving farm machinery.

Up to the present time our expansion into new fields has more than made up for the exhaustion of old fields. We have not begun to pay the penalty which we shall have to pay for soil exhaustion. But our agricultural industries are underworked while in every other field we are working overtime. Access to the land is constantly being made more difficult and expensive by rising land values.

We have, first of all, considered the food question because while the most vital it is the simplest in its terms. The other real necessities of our complicated social system are farther removed from the action of supply and demand.

Wool and cotton fiber for clothing are in part high in price owing to agricultural conditions. Wool is further enhanced to the consumer by the tariff and the trusts.

We possess the cheapest iron ore in the known world; we assemble coal and iron by the most economical transportation systems; we manufacture it by the most scientific methods and then under our tariff system and an unregulated monopoly we sell the product cheaper to foreigners than to our own people. All of us are paying tribute and we are forcing the export of two natural resources that cannot be replaced—coal and iron.

Trusts and Tariff

Trusts and the tariff meet us everywhere; they increase the cost of what we consume, and we must seriously seek for benefits on the other side of the ledger, for generally distributed, democratic benefits; else we cannot justify their action. We are everywhere met by the tyranny of our servants, the railroads, with their varying theories of "what the traffic will bear;" their charges enter into the cost of living: are those charges justified or not? It is worse than a Fifteen Puzzle until we look at the solution furnished by railroads and trusts, in the dividends paid on stocks and bonds that represent the hopes and not the actual investments of their promoters. The price charged for monopolized anthracite coal depends far more on the dividends paid on watered securities than on the cost of its production. A few Guggenheim grabs, and we would be forced for all time to beg for the privilege of warming ourselves. That is under existing law.

The prices of those things we need in addition to food are regulated largely by combined and uncontrolled selfishness which in a measure also acts on the things we eat. We have granted the power of life and death along with the grants of land and natural resources and the licenses to incorporate. The index of how this power is used is seen in the stock market, in the thousands of millions of capitalization made good by the privilege of picking our pockets, and in rising values of city and rural land.

If Harriman, Rockefeller, Carnegie and Morgan have done service as captains of industry, can we rest quietly in the assumption that they and their heirs and assigns can exact their tremendous tribute from all the people forever? These men, after all, are but names in the longer vista. There is no use exciting ourselves in hostility against them personally, as economic factors. They are shining lights as beneficiaries of special privileges which in many forms work to the common impoverishment.

Inequality Is Waste

It may be urged that the capital piled up by special privilege is not lost to productive enterprise; that inequality is not waste; and that what is taken from the unorganized many is better used by the organized few. This is an economic argument although socially iniquitous. True, we can never go back to the simpler stages of production. We can never dispense with the economy and power of co-operating dollars any more than we can go back to a barbarous condition of self-sufficient anarchy. It is clear and obvious that progressive democracy will use the device of incorporation with its massing capital. "Peopleization of industry" will not come through the purchase of watered stocks fortified by special privilege, but it is sure to come gradually in some form or other.

As against the helpful tendencies of present-day co-operating capital, we have the destructive tendencies of economic waste wherever capital is massed, tendencies that lead to luxury and extravagance, that lead to misdirected effort, and this to such an extent that the benefits of the system are absorbed and the labor-saving devices count but little in the life of the average man.

The Waste of Overgrown Cities

Let us consider the urban factors in the democratic budget. The first function of the city is to provide the elements that go to economical manufacture, by the assembling of labor and power and materials; and next, to act as centers of distribution, with a clearing-house system for transportation and with banking facilities that provide mobility of capital, with market places and depots for goods.

It is in such congested centers that the arts best flourish, that news is collected and distributed. The cities have always been the foci of light and leading. From every standpoint they are needful to our present civilization. The question arises as to what ratio their population should bear to the agricultural population, and what use they make of the wealth created by their congestion; further, whether the price they exact for their distributive services is a reasonable price.

In our study we are met by the overwhelming fact of the vast relative increase of urban population. It has been generally regarded as a moral rather than an economic menace, but

HONOLULU and back first Reduced Rate $110 class from
San Francisco

The splendid steamship SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, May 28, June 18, and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sales from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $240.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire.

OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS
GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS
309-310 MARINE BUILDING
CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed $1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 435,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.
Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant
Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)

526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital $1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909..... 38,610,731.93
Total Assets 41,261,682.21
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office,
or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin
by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock
P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock P. M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First
Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-
President, Emil Rohte; Cashier, A. H. R.
Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann;
Secretary, George Tournay; Assistant Secretary,
A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt,
Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohte, Ign. Steinhardt, I. N.
Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, F. Tillmann, Jr., E.
T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C.
Heyer, Manager.

the cities are in process of regeneration, and Frederick Howe's title, "The City, the Hope of Democracy," is daily being justified. But when we consider the burden laid upon the food supply by these vast urban accretions, we can only look to the history of ancient cities to see what is coming to us. We see that the danger is economic rather than moral. They cannot be supported as a preponderant population, and yet every city and town in all the nation regards its own growth as the highest good fortune, and so the unwholesome tendency is forced and crowded by every possible means.

The mere growth of the cities is a threat to national welfare, and therefore those mechanics and laborers, those engineers and financiers engaged in enlarging cities are at work at the wrong things and are a burden on production.

The cities are the markets, the clearing houses for the country, and yet these legitimate functions are tremendously overdone. The cost of the New York Stock Exchange, with its vast army of subsidiary employes, most of whom are engrossed in the speculative and gambling annex to the legitimate functions, has been carefully analyzed in some recent magazine articles.

Reaction Upon Value of Food

The occupation of banking is also overdone. The professions are crowded, and retail business costs vastly too much. Meanwhile, back of the scene sits the landowner making a tremendous unearned profit from the congestion and the rising values of land. The tribute he levies upon the cities, reaping where he has not sown, is largely put back upon the agricultural districts which in turn profit by the over demand for food with the result of rising values of farm lands and the vicious circle is complete.

Then consider the leisure population of the cities and the great numbers of person ministering to their wants. Further down the line are the harmful occupations—the manufacture and sale of liquor and tobacco. After these there is the useless floating population—bums and criminals.

The proportion of persons engaged in the tasks of useful production and distribution in the cities, compared to the aggregate population, will be found relatively small, and yet the whole mass, the useless and the useful, is bidding up the cost of necessities and is squandering capital in luxuries. As long as urban congestion means enormous profit to landowners this growth will continue with all its waste and loss. The cities are already too big; their continuing disproportionate growth will some day prove a calamity.

The Burden of Malemployment

We have considered a partial list of those in the cities that eat without rendering useful service. In lesser degree there is a growing proportion of people throughout the country districts who are either not working or are not productively employed. The whole distributive system is clogged with surplus labor. Consider the annual output of the colleges; the numbers that are going into the already crowded professions and especially into what is termed business or distribution, and contrast that list with the few that expect to engage in producing the necessities of life. People have come to realize the burden of armies and navies, but they are so accustomed to thinking of our present-day commercial system as a matter of course that they do not discriminate and fail to see that the man who is doing either the wrong thing, or the right thing in the wrong place, is a burden on the food supply and the supply of other necessities.

The army of the unemployed is understood as a menace to the average welfare; the leisure classes consisting of the well to do and the tramps are known to be parasitic. I doubt, however, if in popular form there has been adequately set forth the great problem of our time, the army of the malemployed, more burdensome than any standing army that the world has ever known. It is a source of waste beside which all other forms of waste are insignificant. An extreme instance is seen in the production, distribution and consumption of champagne. Land, labor, transportation, the time of custom house officials, advertising, the time and the morals of salesmen, all and much more are wasted; and at the end of it

(Continued on Facing Page)

Rubber Stamps

10 CENTS PER LINE

AT

Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country.
Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do. To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital $3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL $1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

J. Downey Harvey	S. G. Murphy
John A. Hooper	James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper	J. H. Skinner
Thomas Jennings	Rudolph Spreckels
James K. Lynch	John W. Van Bergen
Walter S. Martin	Clinton E. Worden
J. K. Moffitt	George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

THE night was too hot for sleep. It had been a "black day" in Pittsburg, one of those days when the humid air holds the smoke low over the city and the walls reek with soot and one's face and hands are grimed with it and one's breathing made difficult by the heavy, acrid odor of it. And now the night was as bad, with the sticky heat of an eastern midsummer calm added to make it past endurance. I climbed the height that rises back of the business part of the city and found a bank of grass before a fine residence where the air was somewhat less loaded with smoke. Here I sat down and looked out over the Monongahela to the bluff that lifts baldly on the other side.

Below, at the river's edge, the blast furnaces of the steel works glared up redly from the blackness, throwing the stacks and the skeletons of the buildings out into shrill relief. Engines raced up and down invisible tracks, drawing trains of cars that crawled like black, obedient serpents after them. Now and then a streamer of flame leaped heavenward, and I could see cranes lift white bars of metal and swing them deftly here and there, and pigmy shapes of men moving about, straining at levers and tugging at monstrous doors. It was far past midnight, and the sight of that sweating world of labor seemed strangely out of time and place. I glanced back over my shoulder. The rich man's house was dark. He, at least, knew the sweet concordance of night and sleep.

A figure approached the place where I sat. As it drew near I saw that it was a man, huge of frame, hatless and coatless. I drew back, a little nervous. The man paid no attention to me, but stooped down near me and laid a bundle wrapped in white on the ground, and then threw himself on the grass beside it. He lay there motionless a few minutes, until the bundle beside him stirred, and a baby's cry arose in the night. The man lifted the bundle to his lap and rocked it until the cries were hushed. On an impulse partly curious and partly of human fellowship I moved over and sat near him.

"Pretty hot tonight," I suggested.

"God, yes," replied the man. He ran his hands roughly through his hair and looked at me full-face. Hands and face were grimed, and I could see now that he wore the clothes of a laborer in the mills.

"Hot's not the word for it," he added; "it's hell."

He looked out and down to the furnace on the flat.

"This ain't nothing to what it is down there, though. But this is bad enough for babies."

"Do you work down there?" I asked.

"Me? Sure! Don't I look it?"

"Well, yes. How long?"

"Search me. Ever since I was 14. Haven't had time to figure out how old I am. Lost track of birthdays. A fellow works down there, and don't you forget it. Work! Ten hours, twelve hours, week-days, holidays, Sundays, day, night, any old time, all the time. You sweat for your money, too. Summer, it's like this. Winter, your face blisters and your back freezes. It gets 'em. I'm strong, and I've lasted, but I've seen 'em go. Starts with a cough. Fever's the finish. Get me some day."

"Why do you stay in it, then?"

"Show me the way out!"

The phrase shot from his lips with the sound of an explosion.

"Show me the way out! Maybe I haven't tried! The old man told me that when I was a kid. He tried to get me out then. No use. Seven of us, and we had to eat. Eat, work; that's all. We missed some when the Homestead strike was on. That finished it. No more laying-off after that. Take work when you can get it and hang on to it. If the company cuts wages, eat less, but work. If the company raises wages, eat a little more, but work. If you're out on night shift, go to it. If you get a chance to work Sundays, work. It's eats for the wife and the kids. You get the cramps or you get the cough, that don't save them from the grocer. Workin' when you're sick is fierce, but 'tain't nothin' to lyin' around the house and sein' the wife's eyes and hearin' the kids cry."

"What'd I marry for? Search me. I wanted her, 'n she was willin'. Why not? Her old man was playin' out, 'n 'twas starve with him or take a chance with me. She ain't kicked yet. Kids? Four. Why not? Ain't we got a right to 'em? No right to make 'em sweat like we do? I know it, but what you goin' to do? They come, 'n here they are. Pretty tough, though, ain't it, kid?"

IN PITTSBURG

BY

FRANK LAWSON

He hushed the child in his lap again. He jerked his thumb over his shoulder to the rich man's house behind us.

"They ain't got none. Rich man's luck. No luck, either. She'd make a pretty mess of a family, she would. Chorus girl she was. A peach, all right. But, Lord, the way she hits the booze! And the company she keeps! If her old man was wise to the joints she goes to and the gang she trails with, whew! Don't know, either. He got her out o' that kind of cattle. Had a wife that sweat blood for him when he was a mucker, washed the duds, raised the kids, stuck by him. Carnegie made him. What does he do? Throws the old woman over. Gives her a hundred thou' and tells her to take her ugly face back where he found it. He's a gentleman, you know. Pittsburg gentleman of the new kind."

"Me? I tried to get out of it, I tell you. Went to night school. Carnegie started that, 'n cut wages to pay for it. Learned to read 'n figger. And to hate work. Never mind, the old man sweated that out of me. Got a wife 'n kids of my own. Times got pretty hard. The wife was sickly. Second kid gave her an awful turn; six months in bed. I cooked. Doctor got everything I had left; owe him yet. If I lit out, he'd send for me, you bet."

"Went to industrial night school. Carnegie started that, 'n trimmed some more wages to help. Learned a trade there, 'n got out 'n looked for a job at it. Nothin' doin'. Seventeen men for every job, 'n no money in 'em after they got 'em. Six weeks laid off, 'n I went back to the mills. Owe the grocer yet, but I'll fix him up next month. Two lessons pretty near enough for me. Guess I'll stay at the job."

"Why don't I go west? Farm hand? How 'm I goin' to get west? Beat it on the brake-beams. Yep, I could do that. I ain't afraid o' bein' homesick now, 'n I'm strong, 'n show me work 'n I can do it. But where do the wife 'n kids get off? Want them to ride the rods? Nothin' doin'. And what you goin' to do with 'em while I'm gone? Rent collector comes around. 'Where's the man?' he says. 'Gone west,' she says. 'Out you go,' says he, and out they go. Don't you doubt it. She goes to the grocer. 'Gimme a sack o' flour,' she says. 'Nix,' says Mr. Grocer. 'The old man's gone. No credit here.' And that goes, too. I've seen all that tried before."

"What can I do about it? Strike? Homestead learnt us better. The big fellows got us over a barrel. Their credit's good at the grocer's, and the rent man never comes around. They can wait when they have to. 'Taint like me, with enough in the pantry for the next week, and no more, and no more to come 'till the pay check comes. They get tired of the wife, chuck her out. Don't want to bother with the kids, turn 'em loose, or hire somebody to watch out for 'em. I could chuck the wife myself. But I won't, see! I could put the kids on the county, too. I'm sayin' I could. But's long's I can work, nothin' doin'."

"The wife, she's sick now. Down there in the shack. She says, bring the kid up here. I says, stay with you. She says, you take that kid up there where it's cool. I brings him. She's lyin' on her back down there now, 'n you can cut the air with a bread knife. But she ain't sayin' a word. No kick out o' her. She's game. She goin' to do that, 'n me goin' to go belly achin' around about my troubles? I'm no angel, but I ain't that bad off yet. When she throws off on me, maybe I'll holler, but's long's she's a man I got to be one. See? And no runnin' away 'n lettin' her take the hot end o' things on the chance that I'd do better out west. I got a job here, 'n I can handle it, 'n when I kicks off maybe she'll find another fellow that's good for a few years more. Guess I can hold until the kids get big enough to take my place. If I don't, well, what's the use of worryin'? Don't buy you nothin'."

The east had been growing gray as he talked on, and now the mills below took shape as the light of the fires paled and the smoke grew blacker before the dawn.

"I'll have to hustle out o' here, or the cop'll be along and pinch me for sittin' on the grass. It's skidoo for us, kid. Your mother'll have to take you while the old man hikes for the mills. S'long, mister."

In the morning light the face showed grim lines of determination about the mouth, and lines of patient endurance about the eyes. He turned and walked away, with the heavy stride of the muscle-bound laborer. His back was broad, and the rise and fall of the heavy folds of muscles under the shoulders showed beneath the loose shirt. The bundle in his arms was silent. The sun rose over the bluff across the river, hot and red and glaring through the mist and smoke. The engines still raced on the tracks below, and the obedient trains crawled after them. Behind me, a servant opened a door in the great house to let in the morning air. The shades were still drawn down over the windows in the upper rooms of the rich man's house. Another day had begun in Pittsburg.

("Need and Waste"—Continued)

all there only remain a headache and a bad taste.

Take the case of a conscienceless, commercialized journal. Much of the forest goes into paper upon which is printed so-called news that, whether true or false, is worse than useless, and opinions which no one can accept, together with advertisements of useless things; from newsboys up and down, this bad literature enrolls a great battalion of the malemployed.

Instances can be multiplied indefinitely. Indeed, the burden of proof is on both men and things to show their right to be.

We wonder what becomes of our natural resources in terms of the welfare of the average man; we shall find that the army of the malemployed has consumed them. There is the benefit of labor-saving machinery? Somehow or other it, too, is largely dispersed in the same way.

The natural richness of our country has saved us thus far, but it can no longer stand the strain. There are days of want ahead of us unless we cut off special privileges that more than any other thing lead through unfair distribution to malemployment.

The Menace of Privilege

From many quarters there comes up a cry for business men and business methods of administering the commonwealth, and simultaneously we hear a protest, backed by indisputable facts, against the methods and aims of what is called "Big Business." The different points of view are not hard to understand; both can be honestly taken. Certainly we should have business men and business methods, but the national business, unlike private business, must take a view that goes beyond any single human life, else all the sacrifices made for us in the long struggle for liberty may be annulled in a single generation.

National business must be a combination of far-sighted altruism and social justice; this is statesmanship and patriotism.

To turn our natural resources over to private development without let, hindrance or control; this is the kind of business that will not even now greatly benefit living men and is sure to despoil our descendants. In 1890 I visited a pine forest in Michigan that belonged to a business man. He was selling high-grade lumber at $11 a thousand. He wanted the money from his timber; so he wasted all the hemlock and all the inferior pine; he left chopplings that eventually set the whole country burning. Today "dead and down pine," poor in quality, is there worth over $14 a thousand in logs. He did what he had a legal right to do under our prodigal system and the future must pay the bills. Far sighted state-manship would never have put those trees into his hands without controlling the cut. The State of Maine now controls private logging. By many business men such regulation is called "anarchy," "paternalism," or "socialism." And yet in the broader view it is elementary common sense.

California has gone mad in the attempt to exhaust its oil measures. Because one set of owners are pumping more than enough, so that tremendous exports are necessary, it is argued that all others should have access to the public domain, so that the impoverishing of the State may be expedited. If we were all to be blotted out tomorrow, the statesman and the get-rich-quick business man might agree as to this policy, but some of us would like to leave something for posterity, although, as Beaman of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company unctuously quoted, "Posterity has never done anything for us."

Conservation Movement a Hope

The conservation movement is the beginning of a great crusade that will turn men's minds toward equality of opportunity and social justice. It is a movement that has just begun; but it is so strong in logic, so eternally right in its trend that it cannot be curbed or diverted by the unfortunate reaction in Washington. In it all reasonably intelligent and unselfish people can and will unite. We cannot predict how far it will lead, nor do we care, so long as justice and true patriotism are its inspiring ideals. Who helps this cause is the friend of his country; who hinders it is a public enemy, although his ignorance may palliate the guilt of his offending. To demand that the remainder of the public domain should be squandered because most of it has been heedlessly handled in the past is to present the argument that the prodigal's father should have settled with those barkeepers who had missed getting their portion of the prodigal's substance.

Some Suggestions

The end of this necessarily discursive story is this:

If we are to prosper and to succeed as a democracy, we must keep our wants within reasonable bounds. A democracy unaided by slave labor can never wallow in luxury, and this is good.

We must root out special privilege which reaps where it does not sow, unfairly absorbing the fruits of toil.

We must jealously guard the great gifts with which nature has endowed our country, remembering that we are but tenants with the briefest of tenure and a vast responsibility heavy upon us.

We must apply ourselves thoroughly to useful work, else whether in idleness or useless endeavor we are but a burden to the earth.

We must strive for justice between men and must do our best to provoke respect for law by obtaining laws that in wording and interpretation work for ameliorating the lot of the average man, for this is what justice means.

The spirit of good will, kindness and human sympathy can never fully bloom except under democracy. This spirit is the richest endowment of all. Honest thinking will bring you out, whatever trail you pursue, to the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, WORLD-PRESIDENT

By Rockwell D. Hunt, Ph. D.

The logic of events points certainly to a great International Peace League, as advocated by Theodore Roosevelt in his notable address before the Nobel Prize Commission. Equally certain does it seem that the one man of all the race at the present moment to head such a league is none other than Theodore Roosevelt, America's first citizen.

Much ingenuity has been displayed in attempting to forecast the future activities of our great former President. Many of the prophecies are far more ingenious than plausible. Few indeed of his fellow-countrymen seem willing to permit him to spend the remainder of his days in the retirement of private life. Not many more imagine that he will long be content to devote his boundless energies to the popular welfare from the editorial chair exclusively. It is altogether unlikely that he will ever look with favor upon the mayoralty of Greater New York or the governorship of the Empire State.

Doubtless a very much larger number of Americans expect to see this man of the square deal seated in the United States Senate in due time; and still more are hoping for his return to the White House—already the continent of Europe seems to have placed him in nomination. Almost nobody now expects him to be content with being president of a university, however exalted such a position may be deemed.

There is something even greater than any of these things for Roosevelt. This has nowhere been better suggested than in his own significant words, forming the climax of the Nobel Prize Address: "Finally, it would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace would form a League of Peace, not only to keep the peace among themselves, but to prevent, by force if necessary, its being broken by others. The supreme difficulty in connection with developing the peace work of The Hague arises from the lack of any executive power to enforce the decrees of the court." Add to this sentiment his ringing words of optimism spoken but a few days ago in the Berlin Address on the World Movement: "It is no impossible dream to build up a civilization in which morality, ethical development and a true feeling of brotherhood shall all alike be divorced from false sentimentality, and from the rancorous and evil passions which, curiously enough, so often accompany professions of sentimental attachment to the rights of man; in which a high material development in the things of the body shall be achieved without subordination of the things of the soul; in which there shall be a genuine desire for peace and justice without loss of those virile qualities without which no love of peace or justice shall avail any race."

Let him who conceived these high and noble thoughts be commissioned to lead the hosts in giving them form and substance among the nations of earth! What splendid training he has had for the herculean task; and how admirably is he fitted by temperament and solid popularity!

Theodore Roosevelt is the greatest of living men, the "most startling character since Napoleon"; among nations the United States of America is the mightiest in achievement and potentiality; the peace of the world is the most momentous as well as most alluring of all public questions. The conditions are perfect: the hero of San Juan and of the Peace of Portsmouth, in the midst of his matchless powers, is henceforth called to serve humanity by accepting the post never before proffered to mortal man—President of the United States of the World.

This is not an idle dream. The numerous forces, economic, political, cultural, ethical and religious, now at work in all lands in earnest advocacy of international conciliation, may indeed usher in the dawn of universal peace earlier than the most sanguine have yet dared to hope.

The whole world groans and yearns for peace, peace that shall be free from the burdens of war, peace that shall not be broken while earth endures. The machinery of such a peace is well-nigh completed: its consummation awaits the touch of the hand of the master engineer. In the councils and the confidence of the expectant nations one man stands forth—truly a world-citizen, if such there be—pre-eminently fitted to essay the task as unique in its possibility of blessing to posterity as in the boldness of its conception, the most commanding personality of his generation—that man is unquestionably Theodore Roosevelt.

University of Southern California.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

In a recent election the citizens of Porterville decided to issue bonds in the sum of $40,000 for sewers, $10,000 for fire protection and $10,000 for street improvement.

H. E. Baker, foreman on a Miller & Lux ranch in Kern county, was drowned while trying to swim a horse he rode across an irrigation canal.

Near Placerville a farmer dug up an early Californian gold coin, on one side of which were printed the letters, "W. M. & Co.," while on the other side was, "S. M. V. California Gold. Ten D.," indicating that the coin was issued by a private firm. A Peruvian coin dated 1849 was dug up at the same time.

("Political Table Talk"—Continued)

South have followed their program of securing the highest available type of men as candidates for all offices.

Sheriff Buckner From the 62d. It is possible that Sheriff Buckner of Kings County may consent to make the race for the Assembly from the Sixty-second District. If he does, it will not be much of a race. He will simply get all the votes, and that will be all there is to it. Republican politics in Kings County has been, for a number of years, in the hands of a group of men who would barter away their chances for Paradise for any material advantage they could gain for Kings County. It has been a case of good men going wrong out of sheer love for their little neck of the woods. Money could not buy these men, but these same men will buy anything they want for their county, no matter at what sacrifice of political principles. It is a condition that ought not to exist in a county as enlightened and otherwise as reputable as Kings. There is scarcely a man in Kings County who believes in railroad control of government, either at Washington or Sacramento, and yet the "political powers that be" in that county have made haste to aid and abet that control whenever Kings could be advantaged in any material way by that means. The sending of Sheriff Buckner to the Assembly would be likely to introduce a new and better era into Republican politics in that county.

Political Bureau Still Searching This paper has maintained that, sooner or later, the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau would find a more acceptable Democratic candidate for nomination for Governor than Theodore Bell will make. That bureau will naturally want an anchor to windward in the event of the nomination of Hiram Johnson and, while there are those who believe that, in that event, that bureau would be able to patch up some sort of truce with Bell there are more who doubt it. It would be the part of prudence, therefore, for that bureau to beat Bell at the primaries if they can find the man to do it. It looks at this writing as if these influences had been prodding Michael F. Tarpey toward the arena. Mr. Tarpey was national committeeman of his party for something in excess of a quarter of a century. He did yeoman service for Hearst when the latter sought to obtain the Democratic nomination for the presidency, in fact, corralled the Coast for him, and is a Hearst Democrat, if any one knows what that is. Temperamentally he is a bit erratic and once in a while gets off the reservation, but wanders back before the grass gets short in Democratic pastures. Temperamentally also he would be likely to prove "organization" in office, although, unless we are mistaken, he has not held office so far. Being a wine-making vineyardist, he would have friends in the camp of the Royal Arch, but that organization's principal place of business this year will be in the Republican party, voting for Curry, and so it will not be able to help Tarpey much. We are inclined to regard the Tarpey diversion as a false alarm, but something may come of it.

John Sweeney Should Defeat Tom Kennedy John W. Sweeney is the proper man for Senator from the Twentieth Senatorial District. His principal opponent for the Republican nomination is "Eddie" Bryant, who was brought out by the Curry forces and abandoned by them when they discovered that his candidacy was not being taken seriously. The railroad machine is offensively active in this district, and its support and the support of the McCarthy machine is going to the Democratic incumbent, Tom Kennedy, who made one of the unfavorable records in the last Legislature. By the Hichborn test of sixteen crucial votes he was right five times, wrong nine and absent once. Sweeney should receive the organized support of all the elements for decency in the Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth Assembly Districts which make up the Twentieth Senatorial. He is a man of integrity, force of character and has those staying qualities that never tire.

SHEAR WIT

Clerk—I have a beautiful new edition of "Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words" for $2. Mrs. Newrich—Indeed. How much is it with the words?—Life.

Poet—Here, sir, is a poem which came to me in the middle of the night. Editor, handing it back—I would advise you to keep a light burning and a club beside your bed.—Boston Herald.

Reporter—What would you suggest as the best safety device in case of mine accidents? Mine magnate—Some sort of a scheme to automatically muzzle the press as soon as the accident occurs.—Puck.

Wigg—There seems to be quite a difference between a job and a situation. Wagg—Oh, yes. For instance, when a fellow loses his job he often finds himself in an embarrassing situation.—Philadelphia Record.

"Pop!" "Yes, my son." "This paper says that rain falls more frequently between 3 a. m. and 8 a. m. than at any other time." "Yes, my boy." "But, Pop, the Sunday school picnics are not held between those hours."

"Charley, dear," said young Mrs. Torkins. "I think I know why the catcher and pitcher walk up and whisper together." "You do, eh?" "Yes. They are expressing their opinion of the umpire."—Washington Star.

Tommy (aged 6)—Teacher, may I study 'rithmetic? Teacher—No, you are too young. Tommy—But I want to, teacher. Teacher—Why are you so anxious to study arithmetic, Tommy? Tommy—So I can learn how to keep a baseball score.—Children's Star.

"Do you know, I felt sad at reading something to-day, dear," said the sweet young thing. "And what was that, sweetheart?" said the man to whom she was engaged. "Why, I read that only about one out of every thousand married couples lives to celebrate its golden wedding."—Yonkers Statesman.

After a short rest and a deep think the hungry one knocked at the door of the tenth house. "Madam, can you let a hungry man have a bite to eat? I don't think you can, though," he said. The woman opened her ears. "Why can't?" she inquired. "The woman next door said you didn't have enough for yourself." He got his meal.—Pittsburg Gazette.

The woman lecturer who seeks to inculcate lessons of sweetness and light was talking to a class of boys. "I saw two people bestow alms upon a poor old man to-day," she said. "One gave a cent with a smile, the other a nickel with a frown. Now which do you suppose did the man most good?" "It just depends, ma'am," said one incorrigible, "upon how thirsty he was."—New York Times.

Thackeray, anxious to enter parliament, stood for Oxford, thinking he might win the seat from Lord Monck, who then represented it. Meeting his opponent in the street one day, Thackeray shook hands with him, had a little talk over the situation and took leave of him with the quotation, "May the best man win!" "I hope not," said Lord Monck, very cordially, with a pleasant little bow.—London Argonaut.

Patrick, lately over, was working in the yards of a railroad. One day he happened to be in the yard office when the force was out. The telephone rang vigorously several times and he at last decided it ought to be answered. He walked over to the instrument, took down the receiver, and put his mouth to the transmitter, just as he had seen others do. "Hillo!" he called. "Hello!" answered the voice at the other end of the line. "Is this eight-six-one-five-nine?" "Aw, g'wan! Phwat d' ye tink Oi am? A box car?"—Ladies' Home Journal.

One of the New Jersey representatives in congress, very much addicted to apparel of the variety known as "loud," was on his way to the capitol one day when he encountered Senator Depew. "If you're going to the capitol," said the senator, "we might as well walk together." "I'm not going there just yet," said the representative. "I must first stop to see my tailor about a new overcoat." "The tailor!" exclaimed Mr. Depew, in mock astonishment. "Why, Jim, it has always been my understanding that you were clothed by a costumer!"—Cleveland Leader.

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, the famous food expert, said at a dinner in Washington, apropos of the meat boycott and the cold storage discussion: "The trend of modern life seems on the surface to be toward preserved instead of fresh foods, but there is no such real trend, save among certain dealers. Who," said Dr. Wiley, "would like to be in the boots of the cowboy in the barren sagebrush country, who used to send in, week after week, the same order to the storekeeper: 'Canamilk, canacow, canajam, canabutter, canacake, canascrapple, canacorn, canaham, canaplums.'"

I was waiting near the elevator in the factory building for my friend to come down when I noticed a small boy sitting in one corner of the hall holding a large, thick sandwich. He eyed the sandwich lovingly for a long time, then he carefully lifted off the top slice of bread, took out a piece of pickle, ate it and replaced all as before. In a few seconds he again removed the top piece, extracted a piece of pickle and a piece of meat and replaced the top. Again and again the performance was repeated, until all the pickle and almost all the meat were gone, the sandwich, however, appearing intact as in the beginning. "Why don't you eat your sandwich and not pick at it in that way?" I asked the boy, with some curiosity. "Why," he answered, looking up with great innocence, "it ain't my sandwich."—Chicago Record-Herald.

("Allison Ware"—Concluded.)

tistical knowledge from teachers and stored it in such fashion that little or no use could be and has been made of it. To Mr. Ware's mind, this is the wrong way about. He thinks the office of State Superintendent should be a clearing house of information; that the State Superintendent should be constantly studying all new and progressive experiments that are being tried out, not only in this State but elsewhere in the world, and that he should prepare reports upon those experiments that have demonstrated their success and usefulness, and that he should, of his own initiative, bring these reports to the attention of teachers and trustees, so that they may always be supplied with the latest and most practical data upon which to base possible improvements in their schools. Another hitherto neglected function of the State Superintendent's office Mr. Ware would try to employ. He would have the State office use all the data and organized experiences of other times and places as a basis for intelligent action by the Legislature in all matters pertaining to the public schools.

The Legislatures, as a rule, have usually tried to be fair with the school system, and to do the best for it that they could, but they have been handicapped by a lack of accurate or at all trustworthy information upon which to base legislative action. The State Superintendent's office, properly administered, could collect, organize and supply this information to the legislature, and be of incalculable service to the public by directing legislation upon proven lines.

FOR SALE—Complete set, from first year, of 108 volumes Harper's Magazine, bound in cloth and morocco; excellent condition. Address Dr. L. C. Marshall, Vacaville, Cal.

Ross Valley Real Estate

$90—Lots for a few days. So many people were delighted with the unique grandeur of Los Lomas Terrace at last Sunday's auction that I have determined to make a few more sacrifices in my educational campaign.

Many hundreds of visiting people were amazed to find such natural forests of redwood, madrone, etc., so close to San Francisco, and only 4 minutes from trains. It was hard for them to realize there was such a rustic spot so near.

$1000—4-room furnished cottage. Terms like rent.

$175—Lots, 5 minutes from station, Stadium and Speedway, in the heart of Kentfield, on established street, sewer, water, all conveniences of city, gas will be in soon. Street lights, without the usual towering municipal bond issue and high taxes.

$1100—4-room furnished cottages, same location.

These properties were taken in a deal at a great bargain and must be sold.

Terms 20 per cent cash, balance 36 monthly payments.

J. E. LEWIS, Kentfield.

ORPHAN NOTICE

The Boys' and Girls' Aid Society

The following have been received since the publication of the last notice:

Half Orphans
Greenwood, Thomas	10 yrs.
Johnson, Luther	13 yrs.	4 mos.
Moser, John	9 yrs.	11 mos.
Nossen, Abraham	9 yrs.	2 mos.
Whiting, David	10 yrs.	4 mos.
Whiting, Bernard	9 yrs.	5 mos.

Abandoned
Smith, Robert	12 yrs.	1 mo.
		4-13-4t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

Estate of GEORGE E. WOODBURY, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administrator with the will annexed of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within ten months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of Oliver Ellsworth, Room 824, Mills Building, corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco, Cal., which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.

A. M. HAINES, Administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.

Dated San Francisco, May 2nd, 1910.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH, Attorney for Administrator, Mills Building, San Francisco.

5-6-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF CHARLES H. MORRELL, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Rhinette Morrell, executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said executrix at the office of Joseph Hutchinson, rooms 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

RHINETTE MORRELL.

Executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. Morrell, deceased.

Dated San Francisco, April 20, 1910.

JOSEPH HUTCHINSON, attorney for Executrix, 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, Cal.

NOTICE TO STOCKHOLDERS OF GIGANTE MINING COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in accordance with a resolution of the Board of Directors of Gigante Mining Company, duly adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, held on the 31st day of March, 1910, a special meeting of the stockholders of Gigante Mining Company will be held on the 14th day of June, 1910, at the hour of two o'clock P. M. of that day, at Room 269 in the Russ Building, on the west line of Montgomery street between Pine and Bush streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the principal place of business, and the office of said corporation, and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet. That the object and purpose of said Stockholders' Meeting is to take into consideration and then and there act upon a proposition to increase the capital stock of said Gigante Mining Company by the amount of $25,000.00, that is to say, from $100,000.00, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each, its present capital stock, to $125,000.00, divided into 125,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each.

Dated at San Francisco, California, the 31st day of March, 1910.

AUG. WATERMAN, Secretary of Gigante Mining Company.

4-8-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Odds and Ends of the Primary Law

An important provision of the law, if it may be heeded by the courts, which have their own pleasures to consult in such cases, is the following: "This statute shall be liberally construed, so that the real will of the electors shall not be defeated by any informality or failure to comply with all provisions of law in respect to either the giving of any notice or the conducting of the primary election or certifying the results thereof." Evidences are not wanting to show that the political judges on the supreme bench of California, at least, need to be fortified by this mandate from the Legislature, not being, of themselves, well disposed toward the direct primary idea, but so far as the statute has suffered adjudication the friends of the measure have no especial grounds for complaint. If the intent of the voter can be ascertained from his ballot with reasonable certainty, every such ballot should be counted, and whether a statute is construed liberally or strictly may make all the difference between law and no law.

Under the old system if a candidate for an office submitted his claims to a convention, and was unsuccessful in securing a nomination, it was held dishonorable for him, in the absence of fraud, to bolt his convention and run for office anyhow. The direct primary law holds to the same standard by declaring that "a candidate defeated at a primary election held under the provisions of this act shall be ineligible for nomination to the same office at the same election," by petition. The wisdom or necessity for this provision is to be doubted, but more as to that when we come to speak of needed amendments to the law.

The direct primary law empowers each nominee for the assembly to appoint an assembly district committee of at least one member from each voting precinct in his assembly district, but this must be done, if at all, not later than two weeks from the Tuesday on which the primary election shall have been held.

Likewise a candidate for the State senate, duly nominated, may, within the same time, constitute a senatorial district committee consisting of not less than seven members from each assembly district within that senatorial district.

Also each party nominee for Representative in Congress may, within three weeks after the primary election, appoint a congressional district committee of not less than one, or more than three, members of each assembly district within his congressional district. The assembly and congressional district committees serve for two years and the senatorial for four.

The purpose of these committees is, mainly, to aid in the election of the respective candidates and to advise with those candidates, if elected, as to the distribution of any political patronage that may accrue to the official, or to advise with reference to public sentiment or public needs in their respective communities. These committees rarely meet and there are no official functions for them to perform. The candidate may appoint them or not, as he sees fit. Probably they will usually be appointed as distributions of rather empty compliments to persons supposed to be possessed of political influence.

Vacancies occurring on any ticket between the holding of the primary and the holding of the election will be filled by the party committee for the county, district or State as the case may be. If candidates for assembly, State senate or Representative in Congress fail to appoint their committees, as suggested in the preceding paragraph, it is not clear how vacancies should be filled in the ticket if any should occur by death or otherwise, so perhaps they had better be appointed.

In the case of a tie vote at a primary election held in any county or a subdivision of a county, the board of supervisors will determine the issue by lot, after having summoned the parties into their presence. If the tie be between candidates for a district or State office, then the issue is to be determined by the Secretary of State after having summoned the parties into his presence, also by lot.

"Any candidate at a primary election desiring to contest the nomination of another candidate for the same office may proceed by affidavit within five days after the completion of the canvass, as provided in section 27 of this act. And the contestee shall be required by the order of such court to appear and abide the further order of the court."

Section 27, above referred to, gives all courts of record ample powers to deal with all issues arising under the direct primary law and in a summary fashion which, of course, is needful as the time is short in which to settle all such disputes and the certifying of nominations and preparation of the ballots.

It was made the duty of the Secretary of State and Attorney General to prepare, on or before the first day of August, 1909, all needful forms for blanks to be used to carry out the provisions of the act, and doubtless that duty was performed within the required time.

Section 34 provides that "All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with, or in conflict with, the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." Of course this section does away with all that the statutes formerly contained relating to primary elections except as referred to in this act and made a part of it, as heretofore pointed out.

Section 35 provides that "This act shall take effect and be in force from and after June 1, 1909."

The first primary election held under the act was held in San Francisco last year, with what unfortunate consequences is matter of dolorous history.

In case a primary election is held in a city instead of being under county authority those officers that, in a city government, correspond to the county officers charged with carrying out the provisions of this act, must perform the functions required as though they were county officers. These officers are usually the city clerk in place of the county clerk, and the city board of trustees instead of the county board of supervisors. If a city has a charter providing for a primary system of its own, then this law is not applicable to such city.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved

KRYPTOK

Invisible Bifocal Lenses

181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE
Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.

1172 BROADWAY

OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co.

Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tele. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary $50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

This Week: "RIGHT FINANCING OF THE EXPOSITION"

—By James Smith.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: JUNE 3 : '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH·GOOD COURAGE·GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 28.

Theodore In London

OF COURSE IT WAS BAD FORM for Theodore Roosevelt, in London, to say anything that meant anything, but did they expect one with the freedom of the city safe in his pocket, and fairly sizzling to speak his mind, to stand in a world-forum cabined, cribbed, confined, confounded, to mutter glib inconsequentialities and then go away back and sit down? They did not know our Theodore if they did. And because he spoke something will be doing down in Egypt that has been suffering to be done.

The Most Broken Reed

SENTIMENTALITY IS THE MOST BROKEN REED upon which righteousness can lean," declared Theodore Roosevelt at Guild Hall, London. So it is. All knowledge must be transformed into sentiment before it can become effective for any good purpose, but the transmutation of sentiment into knowledge is more difficult, although more often attempted, than the transmutation of copper kettles into gold coin. Sentimentality is often found in joyous alliance with sweetness and light, but righteousness, if it is to accomplish anything worth while, must move forward hand in hand with knowledge and power.

The Coup of Wickersham

IT WERE UNGENEROUS to inquire too closely into the reason why. Probably that reason is the President. It were unwise also to anticipate too much from the result. We do not yet know to whom that court belongs. But the five-and-twenty railroads that were about to advance rates to suit their own minds may have to show good cause why they should. That of itself will be great gain. Their heretofore unconquerable souls may yet eat out of the nation's hand.

"I Forgot"

THE CONDUCTOR IN CHARGE of the car on the Leona Heights line forgot, and because he forgot there were deaths, there were cripples made for life, and there were two score of crushed and bleeding men, women and children. "I forgot," was a poor excuse, but how glibly does it slip off the end of every tongue! And how many times a day! "Oh! I forgot." Let anyone watch himself during a single day and he will be astonished at the number of times he forgets. It is ever a poor excuse. It implies moral irresponsibility. We have no right to charge our minds with duties so feebly that we forget. That serious consequences do not more often attend our forgetting is our good fortune rather than our good conduct. The mind will retain that with which it is charged if it be habitually charged home. In the light of our own weakness we can be charitable toward those whose forgetting results in disaster, and, in the light of such disasters, we can be less lenient with our own forgetting. We are heedless if such catastrophes do not help us to a surer self-mastery.

The New Message to Garcia

THE OLD "MESSAGE TO GARCIA" was carried and delivered by "A fellow of the name of Rowan." The new one is being carried by a fellow of the name of Johnson, Hiram Johnson, and it is a more important message than the one that Rowan carried. The message that Rowan carried told of probable freedom to the Cubans, that mixed and adolescent people ill fitted to be entrusted with liberty. The message Johnson carries, as bravely as Rowan carried his, and as efficiently, tells of freedom to be had by a great and enlightened state, a state adorned with common schools, high schools and universities, which have annihilated illiteracy and placed all men on an intellectual equality, so far as expression goes, with all other men, a freedom to be enjoyed merely for the reaching out of the hand to accept the gift. Is there any wonder that this message is being received with joy?

Senator Bourne

SENATOR BOURNE HAS PROVEN a disappointment. When he was elected to the United States senate it was commonly understood that he owed his election wholly to having made a money campaign, that he was a grabber, a friend to the interests, a spectacular fellow, not very able. He has disappointed his friends and his critics alike. Under pressure of his exalted position he has developed ability of a high order. His sympathies with the commonalty, struggling against oppressive conditions, have been acute. His espousal of their cause has been sincere. The quality of his democracy has been proved. Our neighbor to the north is to be congratulated upon its representation in the senate of the United States. By comparison with it the representation of California in that body suggests to Californians the propriety of sackcloth and ashes.

Lorimer

LET NOT THE STOCKYARDS senator be over anxious at the outcome of the present unpleasantness over the manner of his election to the United States senate. To be sure, the methods employed may have been somewhat raw, but not otherwise different from those made use of by many of his colleagues. His interests are in the hands of those who know how it is themselves. If they did not buy with cash they bought with cash jobs, or had their ears pierced in token of thralldom.

Collier's on Kent

A SIGN OF THE TIMES may be found in the candidacy of William Kent, who has been persuaded to run for Congress in the State of California. Mr. Kent has a record of fifteen or more years of very active and efficient public service in which he never sought any advantage for himself. Whatever political progress has been made in Chicago in the present era owes much to him. Since he has been living on his ranch in California he has taken a characteristically energetic part in the questions affecting that State. He has always been keenly interested in national affairs also and has an inside knowledge of them. It would not be easy to think of many men as well fitted to represent a great State in the Congress of the United States. If California sends him to Washington she will know she has a man beyond the reach of any influence except his own conscience and the facts; so well informed and so versed in practical politics that nobody can fool him; and so large-minded that he will be an honored representative of the new political standards which are growing so rapidly in our country.—Collier's Weekly, May 28, 1910.

TWO WAYS OF LOOKING AT IT

State Labor Commissioner John D. Mackenzie has made a report to Governor Gillett relating to oriental farm labor in California that is likely to prove important to the future of California. According to this report, ideal farm labor, for "specialized" agriculture, must be abundant at certain seasons of the year, must take itself off and be responsible for itself at other seasons, must be intelligent and must be cheap. Japanese and Chinese coolies meet these requirements admirably.

The imagination kindles when one reflects upon what would take place in California were the bars, or at least the top bars, which now limit oriental immigration, taken down and the demand for this labor permitted to be fully supplied.

Capital would be attracted to our "specialized" agricultural industries as never before. Our agricultural college could not graduate students trained in scientific, "specialized" agriculture fast enough to meet the demand for competent superintendents of large plantations. All of our agriculture would become "specialized" under the impetus of money-making on the part of those who have money with which to make money and, where single ownerships prove unable to swing the larger ventures, corporations would be formed for dairy farms, milking cows by the thousand and making butter by the carload, for raising alfalfa and corn and converting them into beef and pork. What has taken place in eucalyptus planting and sugar beet growing would take place in relation to all forms of agriculture to which California is adapted. Land, especially in large tracts, would appreciate in value fifty per cent almost immediately and the present tendency to subdivide and sell to small farmers would come to a stop. Our agricultural gentry would live mainly in cities, but the few manors established would be baronial in splendor, except as to picturesque but interesting "quarters" where the oriental laborers would be packed like sardines in a box.

There is no reason, except in the scarcity of cheap and "ideal" labor, why capitalism should not embark in "specialized" agriculture as readily as in manufacturing or transportation and, once established under an industrial system comparable to that of manufacturing, it would be as impossible for the small farmer to compete with it in feeding the world as it is for the small manufacturer to compete with the trusts, or for the small tradesman to compete with the great department stores. California would be dedicated to capitalist and coolie forever. It would not require one generation to work the problem to a finality.

There is no justification for admitting to our shores coolies sufficient to satisfy the requirements of a capitalistic and "specialized" agriculture that may not as strongly, as justly and as efficiently, be urged for admitting as many as may be required for "specialized" industry, domestic service or to meet, in all its forms, the needs of that money-hunger for cheap labor that grows on what it feeds on and never knows when it has had enough.

But there are those who have cherished hopes for California other than such as Commissioner Mackenzie's commendations and findings of fact must eventuate in if acted upon favorably by the Legislature of California and the Congress of the United States. There are those to whom the history of civilization is not a sealed book, those who do not look upon prosperity to capitalism as being the only or even the highest good, those who value quality of character above cheapness, and national manhood as of more importance than many millions of money easily made.

If such as these turn to Roman history they find that, at the very time that Roman arms had conquered the world, Roman patricians, and their captured slaves, had conquered the

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

yeomanry of the Roman nation and driven them to the cities and to pauperism. It was this truth that led Mommsen to declare landlordism to have "accomplished the moral and material ruin of the Roman middle class," and which led Pliny to say that, "The great estates have ruined Italy," a disaster that twenty centuries have not been able to repair.

Landlordism is, and has been, the bane of the world. There is not and never was a land that was free and happy, populous and strong, that did not consist mainly of home owners. Yet there is a worse thing than landlordism and tenancy. That thing is agricultural capitalism whereby what should be the self-owned homes of well-to-do farmers become a plantation carried on by hired overseers and cheap, servile or slave labor.

For just cause men may go to war, but no war was ever waged for a holier purpose than that the common heritage in land be not taken from the middle-class people, by whatever pretext or policy, and given over to capitalism or lordship in any form to the end that the many may toil without stint to keep soul and body together while the few may live in luxury and idleness.

One more truth remains to be considered: That very 80 per cent advantage in cost of sustenance of the oriental worker over the occidental, to which Commissioner Mackenzie refers, will work as certainly to the advantage of the oriental capitalist in competition with the occidental. The self same policy that will drive the American farm laborer from the land will drive the American plantation owner after him. For these orientals are not an inferior people. They are economical, shrewd and thrifty and can do business sagaciously, agricultural as well as another, on a narrower margin of profit than can our white captains of industry.

There is something brewing, else this old sore would not have been reopened at this time or any other.

Ruse Rather Than Remedy

The to-do made in Congress over the concentration of cash, as a result of the funds of the postal savings banks being invested in government bonds, serves to show how elementary are the financial ideas of the average Representative in Congress. If it be all important to keep cash at home, existing conditions cannot be bettered save by abolishing the banks we have. The stocking up the chimney flue, or the roll of bills tucked into the mattress on the bed, are the only devices that can serve to keep the cash of the people out of the hands of those who will bid highest for its use and, unfortunately, that use which is least legitimate can run the bids highest. If, as proposed, sixty-five per cent of the postal savings must be deposited in local banks, the local banks will deposit their reserves with reserve banks, and these in turn with the big banks of New York for the convenience of stock gamblers. During the panic of '07 our banks here in California had all, save a meager allowance for carrying daily balances, deposited in New York banks, presumably on call, but actually beyond call until the New Yorkers felt disposed to answer the call. It will be in no wise different under the postal savings bank bill, as amended, except that the Government will be a less benefited borrower from the people than it otherwise would be, and its savings banking business will be more complicated. Local banks may gain in receiving deposits from the Government that they cannot now get from timid hoarders of mites and it is in their interest, and not that of people or country, that the savings banks bill has been so injuriously amended.

The Newer Basis of Compensation

The world is doing a deal of adventurous thinking. There are thousands, if not millions, of thoughtful persons ill content that human history should move ever in cycles and always from the same cause—monopoly of nature's bounties to the race. That cycle, in epitome, has been this: the clan, the commune, the over-lord and vassal, the landed estate and tenant, wealth and poverty, a proud aristocracy and a proletariat steeped in ignorance, vagrancy and vice. The handwriting on the wall reads that what has been true of the old world in this regard shall prove true of the new, and that it is so writ, except the common man bestir himself, know his rights and dare maintain them, cannot be questioned. Indeed, there is some question if the solution of the problem be not worked out in the old world before it is in the new.

The British budget lately adopted made the taxation of the unearned increment a recognized factor in the science of taxation for the civilized world. Fifteen German cities, having each a population in excess of 100,000, have made the increment tax a part of their system and more than forty smaller German towns have imitated their example. They begin by taking a part only of the unearned increment. They may end by taking it all.

The tendency of our time is to recognize ownership as relative and not absolute, the fundamental ownership vesting in the commonwealth and not in an individual, a firm or a corporation. All the resources of a country are coming to be looked upon as belonging to all the people of that country, if not in fact to the human race, a reversionary right to the good things of earth that not even a country may hold against the interests of the race. The country that stands on its legalities to the injury of the race is not unlikely to have its government overturned.

This is giving rise to the newer doctrine as to a just basis of compensation to those persons and corporations that serve the public. Are they transportation companies? Then the compensation for transporting the people's property from where it is to where it is wanted must be reasonable. Is the issue as to the price of coal? Then those who handle the people's coal (for there is no coal in the earth that does not belong to those who have need for it) must be content with a reasonable compensation for taking the people's coal out of the ground, transporting it to where it is wanted, holding it until it is wanted and finally delivering it at the door of the person who wants it.

Is the issue raised as to water for irrigation? The canal company has a right to a reasonable compensation for fetching the people's water to the people who need to use it on their land, and to no more than that. Is it a question as to the charge for electric energy generated by water power? The company that furnishes it has no ownership in that current. It is the people's source of energy as certainly as the air belongs to the people. Whoever pumps air into a building to ventilate it, or into a mine, is entitled to charge for the service rendered, but not for the air pumped. The person, firm or corporation that generates electricity is entitled to make a reasonable charge for the service rendered, but none whatever for the energy developed.

How far this basis of compensation will be carried no one can foreknow, but certainly as far as has to do with any of those elements of power and wealth which are a common heritage. This newer doctrine of compensation is not to be put down by calling it socialism, which it is not. It is founded in fundamental justice. That is its sufficient vindication.

Not to Be Ashamed of Ten per cent of the voters of Los Angeles County, who have registered so far, have refused to disclose their party affiliations. If they had been called upon to disclose their "Parker" affiliations instead of their "party" their reluctance could be the better appreciated and excused, but the primary law makes no such exactions. The law does not even demand to know to what political party one belongs, but only to know with what political party one expects to affiliate at the next primary election. The reason for this declaration lies in that provision of the law which requires county clerks to have printed 150 party ballots for each 100 voters of each party as indicated by the registration of affiliation, otherwise the clerk could not foreknow how many of each kind of ballots to have printed. Nothing could be simpler, or more fair, than this provision in this law. In truth, it is about the most liberal and unhampered provision in it. Why can not every voter in the State be made to understand its true import? The press of the State should renew the attack.

Government and the Railroads

There are four ways of dealing with the railroad problem in this country: Leave the railroads free to work their unhindered wills; government control; government ownership of railroads; railroad ownership of government.

The first method was given half a century of trial with results lamentable beyond the power of language to express. The railroads robbed their own investors, destroyed each other, discriminated for and against their patrons and slaughtered their operatives with as little compunction as exasperated ranchers exhibit at jackrabbit drives.

Tentatively, and with a long suffering patience, the people, through Congress, the legislatures and the courts, undertook railroad control by government with the result that they speedily found government in the control of the railroads, that control extending to Congress, legislatures and courts. The fight now on is to reverse that control, to make the railroads amenable to just laws and not the general public amenable to a predominating railroad influence, exerted legislatively, administratively, judicially. It is a great fight and, while victory is not yet with the people, progress is making. If this attempt fail, government ownership will follow unless, unhappily, democracy go down to defeat in conflict with an advancing plutocracy, an eventuality by no means unthinkable.

Government control of railroads was an important policy of the Taft administration. The battle is on at Washington. It waxes fierce. The outcome is uncertain but indications are that the forces favoring government control will make a general, though moderate, advance along the whole front. The battle over government control will have a firmer grip on transportation.

Railroads desire and gladly submit to a certain measure of government control. They want to be protected from each other and from the encroachment of those great shippers, like the Standard Oil and the beef trust, that have power to beat them down in their rates below that which is reasonable; but the railroads have no desire for protection of the public against themselves, and they withstand every attempt made in that direction with all the hirelings they can muster in Congress or executive departments.

The Supreme Court of the United States, by the narrow margin of four justices to three, has decided that the Interstate Commerce Commission's power to fix rates is buttressed by the Constitution of the United States. This is good. In fact, it is great. It is not saying that rates fixed cannot be appealed from and litigated over, but without that decision railroad regulation by government would hardly have had a leg to stand on. If Congress could not delegate its rate-fixing authority, that authority must be and remain nil. Congress is too big and too clumsy to fix rates and must fix them by proxy or not fix them at all. Therefore this decision, albeit by the narrow margin of a single vote on the supreme bench, proved a life-saving station for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Of the five or six million rates to be fixed even the Interstate Commerce Commission can fix only now and again one. The railroads must be trusted to fix the rest and, with such a supervision of the fixing of what, for the want of a better term at the moment, may be called the index rates, as will insure their reasonableness and fairness, the rest of the rates will come near to fixing themselves in conformity therewith.

All things considered, the outlook for national control of railroads is full of encouragement. The state issue is nearer home and, with the nomination and election of Alexander Gordon and John M. Eshleman to our State Railroad Commission, California will also be in line for progress in railroad control by government instead of railroad control of government.

Would He Know One If He Met It?

The Bakersfield Echo regretfully declares that, "Traced down to its final cause, the lack that is sapping our patriotism, the thing that makes our national character less fine than it ought to be, is the lack of a deep, impersonal, moral or patriotic issue to occupy men's thoughts and give coherence and conscious direction to our national endeavor for immaterial progress and advancement."

Is there, then, no great moral issue involved in the declaration that the heritage of generations unborn shall not be squandered by this generation? Is there nothing impersonal and unselfish in the demand that successful rascality shall not reduce legislation to barter, judicial interpretation to sale and that the powers of government shall not be put forth to establish a plutocracy on the ruins of a democracy in which the whole world had hoped much?

Since when has resistance to tyranny and oppression, to corruption and unrestrained greed, come to be looked upon as selfish and personal, narrow in spirit and lacking in generous impulse? What announced policies, if not those of Roosevelt, and those trumpeted forth by William Howard Taft at the opening of his administration, have ever set the pulses throbbing and made the currents of good, red blood to quicken in the veins and arteries of brave and self-denying men? If men may not fight to establish justice where, as in San Francisco, it has been debauched in the open street, for what may they take sides as for Right and against Wrong? Would our contemporary recognize a great moral issue if he met one in the road at noonday?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"Two and two usually make four, but one never can tell how drinks are going to add up," was the testimony of an expert witness called to the stand in a divorce case.

When one thinks on the part that wine and its more or less alcoholic associates have played in literature, in poetry and in song, in the mirth and the jollity of human society, one can hardly see how the world could have gotten on without them; but when one reflects on how drinks have added up down the ages, how unexpectedly and astonishingly, with what sorrow and what tragedy, one can hardly understand how the world has tolerated the stuff as long as it has.

The writer of this is no zealot for total abstinence. He has conducted some rather unscientific experiments of his own for a matter of thirty years, just dabbling a bit from curiosity, and a not too laudable desire to know what different beverages taste like, with the result that he has found no kind of spirituous or malt liquors that likes him and very few kinds indeed that he likes, so that he is able to look at the matter of beverages from a nearly unbiased point of view. If he were to condense the substance of his observation and experience into a phrase he could not do it better than to say that, "One can never tell how drinks are going to add up."

There was old John who, for more than half a century, had his sprees that did not loosen their grip upon him until they had prostrated him flat on his back in the gutter feeling upward for the ground, but he outlived nearly all his family, held his property together and died well-beloved because of his kindness of heart and gentleness of spirit, but there was young John who brought a most promising public career to a close in his early thirties, sold all he had and bought whisky with it, instead of pearls, and was taken out of the gutter to die the death of a beast. There was Charley who fought four valiant years for his country, only to come home to fight a hundred losing battles with John Barleycorn, yet preserving his youth well into the fifties to die from over-drinking of ice water on a hot day. There was the young dental surgeon who developed a fine practice and founded a loveable family and home, who put a pistol to his temples and blew his brains out because he felt the never ending gnawing of appetite reaching his vitals and had not the courage to face insidious and inevitable failure and disgrace long drawn out.

That's the trouble with the whole business: "One can never tell how drinks are going to add up." There is no man so learned in science that a young man can go to him, submit to an examination, and be given a certificate entitling him to use alcoholic beverages throughout his life without danger of failure and disgrace. There is not enough of wisdom in the world to predetermine the result for any man or any woman, for there are drunken mothers in the world as well as fathers, wives as well as husbands.

And yet there are those who use liquors habitually throughout long lives, seemingly none the worse for it. They prosper in business, maintain good health, hold respected places in society, and enjoy life to the full.

What is the use of denying the truth of this as so many zealots do? It only weakens their cause and proves their partisan bias. The writer had a great uncle who religiously intended to take a drink or two of whisky every day—if he did not forget it. And yet the very next man who should try to walk in the footsteps of one of these moderate, self-mastered men may go over the precipice before he is thirty years old. Usually one who uses no liquors until after he is twenty-five will live soberly all his days, yet the writer knew of a man who took his first drink at forty-eight, in ten years had become a sot. If one can never tell how drinks are going to add up does not prudence suggest that it is just plain, good sense, not to add them at all?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Uncle Sam's Expensive Household

The prudent housekeeper is not the only person who has a right to complain of the cost of living in these days. If our well-beloved Uncle Samuel, too, should lift up his voice in tearful protest against the size of his bill for housekeeping the facts of the case would justify him, for of late it has been increasing out of all proportion to his increase of income. In 1870, shortly after the close of a costly war, his annual expenses were $293,657,005. In 1880 they had decreased to $264,847,637, and it appeared that our Uncle was a wise housekeeper. In the next ten years, however, or by 1890, they had increased to $297,736,487, a little more than the old figure, but as his family had greatly increased in the meantime, this was an excellent showing. But in the next decade he experienced a fall from grace, his annual expenditure in 1900 being $487,713,792. He has kept right on rioting ever since that time, his expenditure by 1908 being $659,193,320, and the figures still are increasing. This is not only extravagance, it is the uncurbed riot of the spendthrift, and there is more than scriptural authority for the theory that that sort of thing sometimes ends in "the husks that the swine did eat." Somebody—the People, for instance—ought to speak to Uncle Sam about this matter. There is reason to fear that the old chap is becoming too giddy.

The Cost of Keeping a King

This nation's governmental expenses unhappily increase, but, whatever else may be said about it, the increase cannot justly be attributed to the cost of maintaining a President. We pay our President $75,000 a year and allow him $25,000 as traveling expenses, and some have been heard to protest that it is too much. But the royal family of Great Britain costs its subjects about twenty-seven times as much. Yes, twenty-seven, the readers eyes did not deceive him. The allowance to the present King has not been arranged as yet, but it is fairly safe to say that it will not be less than that of his predecessor, and Edward's allowance (for himself and his family) amounted to $2,715,000 annually. This immense sum was apportioned as follows: To the King and Queen, $2,350,000; annuity to the Prince of Wales, $100,000; annuity to the Princess of Wales, $50,000; for the King's daughters, $90,000; for Queen Victoria's servants, $125,000. Besides these rather neat sums the King's income from the Duchy of Lancaster and the Prince of Wales' income from the Duchy of Cornwall amount to $300,000 to $400,000, each, annually, but these sums, no matter how obtained originally, are private affairs, and so are mentioned here only as added and gladsome proof that the wolf still is some distance from the King's door, no matter what may be his relation to the doorway of other Englishmen. Evidently as a comparative bill of expense a President does not amount to much.

How Gambling Pays Monaco's Prince

The foolish ones who play the game at Monte Carlo, not infrequently terminating it by suicide, may not make money, but the Prince of Monaco, who is proprietor of the institution, makes money in plenty, and perhaps that fact may serve to console them for losses. Somewhat more than a half century ago this pigmy ruler was conducting his phantom government on something resembling a starvation basis. Then the great gambling institution was conceived, and since then he has lived at the upper end of Easy Street. Under the terms of his first lease to M. Blanc, the Prince received $100,000 a year and half the profits of the gambling house. This was a wide remove from former poverty, but when the lease expired in 1898 it was renewed for fifty years, with a more liberal allowance for the Prince. Under the terms of the later lease he received almost $2,000,000 down, and is to be paid nearly $3,000,000 in 1913. In addition to this he receives an annual payment beginning with $243,325 and gradually increasing to $486,650 in 1937, after which time it will remain stationary. A large sum of money also is to be spent on public works. The entire sum thus paid out will amount to more than $25,000,000, every cent of it collected of fools who have a more or less hazy idea of "beating the game."

Marriage in Ancient Egypt

In the vicinity of Luxor, Egypt, recently were dug up a number of inscribed bits of pottery. Several of these potsherds were marriage contracts, which give a fair idea of the institution of marriage as it existed in Egypt about two centuries before Christ. From these it appears that in those days wives were taken on probation and for a limited time. For instance, here is the wording of one of these contracts dating about the first half of the second century B. C.: "I take thee, Taminas, daughter of Pamonthis, into my house to be my lawful wife for the term of five months. Accordingly I deposit for you in the Temple of Hathor the sum of four silver stater, which will be forfeited to you if I dismiss you before the conclusion of the five months, and besides this, my banker shall do something for you; but if you leave me on your own account before the end of the five months the above sum which I have deposited shall be refunded to me." Certainly this was placing marriage on a free and easy commercial basis, making a financial transaction of it, and that it was not a large financial transaction will be appreciated when it is understood that "four silver stater" amounted to about two dollars in American money.

Battle Creek, Home of the Cults

Everybody has heard of Battle Creek, Michigan; at least, everybody has if he ever uses breakfast foods. But not everybody knows that it probably is the most cult-infested town in this or any other country. The invasion began with the Seventh Day Adventists, who made Battle Creek their world-headquarters. After them came the Spiritualists, who almost became strong enough to contest Adventist supremacy. Quakers followed, and later came a very riot of sects, believers in anything, everything and nothing, and disbelievers in the same. At the present time in this one little city, in addition to the foregoing, are Fouricrites or Harmonists, Christadelphians, Mind Healers, members of the Hermetic Brotherhood, the Age to Come, Millenium Dawn, Breath of Life, Church of the Larger Hope, Flohim's Brotherhood, Theosophists, Gnostics, Fire Worshipers, Restitutionists, Saints of God, and perhaps a few more have been added since the last reports came in. There are few places where a person can come so near to taking his choice in selecting his own private door to Heaven as he can in Battle Creek.

American Invasion of Canada

During the year terminating March 31, 1910, citizens of the United States, to the number of 103,789, emigrated to Canada. These are big enough figures to set an American to thinking somewhat seriously. To be sure, our immigrants outnumber these emigrants about ten to one, but number is not all there is to the migration problem, and there is reason to believe that the Americans who are going to Canada to create homes for themselves average a far higher type of men and women than do the people from the southern part of Europe who much more than take their places. In other words, the quantity migration still is our way, but it is to be feared that the quality migration trends in another direction. The Christian Science Monitor thinks that "there is no danger that the Americans who are now crowding into the western part of the Dominion will fail to increase the respect already felt in Canada for us. We shall both be gainers, rather than losers, by the closer relationship." Yes, but is not the love of a citizen for his country better than any respect which a former citizen and his neighbors may feel for it?

A pamphlet issued by the East Indian Association is rather interesting inasmuch as it gives some idea of the "sweet tooth" of the world's leading nations, at any rate, if its size can be judged by the amount of sugar they consume per capita. Australia comes first, with a consumption of 129 pounds. The United States is next, with 84.85 pounds. Then follow other nations in the following order: The United Kingdom, 81.19 pounds; Canada, 75.03; Switzerland, 65; Denmark, 55; India, 44; Germany, 36.5; France, 32; Austria, 22, and Italy, 7 pounds.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

IT'S OUR MOVE

TO OUR NEW STORE AT

42 and 44 CALIFORNIA ST

One half block off Market St.

Calendars, Pocket Diaries
Office Diaries for 1910

LE COUNT, CLARK & ORMOND

STATIONERS AND PRINTERS
San Francisco

"We Hold Thee Safe"

QUEEN INSURANCE CO.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

ROLLA V. WATT
MANAGER

N. W. Corner Pine and Sansome Streets
SAN FRANCISCO

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

THREE MINSTRELS

By Anna M. Reed

Three minstrels sing, at dawn and dark,
And through the slumberous golden noon.
The dove, the robin and the lark,
Here at the threshold of the June
At dawn the robin's matin song
Is first to wake the dreaming notes,
And while its changes still prolong,
The Angelus rings, clear and strong,
From out a myriad yellow throats.
Then, as the daylight waxes dim,
The wood dove coos its vesper hymn;
The robin at the early dawn—
The lark at noon—at dark the dove—
Three minstrels—but the theme is love.

Mrs. Anna Morrison Reed, who contributed this poem to the Overland Monthly a good many years ago, is a resident of Ukiah and has published many poems and sketches.

THE PUBLISHING BUSINESS

The business of publishing books is one of the most highly speculative enterprises in the whole world of legitimate industry. The risks are not quite on the scale of the risks in the theatrical business, but they are the same kind of risks. The publisher must back his judgment of that most fickle of all things, the popular taste. If he strikes it, he may make anything from a reasonable profit to a gold-mine out of a book. If he does not, he gets no sympathy when he has sadly to charge off one more failure to profit and loss.

The time between the first investment in a book and the first returns from it is a long period for money to be costing interest and paying no dividends. Here is about the usual course of a book in process of publication:

The publisher's "reader" recommends it. Usually the publisher is surrounded by associates in a firm. After a favorable report from the reader the book goes to these smaller members of the firm. Each one may have the manuscript for a week. If they all feel inclined to accept it, the head of the firm reads it. If he is favorably impressed, the head salesman is asked to look it over. Sometimes, in addition, a firm has a "literary adviser," a man of wide reading, good taste and conservative judgment. He, also, reads the book.

Suppose all the reports are favorable. Some months have probably been spent in reaching a decision. Then the manuscript is turned over to a copy-reader, who marks it for the printer, corrects spelling and punctuation, and makes the typographical style uniform. Estimates are asked and compared for the composition and printing. Styles of paper and binding are chosen. Illustrations are ordered. The book is put in type and proof-read, and then the author reads the proofs. The forms are laid out, the presswork is done, the binding is finished. All these things mean time consumed, money expended.

In the meantime, the salesmen to the trade are out showing a "dummy" of the book to the retail booksellers. A dummy shows the binding, title page and the first few pages of the book, hastily set up, and enough blank pages to show the estimated thickness of the completed volume. The booksellers are buying now for next Christmas' trade. The publisher will deliver the books before October. But the publisher, after standing all the expense of manufacture, sale, distribution and advertising, will not get his money from the retailers before January 15, 1911. In other words, his cumulative investment of thousands of dollars is costing interest and salaries, while it waits for the fall and Christmas buying to see whether or no the public will accept what is offered.

These facts account for the cost of books to the public. The actual manufacturing cost of making a $1.50 book is comparatively small—about 2 cents for printing, 10 or 15 cents for paper, and 10 cents more for binding—about 25 or 30 cents in all. The author's royalty takes another 15 to 30 cents. The book sells to the retailer for 90 cents. The difference pays interest on the investment, cost of advertising and selling, and the profit. Of course, the profits rise rapidly as the sales mount. But the average book sells 2,000 copies, and barely pays a few dollars profit. It is only when a book has sold 10,000 copies and keeps going up that the publisher feels he has made enough to risk an occasional "high-brow" book which he can publish on the basis of "art for art's sake." Ordinarily he feels the necessity of following the trail of commercial success pretty closely.

THE ULTIMATE LIE

By G. K. Chesterton

They have tried to set up the preposterous pretense that those who are rich in a state are rich in their own merit, and that those who are poor in a state are poor by their own fault. Mr. Kipling, in his swan song of suicide in the Morning Post, speaks of the unemployed laborer as the man "whose unthrift has destroyed him." He speaks of the modern landlord as the man who has toiled, who has striven and gathered possession. Now there are some occasions upon which a blasphemy against facts renders unimportant even a blasphemy against religion. It is so in these cases in which calamity is made a moral curse or proof of guilt.

It becomes quite a secondary fact that this new Tory theory is opposed to the Christian theory at every point, at every instant of history, from the boils of Job to the leprosy of Father Damien. It does not matter for the moment that the thing is un-Christian. The thing is a lie; everyone knows it to be a lie; the men who speak and write it know it to be a lie. They know as well as I do that the men who climb to the top of the modern ladder are not the best men, nor the cleverest, nor even the most industrious. Nobody who has ever talked to poor men on seats in Battersea Park can conceivably believe that they are the worst men of the community. Nobody who has ever talked to rich men at city dinners can conceivably believe that they are the best men of the community. On this one thesis I will admit no arguments about unconsciousness, self-deception or mere ritual phraseology. I admit all that and more most heartily to the man who says that the aristocracy as a whole is good for England or that poverty as a whole cannot be cured.

But if a man says that in his experience the thrifty thrive and only the unthrifty perish, then (as St. John the Evangelist says) he is a liar. This is the ultimate lie, and all who utter it are liars.—The London News.

MARK TWAIN AND LONDON BEDS

Mark Twain put up at a hotel frequented by Americans in the Piccadilly district of London when he was on his world tour in 1900. Here he acquired what he called the "London private hotel lumbago." He described it more fully in the following letter, which has lately come to light:

"My lumbago is not the ordinary kind. It is what is called private hotel lumbago. One gets it from the beds; they are unnecessarily firm.

"Their main interest is geological. They are old Silurian superimposed upon old red sandstone and still contain the print of prehistoric man.

"The English private hotel was once the best in the world, and is still the quietest, but its other merits are in decay. It is lingering along upon its bygone honorable reputation. It has more affectations than sincerities now.

"Many elderly English people still cling to it from inherited habit and arrested development, and rich Americans frequent it through ignorance and superstition. They find in its austere solemnity and Sabbath repose a delicate charm which makes up for its high charges and inconveniences. Pretenders who cannot afford to live in — street affect the lumbago, because it conveys the impression that they live at —'s."

PUBLISHERS' NOTES

So general has become the use of the Atlantic Monthly for class-room work in the study of English that the publishers recently offered prizes for the best essays by undergraduates upon the use of the magazine for this purpose. Essays were submitted by students in 22 colleges and universities. The judges, of which the editor of the Atlantic was one, were greatly impressed by the literary excellence of the essays submitted. The prizes were awarded as follows: First prize, Charles W. Hammond, agricultural college, Fargo, N. D.; second prize, Helen K. Little, Ohio state university; third prize, Myra A. Burrage, Boston university.

"The Autobiography of a Clown," writes James Lane Allen of Isaac F. Marcossou's new book, published by Moffat, Yard & Co., "should have thousands of readers. Every reader of it will be its friend. The subject is of universal interest, and it is handled with great charm of incident and much mastery of style."

"Hearts Contending," the new novel by Georg Shock which was in the list of best sellers in New York last week, has met with high literary praise as well. "I think better and better of the Georg Shock book," writes W. D. Howells to a friend. "It seems to me that you have started another George Eliot." Mr. Howells has lost none of his friendliness for the young author. When it comes to actual performance he is an exacting critic, but with beginners his genial optimism never fails. He has suffered many disappointments from ugly ducklings that failed to turn into swans, but very likely it has sometimes been the duckling's fault.

"The task of the Cossack, to lead in the conquest of kindred native races and to weld these through themselves into Russia's fabric, is nearly done," says Lindon Bates, Jr., in "The Russian Road to China" (Houghton Mifflin company). "They have become an anomaly, this hard-riding, fierce-fighting soldier class. The plow has metamorphosed into myriad farms the plains along the Don where once their ponies grazed. Mining cuts score the hills in the Urals where once they hunted. Villages of Slavonic peasants rise along the Amur. The sons of the old warriors grow into peaceful farmer folk, differing in name alone from their blue-eyed neighbors. Soon they must disappear in all save picturesquely-uniformed hussars of the guard."

Collier's Weekly says: "Mr. Stephen French Whitman's novel, 'Predestined,' is a subject about which one finds it difficult not to talk at considerable length. It is not often that an American author's first novel suggests comparisons with the great realists of France and Russia and plunges one at once into the interminable discussion of what are art and literature and what the novelist's function may or may not be."

Francis Lynde's new novel, "The Taming of Red Butte Western," which has just been published, is one of the best stories of railroad life and adventure that has ever been written. The Brooklyn Eagle says of it: "The story moves swiftly from the beginning and the action grows in intensity and strenuousness as the story progresses. It is one of those tales that grip one from the first paragraph. Mr. Lynde's earlier tales have given his readers a taste of his quality, and they will find there is no lessening either in interest or originality in this new story from his pen. It is the sort of story that needs just the background he has given it; a setting where civilization almost merges into primeval barbarism. It is a satisfying tale and one which will be widely read."

A handsome volume of Kipling's collected verse is announced for October.

WILLIAM KENT

STUDENT, REFORMER, SUCCESSFUL POLITICIAN AND MAN OF AFFAIRS

Mine is the pleasant task of writing a "sketch" of William Kent, candidate for Congress from the second district. But at the very outset of the undertaking I find the most significant and interesting facts of his career in the words of a better writer, Lincoln Steffens. Writing from Riverside, Conn., to a friend in Berkeley, under date of May 13th (three weeks ago) he says:

"Yes, I am a Californian, from the second congressional district, and to be more provincial still, from Sacramento. And I know William Kent, well.

"I discovered him first when I was raking muck in Chicago. Things were pretty bad there, but there was a streak of good and I followed it. It led me back to a time when some young fellows in Chicago set out to fight the crooked gang that ran the Board of Aldermen. The gang was very tough; to fight them was not child's play; and the young gentlemen who went up against them were not the kind that I had learned to take much stock in. They were gentlemen. One of them was John Harlan, the son of a Justice of the Supreme Court; another was Mr. William Kent, the son of a founder of Chicago, and a millionaire; and they were all pretty much of that ilk. But I learned they went to the people with the truth and with explicit promises of service. They did not talk much about being 'better people.' They didn't run simply on the platform that they were 'good men,' and that their opponents were 'bad men.' They said that their opponents were crooks, in the service of the railroad. And that they would fight those crooks in the interest of the people. And the people were convinced, somehow, grinned and sent them to the Board of Aldermen.

"When they got there, some five or seven of them, they saw they couldn't do much. They were as helpless as the few insurgents are in Congress today. But they held a meeting—a sort of reformed caucus, and they decided that the only thing for them to do was to make the meetings of the Aldermen so interesting to the public that the people would send more insurgents there and reform the whole board, by making it represent the public instead of the special interests. And the way they planned to do that was amusing and rather splendid. They gathered facts about the toughest members of the board which they turned over to John Harlan or Billy Kent or any one of the crowd that was to make the speech of the evening. Then they all put guns in their pockets. At the right moment in the debate the speaker of the evening would walk down the aisle to the particular crook they had planned to skin that night and as the rest moved about into positions from which they could cover, so to speak, the most dangerous of the 'wolves' (as Chicago called its grafters) the orator would speak. He spoke usually with great simplicity, directness and with a startling array of facts, and face to face with his enemy. Of course this made very interesting scenes. Peter Dunne, who has since become known as 'Mr. Dooley,' and the other reporters who had papers that would print their stuff, used to describe these scenes with skill and personal enthusiasm. There was no shooting, but I suspect that the reason was that it became generally known that these insurgents were ready for any shooting that there might be; and also, because it was understood in the board that the insurgents fully intended to have the drop on the leaders of the gang if there was any sign of fight.

"Now the result of all this was that the people of Chicago set about reforming that Board of Aldermen. Billy Kent (he soon was promoted by the grafters who came to like him from Mr. William to 'Billy') and others of these fighters organized the Municipal Voters League. The league took up the task of gathering and publishing facts. This informed the people, who gradually changed completely the character of the Board of Aldermen. They didn't turn out all the crooks. That isn't necessary. They didn't elect all 'good men.' That isn't necessary. What they did was to turn out everybody that voted for and represented Yerkes in the street railroad; they kept everybody that represented the city of Chicago. In the course of six years, the municipal league made the Board of Aldermen of Chicago truly representative of the people of Chicago, and Yerkes, as we all know, moved to London, England. Billy Kent was the president of the Municipal Voters League in the middle of the darkest period of its warlike history."

Leaving Mr. Kent's Chicago experiences for the moment, let us get them in perspective with the other facts in his career. William Kent was born in Chicago, March 29, 1864. His father was A. E. Kent, a pioneer packer of Chicago. William Kent came to California as a boy of seven immediately after the Chicago fire of 1871. He lived in his present home in Marin county, on a 900-acre ranch at the foot of Mt. Tamalpais, and got his primary school education at San Rafael. In 1881 he went east to enter the Hopkins Grammar School of New Haven, to prepare for Yale. He entered Yale in 1883 and graduated in 1887.

MR. WILLIAM KENT

In college, Kent had things pretty much his own way. He made a good record for scholarship without being a grind, but he especially made a good record as leader in college sports, college politics and the general give-and-take of college boys' activities. With two or three others he enjoyed a reputation, which he earned, for being absolutely "white"—if Kent said a certain thing was true, it was believed by the other fellows. This small detail is worth reporting because it is a quality that served him well in politics in Chicago and which still distinguishes him among all who know him.

He specialized on literary work in Yale, and served as editor of the Yale Courant, the humorous bi-weekly student paper, and as editor of the Yale Literary Magazine. The latter is especially an honor, for it not only presumes ability to handle the job, but also the personality to get elected to it by fellow classmates.

After leaving college, Kent went to work in Chicago. His father was an invalid, living in California, and it fell to Kent to manage his large property interests in the Middle West. These interests included the management of real estate holdings in Chicago and of investments in stocks and in lands in various parts of the country. On his own account Kent formed the firm of Kent & Burke to engage in raising livestock in Nance County, Nebraska. He also acquired an interest in large sheep and cattle ranges in Nevada. A good deal of his life has been spent in the open, looking after this part of his business. Here he learned to ride. Also here he became—and still is—a dead shot with a revolver. In Chicago he bought stock in a bank, of which he became a director. Altogether he had a comprehensive training in the practical affairs of life.

But along with these experiences he found his way into other interesting human relations. A pretty intimate view of the corrupt connections that exist between business and politics made him pause to consider which path he would follow in his own business. He chose the path of decency, of refusing to get business advantages at the expense of the public or at the cost of corrupting public servants. That choice meant fight in his own business. These fights led him into the broader fight for better government, the fight to break up the corrupt municipal ring and to put bad men out of office and to make possible legitimate business dealings with the city.

This fight, at this time in Chicago, took the specific form of war upon Yerkes, the street railroad man. It was Yerkes who had corrupted the city government, which in turn contaminated all others who tried to do business with it. Yerkes controlled the city council and, by alliances, the State Legislature in matters that affected traction interests in Chicago. Yerkes could get franchises whenever he wanted them; nobody else could. Yerkes could get favorable ordinances that permitted him to give Chicago the worst transportation facilities in the United States and collect a fortune for doing it.

Kent's first interest in municipal politics in Chicago was in 1890, when he was prominently identified with the work of the Civil Service Reform Association, which finally got an effective civil service law for Chicago and which was a great factor in the extension of the civil service idea throughout the United States.

In 1894 he went into the general fight for traction reform in Chicago. He ran for the city Council. His ward was one of the decent wards, and Kent was elected. Right here is where Lincoln Steffens's account of Kent's Chicago experience fits into the consecutive narrative of his career. Some facts omitted by Steffens should be added.

Kent was the fighter of the little band of reformers. Not that his ideas were any more radical or less practical than those of the other reformers, but that he had more of the politician's instinct for the right moment to strike a blow, more of the dramatic sense that understands how to make a situation picturesquely interesting to the public through the newspapers. So he cheerfully permitted himself to be made the "goat" for a good many spectacular things that other people did for the cause of reform that they might not care to have hooked up with their names, but which helped just as much as if they had been credited to their real authors. Also, he did most of the hard fighting, hard in the sense that he made the enemies and accepted the attacks for the whole movement, leaving others to do the quiet work that was possible while he kept the enemy busy.

He was better equipped for this kind of work because of the very human quality of his personality. He made friends of all kinds of "rough-necks," met them on their own stamping grounds, as man to man, and won them by his frankness and sincerity. He held them, too, by playing fair. For instance, it was necessary, to win the traction fight—the crux of municipal corruption—to subordinate other reforms for the time. It was necessary, to do this, to get the toughest district in Chicago, bossed by Michael Kenna, otherwise notorious as "Hinky Dink." Kent got his friends in the

(Continued on Page 442)

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Another, Too, Bears the Scar!

For the deeds I have done I must pay the price,
And my soul shall be brave to bear;
I will not flinch though the seed of vice
Shall blossom in black despair.
I will cry to my God in his Judgment Day.
Though the rod of his justice smite:
"I knew my sin, and the price I pay,
For this is the Law of Right."

But oh, and but oh,
To feel and to know
My deed must another mar,
That the sin was mine
'Gainst the law divine,
But another, too, bears the scar!

The price I must pay I would pay alone;
This only I make my prayer:
Let me bear the load of the guilt I own,
Nor another its burden share.
For some there were, and I loved them well,
Yet I tempted them far to stray
Down paths where the gibbering demons dwell—
Then mine be the price to pay.

For it's oh, and it's oh,
To feel and to know,
As we wander afar and far,
That the ill we do
Brands another, too;
Another, too, bears the scar!

* * *

The View Somewhat Obstructed

Her Husband—She used to look to heaven with hope.
The Parson—I trust that she does so still.
"Well, you see, Elder, she wears one of these modern feminine hats, and—"
"I see; I see."
"Yes, but you don't wear that kind of hat."

* * *

Fightin' in '52

I own I look with gloom upon this rude prize-fightin' bunch
Which strive to reach the solar plex with devastatin' punch;
I do not prize the upper-cut nor manly self-defense
That leaves the face too much embossed with gashes an' with dents;
I cannot feel my heart to thrill; indeed, it somewhat shocks
My higher sense when two gents strives to bruise each other's blocks.
If gents fall out in argyment, as sometimes gents will do,
A gun is better fur than fists we claimed in '52.
It's fur less mussy than the fists; your nose
it does not leave
So often stranded 'neath your ear, which is a thing to grieve;
A cauliflower ear is not a burden guns bestow;
You're fur less apt to miss some teeth where teeth had ought to grow.
I don't approve the fightin' game, for I am meek an' mild.
An' for the style of Queensbury I reckon that I'm spiled,
But if men fight, as men will fight, I claim the thing to do
Is pull your gun almighty quick, like back in '52.

These here orations that the pugs give out for papers' dope—
"He is a boob"—"I'll lick the stiff"—"I'll knock him through the rope"—
They fill my soul with sentiments that some resemble woe—
Fist-fightin' with their hands wrapped up to make a softer blow!—
An' then my thoughts go driftin' out unto a
Camp back there
Where men was Men, an' deeds was Deeds,
some rough but on the square,
An' then I git to wonderin' what these bruiser gents would do
If fightin' meant a gun-play like it meant in '52.

The Opinions of Rufus

'Tain't 'cause we want it that we ask our friend for his honest jedgment of somethin' we've done; it's fer the sake of listenin' to the honeyed an' delicious accents in which he tells us it's jest beautiful.

A morganatic marriage, Ezry, seein's you've asked me, is the kind that would be the first step to bigamy if you an' I committed it.

It's said that kings can do no wrong, but only experts can tell the diff'rence 'tween the real thing an' some of the imitations they give.

Almost together, two kings passed through the narrer door—a king of thought an' a king by accident of birth. Which one of the two do you reckon they made room fer 'way up in front?

Es a humble representative of the middle class I want to call 'tention to the fact that all the strawberries is 'tween the layers of baked dough in the shortcake.

He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city, but he needn't expect that the fact 'll be mentioned so often in the newspapers.

'Posed to prize-fightin' es I am, I s'pose I'll turn to the sportin' page of the paper in the mornin' of July 5 to find out whether Jeffries or Johnson licked. This shows my lost an' fallen condition, fer I don't reckon they's another 'ponent that 'll do sech a thing.

The Scripcher says that God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, but I understand that several exceptions have been noticed 'round
Wall Street.

The Almighty used up all of creation He needed to make the earth, an' then He says,
"Well, woman can use the rest to trim her hat." An' so nothin's wasted.

Middlin' often superstition, es we define it, is relegion of the kind that we don't b'lieve in.

* * *

Woman's Soft Asbestos Hands

The hands of a woman—I refer to the kind of woman with whom you are most acquainted, Augustus—are soft and delicate, and her fingers are slight, and the skin is like velvet, and—but you know how you feel when you come in contact with such hands, my boy.
And the hands of a man, or of many men,
are rough and hard and horny, and they do not handsome enough so that anybody ever mentions it. It follows that the hands of men will endure much, those of women little.
does it not? Yes, it does—not.

Ever watch a woman when she appears in the role of domestic goddess over a cook-stove? If you did not, you have a surprise coming if ever you do thus watch her. Talk about soft and delicate hands! Say, she can handle things so red-hot that it gives you a pain just to observe her. She will take a pan of biscuits seven times heated out of the oven, and apparently think nothing of it. If a man were to attempt to handle that same pan he would first yell ouch, and then jump through the window. And it is so with everything; their "soft and delicate" hands can easily handle anything of a temperature less than 700 degrees above zero. If I could bring myself to believe—but I cannot—that any of our sisters ever are so unfortunate as to go to the region down stairs, I should feel confident that the Great Mogul down there must detail the women to manage his hottest furnaces, and if they do go I am sure that they will suffer less from excessive heat than men will.

This is one of the mysteries of this life of mystery, Augustus—how a woman's hands can be so soft and so delicate and yet share with asbestos the power to resist heat. No man can solve the problem; all he can do is to yell "ouch!" or worse when he touches a hot article, and then try not to look sheepish when his wife, mother, sister or daughter picks it up and carries it away.

Alden Anderson's Sacramento Speech

(As telepathically reported by one who, unfortunately, was unable to be present that evening. As it is understood that the speech may not be repeated during the campaign, it is important that it be preserved.)

No sooner had the whistle's prolonged toot and the ringing of the engine-bell ceased to be heard than Mr. Anderson advanced to address the audience. He was greeted with tumultuous applause mingled with heart-rending sobs.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, his bell-like tones rang forth, I come to bury Johnson, not to praise him. That is, I come to bury him if he will consent to be dead.
Five glorious decades ago, my hearers, the Republican Party was born, born to perpetuate immortal principle and the memory of an immortal man. We have the memory yet.
The Grand Old Party! The Party of Lofty Principles and Big Interests! The Party of Lincoln and Aldrich, of Grant and Cannon, of—of—will somebody throw out the miscreant who brought in that bell? Thanks.

Ladies and gentlemen, we cannot too strenuously uphold the principles for the maintenance of which the Republican Party was born. Any good history of forty or fifty years ago will tell you what they were, and the epitaphs which good men carved upon their tombstone will convince you of the esteem in which they were held. They must be maintained as soon as we have found their grave. We must bid defiance to tyranny and oppression (quit tooting) and, acknowledging no master except the corp—you are mistaken, I was going to say, the corpuscle which is red, press—there's another bell. Throw him out! Thanks.

Friends, Sacramentans, Countrymen and Tom Fox, you who have made Sacramento and own it politically or otherwise, what this magnificent Golden State of the Southern Pacific Company and ours needs is a government of Business Men, by a Business Man and for Business Men, and I have been authorized by a party whom I will not designate (I can speak better if this tooting will cease) to give it to you. For thirty years we have had such a government, and our crops have averaged well during that time. Shall we, then, change locomotives—that is, horses,
while we are crossing the stream? Forbid it, Almighty—well, he has requested me not to mention his name in this campaign, but you know to whom I refer. (Will somebody kindly eject the criminal who is saying, "Chug-chug!" back there? Thanks.)

My friends, I leave Mr. Her—that is, my case in your hands. Vote for him—that is, for me, and Business will prosper, and, compared with that, what else is worth while?
I thank you for your kind attention. As the poet says, where duty calls or danger, be never discovered there. Good-night.

(It is due to Mr. Anderson to say that the rumor that the band played the Dead March from Saul as he proudly passed from the room is false and unjustifiable. What it played was, Hear dem Bells! Don't You Hear dem Bells?)

* * *

One Disease He Couldn't Have

First Physician—I have diagnosed his case as softening of the brain.

Consulting Physician—I entertain no doubt that you are mistaken.

"But you are not acquainted with the case,
are you?"

"No, but I know the patient."

* * *

And Appetizers Don't Help

I am not asking much today.

The sun may shine or hide away.

The birds may sing or mutely fly.

The flowers may bloom or they may die,

And I'll not mind; but what I wish

As little touched I pass each dish—

I wish, with pain that can't be hid,

That "grub" would taste as once it did

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Philip A. Stanton's Personal Statement

The Watchman has read with interest Philip A. Stanton's personal statement to Republicans of California. It makes good reading. There is much in it, if words were the only thing needful, to commend Stanton to the favorable consideration of voters. Unlike Alden Anderson, Stanton does not face the paramount issue in this campaign, whether California shall be bond or free, with a far-away look in his eyes, laying low and saying nothing. Unlike Charles F. Curry, he has not put forth a platform of generalities evading the main issue and championing no other of importance. He faces every issue squarely, if not always fairly, and he fights in the open. If Hiram Johnson were not a candidate, and there were no Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League fighting to make California a free state, The Watchman would be much inclined to take Phil Stanton at his word, often as it has failed of being exemplified in his acts, and support his candidacy in preference to that of Alden Anderson, although Anderson is the safer and the saner of the two. It goes without saying that no man with ideals above politics-for-patronage-only could support Charles F. Curry. Whatever Mr. Stanton's purpose may be, the evident effect of his candidacy must be to take away from, if not divide, the Johnson vote, and he must not feel hurt if many voters reach the conclusion that his candidacy was brought forward chiefly to that end. It can have no other effect. We are inclined to absolve Mr. Stanton from personal responsibility for being in the campaign solely to the injury of Johnson and the cause for which he stands. He got the bee in his bonnet, and when Phil Stanton gets a bee in his bonnet there is no knowing what may happen within the next few minutes.

No "Deflection From the Party"

Mr. Stanton discusses the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League under the caption, "A Deflection From the Party." There is and has been no such "deflection" from the Republican party. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is Republican. It assumes that its kind of Republicanism is true Republicanism and that when the Republicans of California endorse it, as they seem likely to do in August, that kind of Republicanism will become "regular," the only Republicanism recognized, true to name, died in the wool, blown in the bottle or otherwise bearing the hall-mark of purity and genuineness. The "deflection," Mr. Stanton, is from the Southern Pacific Political Bureau's "organization" of the Republican party which has maintained its ascendancy so long that even Mr. Stanton himself appears to recognize it as the Republican party in California. Mr. Stanton has nowhere announced his "deflection" from that "organization" and, acting in and with that "organization," all talk of opposition to corporation control is irrelevant, immaterial and incompetent to prove anything.

Mr. Stanton objects, also, to the method by which the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League made up its ticket to be submitted to Republicans for their approval or disapproval. In what essential particular did that method differ from the one adopted by Mr. Stanton's friends in bringing him out? It is true that Mr. Stanton's friends quit when they had endorsed a candidate for Governor while the League went on and made up an entire State ticket, but the one was as certainly in conformity with the spirit of the primary as the other. The only essential difference is that the friends of Hiram Johnson went farther and did more than the friends of Phil Stanton.

There is no obligation upon any member of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League to support the League ticket except as that ticket commends itself to his good judgment, his ideals of what is profitable for government and his recognition of manly character. A number of gentlemen came together and said: "Let us go to now and offer the name of Phil A. Stanton to Republicans as a suitable candidate for Governor of California on the issue that the nomination should come south this time." Another group got together and said: "Let us go to now and emancipate the Republican party of California from corporation control and, that we may do so, let us make up a full ticket pledged to that issue that Republicans may vote for it." In what particular is there any difference in principle? Mr. Stanton should not quarrel with a procedure that brought him out.

Phil. A. Stanton's Corporation Policy

Speaking of corporations Mr. Stanton says: "I would remove them from it and say to them: 'Stay where you belong; attend to your own affairs; do not presume to assume the functions of government; build up your business along legitimate lines; help the upbuilding of our State, and we who are entrusted with the management of its affairs will see that you are not molested by the demagogue or any other man who desires to elevate himself by discrediting you or injuring or impeding your legitimate efforts.' In this way, in my opinion, the problem can be solved." So it can, Philip. That is exactly the attitude of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League toward that very important problem. But when, Philip, in your political career, have you publicly and potentially taken that stand when you had a chance? It is true that you "stood out" at the Santa Cruz convention, but that was through personal loyalty to Pardee. His influence had made you chairman of the ways and means committee and he had given your man Friday a good job. You "stood out," but you got splendidly disciplined for it at the next session of the Legislature, since when you have "stood-in" up to just short of the point where it would be necessary for you to commit political harikari, and not even Mr. Herrin exacts that. You have not been disobedient in any essential particular.

Despite your giving effect to 60 per cent of the preferences of members as to what committees they should serve on, it was notorious that you took Walter Parker and Jere Burke into conference on the constitution of the committees and refused to promise beforehand that you would not do so.

Knowing that the Southern Pacific Political Bureau was hostile to an effective direct primary law, you made Leeds, an out-and-out corporation man, chairman of the committee on election laws, and you put on that committee Grove L. Johnson, a known tool of corporate interests, besides such known corporation men as Johnston, Hopkins, Pugh and Webber. In fact, you framed that committee against a good, effective, satisfactory direct primary law, as evidenced by the fact that six out of the nine members of it voted for the Leeds amendment preventing a state-wide advisory vote on United States Senator and putting into the bill in its place, that district abomination which was conceived in duplicity and malevolence, and which you, yourself, voted for and stood for. There was not a man in the Assembly not fit to be there who did not vote with you on that proposal and there was scarcely a man there, who was fit to be there, who did not vote against you on the Leeds amendment. You showed your true colors then.

Your declaration on the subject of corporation influence in politics is ideal, none better, but unfortunately your performance, when you had a chance to square your performance with your principles, speaks louder than any language you can utter.

Then there was that junket to Seattle, in September, at public expense, to attend the opening of the Alaska-Yukon Exposition, that took place in June!

Not Against Taft Or His Policies

Efforts have been made to make it appear that the candidacy of William Kent for the Republican nomination for Congress, in the Second District, will be made upon hostility to Taft and his policies. This is not true. The policies of Taft, the great, splendid program that he had formed to be crystallized into statutes during his administration, will be the policies of Kent, as they have been all along and were when he worked and contributed toward the election of Mr. Taft, with whom he enjoys a personal acquaintance of many years' standing.

What Mr. Kent is opposed to is the way President Taft has gone about doing the work he set out to do. He objects to the men with whom he has chiefly surrounded himself, men who, as Mr. Kent, in common with about every one else, it would seem, except the President himself, believes cannot be relied on to carry out those policies, for the reason that they do not favor them.

Mr. Kent regards Aldrich as a bad man in whose hands to have placed tariff reform; Elkins as a bad man in whose hands to entrust effective governmental control of railroads and other transportation companies; Wickersham as a bad man to be entrusted with the drafting of reform measures, and Ballinger a bad man to be given in charge of conservation of the nation's resources.

In Mr. Kent's opinion the President needs to be rescued from his enemies and restored to his friends and to the friends of his policies. When this is done and American public sentiment is aroused to get in behind the President in his struggle on behalf of his policies some substantial gain is to be looked for and not until then.

And in this view Mr. Kent is right.

"Ed" Williams Machine Candidate in the 61st

E. A. Williams is understood to be the machine candidate for the Republican nomination for Assemblyman from the Sixty-first Assembly District, which comprises the corporate limits of the city of Fresno. This is not a good district nor a good year for a machine candidate in that district, as Williams will probably know to his sorrow by the middle of August. The Lincoln-Roosevelt League has come pretty well into its own in Fresno. A. M. Drew formerly represented this district in the Assembly, but he is looking now for a seat in the Senate. The League has a choice of two candidates for his successor, between John Fairweather and W. A. Sutherland. Both of these gentlemen have been described in recent issues by The Watchman. His best information is that Mr. Sutherland will probably have the better of the race.

Cartwright Wondering

State Senator G. W. Cartwright of Fresno is in a humorous predicament. He planned to fight for his seat against the attack of A. M. Drew, who wants it. A lot of Cartwright's Democratic friends urged him to go up against Congressman Needham. Senator Holohan of Watsonville had been prominently mentioned for this job, but Holohan felt that he lived in the wrong end of the district, and he joined in the pressure upon Cartwright. Until lately that pressure has squeezed nothing but a shake of the head out of the pressee. But Cartwright recently went to Boston to win a lawsuit, and on the way back home he dropped off at Washington. There he had the experience of Tom Sawyer, who was disgusted when he saw a real United States Senator and found he wasn't twenty-five feet high. Cartwright saw the members of the House of Representatives and was amazed to discover that they weren't intellectual giants when he ranged up alongside them. Now he is back in Fresno with that funny feeling in his bones that makes him wonder if he wouldn't look just as well as Needham on the floor of the House. To date he is undecided, but they told him in Washington that this is a "Democratic year," so it need surprise no one if Cartwright, candidate for Congress, appears in the news at an early day.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

The Hayeses Out For Johnson — "Black" and "Red"—of San Jose have seen a great light. Until the San Jose city election was over and they had accepted the local defeat like gentlemen, they did not seem anxious to tempt other conflicts by coming out strongly on State issues. "J. O." did preside at the Johnson meeting some weeks ago and gave it a good news story in his paper, the Mercury, but the editorial page was coyly silent. But last Tuesday the Mercury printed only one editorial, "The Hope of California—Hiram Johnson" in which the last vestige of caution was thrown aside and the banner of the free was opened to the breeze. It came late, but it shot out with a bang when it came. "E. A." is going to have his hands full with Davison, the mayor of San Jose, against him in the Republican primary and, probably, George Tracy, the union labor man, as his Democratic opponent in November. As an "insurgent" in Congress, Hayes naturally belongs with the Lincoln-Rooseveltters in California, and the only surprising feature of his announcement is that it came so late.

Johnson Date at Dreamland Rink Hiram Johnson will address a mass meeting in San Francisco next Tuesday night at Dreamland Rink. This meeting will crystallize the Johnson sentiment that has been organized by the work of the Independent Republican Clubs during the past two months. This work of organization has taken shape during this week in the following meetings: Monday, the Independent Republican Club of the Thirty-ninth District; Wednesday, of the Thirty-first District; Thursday, of the San Francisco campaign committee, one delegate representing the club of each of the eighteen districts; tonight, Friday, of the Thirty-sixth District. These meetings are all to organize the campaign for Hiram Johnson. Chester H. Rowell, president of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, will also be a speaker at the Dreamland meeting.

Frank Mott, Johnson's Oakland Manager Following the mass meeting at Dreamland Rink, Hiram Johnson will devote the remainder of next week to a thorough canvass of Alameda County, especially of the city of Oakland. Meetings will be held on the 8th, 9th, 10th and 11th. These meetings and the work of organizing the Johnson campaign in Oakland will be under the personal supervision of Mayor Frank K. Mott of Oakland, who strongly endorses Johnson for Governor. The county fight across the bay is a complicated situation, but all hands in the better element have joined heartily in supporting Johnson on the State fight. This is an interesting and encouraging sign. Alameda County can now be figured on to offset some of the worse districts of San Francisco, for example.

Laying Low For Curry's Scalp The very citadel of the political strength of Charles F. Curry is believed to be the Royal Arch. All his life, and even now that he has quit drinking, Curry has "done" politics over the bar and, over the bars of California, he has probably passed as much good, American coin as he has received as salary while Secretary of State. Every barkeeper is instinctively his friend, and it is through the barkeepers that the Royal Arch mainly exerts its political influence. By consanguinity and affection the barkeepers of California are, to all appearances, fast bound to the political fortunes of Charles F. Curry. But now comes word that the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau, through its handy men, is planning to spring a trap on Curry at the very citadel of his power. Two days before the primary election there will be a jingling of best United States metal in the ears of all the barkeepers from Smith River to Calexico, and from Willow Ranch to Tia Juana, accompanied by the whisper, "It is Anderson. Are you on?" The response is confidently expected to be "We are," and that the gravel will slip out from under Curry's number elevens faster than the raging Rio Colorado dug under the alluvial banks that kept it from the Salton sink. In the philosophy of politics-for-the-interests the barkeeper is the man who stands next to The People. With his aid it is possible to move mountains of trouble out of the way. He is an affectionate animal and stands by his friends unless bought, and he will stay bought,—if the interval between purchase and delivery be not too long. This gossip is interesting if true, and rather interesting even if not quite true but only a shrewd surmise instead of a straight tip.

Abner Weed Out Of It The Watchman is assured that Abner Weed will not be re-elected to the state senate. He will not even be a candidate, and for the reason that, in 1894, a compact was entered into between the Republican county committees of the four counties comprising the second senatorial district, Lassen, Modoc, Shasta and Siskiyou, whereby the eastern part of the district, Lassen and Modoc, was to be accorded the Republican senatorial nominee every third senatorial term. God bless that compact! It is now the third term. Shasta named the man in 1894, Modoc in 1898, Shasta in 1902 and Siskiyou sent down Abner Weed in 1906. It would be Lassen's turn this time but the leading Republicans of that county have waived their claim in favor of E. C. Bonner of Modoc, and the leading Republicans of Modoc have joined heartily in the suggestion. So, if there be faith in Israel, E. C. Bonner will be the nominee. He is a decent fellow, not a Lincoln-Roosevelt Leaguer, but an independent minded man who will make the square deal his rule of action. However, the "organization" influence is being thrown to Arthur M. Dean, present assemblyman representing the fourth assembly district, in violation of the compact of 1894. The sort of legislative timber Dean is made of is indicated by the fact that, in Hichborn's History, he ranks fiftieth in order of reputability in that house of eighty members and, on the Hichborn test votes, he voted right 4 times, wrong 5 and was absent twice. A little thing like an agreement of sixteen years' faithful observance is not likely to stand in the way of his candidacy, but Republican voters of the district may think differently about it.

THE AUGUST FLOOD

As To the Cases Of Needham and Smith It is often asked why, in the cases of Representatives Needham and Smith, in view of their standpatism at Washington, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League does not urge out candidates in opposition to them. The Watchman conceives the situation to be about this: These two members of the lower house come from districts whose industries are peculiarly dependent upon a protective tariff. To secure what their constituents wanted these men had to make their peace with Aldrich and Cannon. Both of them were anti-standpatters during the first months of their congressional experience, but both speedily learned that they must "stand in" with the organization back there if they would "get things" their constituents want. No little sympathy is felt for them in their especial predicament, and Needham is so reluctant a standpatter that Cannon passed over him to select another on the tariff conference committee, when by seniority, Needham should have been designated.

Secondly, at home neither of these men has been "organization," at least not until recently, if at all. Some three years ago word was passed out that Needham had made his peace with the Southern Pacific Political Bureau. Smith's San Diego connections have squinted that way, but if, during his eight years in the state senate, he ever "took program," the fact did not leak out. He is a politician and does as politicians do, but has not, to The Watchman's knowledge, ever given aid or comfort to the railroad influence, unless it was in helping to throw the Kern county delegation to Gillett at the Santa Cruz convention, and that was done in the interests of his friend and political associate, Code Commissioner Wylie, who wanted a job, rather than in the interests of the railroad's candidate. By nature, sympathy, association, the temper of their districts and everything except possible political exigency, these men are both against railroad domination in the affairs of this state. The Watchman thinks they ought to have joined the insurgents, at least after the fight was on if not before, and that they must stand for a less autocratic organization of the House in the future or lose their places.

Another reason why no Lincoln-Roosevelter contests their places is that, after fully considering all the pros and cons, no one has cared to enter the lists against them. Nor has it been easy for the Democrats to find Democrats who wish to contest their seats. And, finally, we all of us know that a Democratic house, deadlocked with senate and executive, will exactly suit the purposes of the "interests" in that little or nothing could then be done toward making things better than they are, and the "interests" do not want things better than they are. They want them as they are or worse.

Making An Old Reputation New "Old reputations made new" might be the title of a little political farce-comedy now going the rounds of the "machine" newspapers of the state. The Nevada City Miner-Transcript, for example, is a party to the plot. The soul of the Miner-Transcript is anguished at the endorsement of Edward Rolkin for the state board of equalization, given by the Independent Republican Clubs of San Francisco. After repeating the misrepresentations of Mr. Rolkin that were exposed by The Watchman a week or two ago, the Miner-Transcript eulogizes his principal opponent in these words, "one of the ablest and most conscientious men who ever sat on the board of equalization, Joseph H. Scott." Forsooth, so it is "Joseph H." these days! Strangely new, that name, especially the strange part of it. Only upon the initiated does it slowly dawn that this Joseph H. Scott is the one-time notorious J. Harry Scott, Ruff henchman who took possession of a county office in San Francisco at the pistol's point and held it by force of arms for two years, drawing the salary until, after the term had expired, the Supreme Court decided that he had held it unlawfully. Strange are the ways of politics, but not necessarily past all finding out. The Watchman hereby warns the public not to be deceived by Mr. Scott's newly assumed reform camp to agree to leave Hinky Dink's ward alone for a term of years if Hinky Dink would pledge himself to deliver the alderman from that ward to the reformers on the traction question. Kent made this proposition to Hinky Dink and it was accepted. Hinky Dink kept his part of the agreement to the letter and his alderman saved the day for the reformers more than once. Afterwards some of the reformers wanted to go after Hinky Dink's scalp on other grounds. Kent reminded them of their agreement and quietly added that if they did not live up to it he would go down into Hinky Dink's district himself and help Hinky Dink fight them. The result is that Hinky Dink today regards Kent with profound respect and admiration. "He's the whitest reformer I ever saw," is the way he puts it. "Anything Mr. Kent says to me goes!"

("William Kent"—Continued)

From this part of the social scale to the top, Kent's friends unite in a surprising unanimity of genuine affection for him. Miss Jane Addams of Hull House, Theodore Roosevelt, Peter Finley Dunne ("Mr. Dooley"), Gifford

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office, 30 Montgomery St. Phone Kearny 4491
Residence, 1297 McAllister St. Phone Park 4590
SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

The Complete Text of the

REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

Pinchot, John S. Phillips of the American Magazine, and scores of others who know him best are his warmest admirers.

Kent was president of the Municipal Voters' League of Chicago in 1900-1, and actively connected with it for twelve years. He was also a member of the executive committee of the Citizens' Association, a body organized to enforce the laws and to prevent the stealing of city funds. And he was one of the founders of the City Club of Chicago, which is perhaps the most potent influence for municipal advancement in that city.

The long fight in Chicago impaired Mr. Kent's health and he came to his boyhood home in California to regain it. In this he has been successful. But he has not been idle here. He gave time and money to assist in the graft prosecutions in San Francisco. He gave both to investigate and prevent an attempted outrageous grab of the waters of Lake Tahoe by a power company. He has supplied some of the information and money to make effective the inquiry into the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy. He also bought the beautiful Muir Woods, of giant redwood trees at the base of Mt. Tamalpais, outbidding a lumberman who wanted to destroy them, and presented the grove to the Federal Government for a National Park. An interesting point, because it is characteristic, in connection with this gift, is the fact that he declined to consider President Roosevelt's urgent request that he allow the grove to be named the Kent Woods, and insisted that they be named after John Muir, the pioneer friend of the trees of California. It is further interesting, and characteristic, that this was all done without Mr. Muir's knowledge. Mr. Kent had not then even the pleasure of Mr. Muir's acquaintance.

Two years ago, in 1908, Yale conferred upon Mr. Kent the honorary degree of Master of Arts, on the ground of his distinguished public services. Mr. Kent's address, delivered before the Yale corporation when he received the degree was on the subject of "A Friend of the Republic and His City."

Kent used to count the hunting of wild game as the chief recreation of life. Of late years he has felt increasingly that the desire to kill is not sport, and has pretty much abandoned the use of the gun.

It is rather hard to convey on paper the impression he makes on those who know him. To say that he is democratic is to be literally accurate, but to suggest in addition something that he is entirely free from, which is any trace of self-consciousness or vanity or pride of possession, either of goods or ability. Perhaps "genuine" is the word that most nearly hits it off. Quiet in manner, simple in tastes, he is efficient without making a shout about it and a most useful citizen without asking for praise. In Congress he would have a rare advantage in the personal acquaintance which he has with most of the leaders of national affairs.

NO MORE PNEUMATIC TIRES?

George Westinghouse, the inventor of the air-brake and president of the great Westinghouse electrical works, believes he has perfected a non-puncturable substitute for the pneumatic automobile tire. Here is Mr. Westinghouse's description of the device:

"The spring consists of two brass tubes, each of which is closed at one end which work into each other, piston style. The upper cylinder is fitted with a leather packing at its lower end.

"A third, or outer tube, acts as a dust and mud guard. Four of these cushions are used to replace the steel springs on the ordinary automobile. The upper cylinder of each is attached to the chassis; the lower cylinder to the axle. Enough oil is placed in the cylinder to prevent the escape of the air past the piston packing. The leakage is taken up by a small interior pump, which oscillates with the motion of the vehicle. The piston and cylinder permit a play of about seven inches. The range of action of these springs, and the quickness of air under pressure, not only reduces the maximum strains on the tires, but obviates the rebounding effect of elliptical springs when a car is moving at high speed over 'thank-you-ma'ams.'"

PERSPECTIVES

(From the Fresno Republican.)

The comet has been a curiosity and an inspiration. Everybody has been interested in it, and millions of people have a clearer conception of the constitution of the universe than they had before. And this is all. No terror, no mystery, and no delusion that God was flinging a sign athwart the heavens, to proclaim something concerning the petty affairs of men. We knew how big the comet was and how thin, and we knew how little we were and how safe. Also, we knew that the comet obeyed law, not fiat, and moved its predetermined path unaffected by the petty breaths of men.

It is not easy for a modern man to realize how great is the change of perspective which astronomy has thus brought into the vision of men.

To the ancient man, the earth was the flat floor of the universe and the sky its roof. Beneath the floor dwelt the shades of the dead; above the roof dwelt the immortal gods, either plotting over the affairs of men or serenely indifferent to them. Man himself was the center of the universe, and all other things were considered only as affecting him.

Then came the Ptolemaic system, which is the cosmogony even of Milton's Paradise lost. In this system the earth is the center of the limited universe, surrounded by a number of concentric crystalline spheres, in which are fixed the heavenly bodies, first the sphere of the moon, then the separate sphere of the various planets and the sun, then the sphere of the fixed stars, and outside that the primum mobile, the exterior boundary of the universe. Beyond was plenty of room for heaven and hell and all possible flights of imagination besides. The diameter of the universe, from heaven to hell, was no greater than the distance a body might fall in nine days—say, at the rates Milton would have assumed, about eight or ten thousand miles, or about the actual size of the earth.

Then came the Copernican system, which dethroned man and decentralized the earth—which transformed man from the chief position in the universe to a mere microbe, crawling on the tiniest mote, which floats near a speck of star-dust. The life of man became but a breath, his journey but a span, his body but a colony of microscopic cells. But his soul expanded to the new magnitude of the illimitable universe, and man became infinite and free.

Anthropocentric, geocentric, cosmocentric—man-centered, earth-centered, and universe-centered—these are the long names of the three perspectives. It is a far cry from the ancient Greek, king of a little world of men and animals and nymphs and dryads and great gods and little; through the mediaeval denizen of a ghost-haunted footstool of a terrible Avenger, to the modern clear-sighted man, calm in his faith in the eternity of Law. If astronomy had done nothing else than to rectify the perspective of men, and to lay the ghosts and hobgoblins, that alone would still be the greatest service to human freedom any human knowledge has yet rendered.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

By an overwhelming majority vote the citizens of Chico have decided to issue bonds as follows: $50,000 for city hall, $55,000 for street improvements, $35,000 for sewer system, and $10,000 for fire department.

By a majority of just five votes Los Gatos elected a trustee who will decide the question in favor of permitting the hotels in that town to sell liquor.

William George, Sr., who was the first mayor of Grass Valley, died at his home in Pacific Grove recently.

Edward Dinkelspiel has sold the Solano Republican, of Suisun, to C. E. Clawson.

For the first twenty-two carloads of cherries shipped east from California this season, $85,511 was received.

Oscar Hill, a well known young man of Oroville, was killed by coming in contact with the electric wires on a dredger.

Interurban service between Sacramento and Stockton soon will begin over the line of the Central California Traction Company.

RIGHT FINANCING OF THE EXPOSITION

A PLAN WHEREBY THE PEOPLE MAY SHARE IN THE PROFITS

By JAMES SMITH

San Francisco now seems assured of the Fair in 1915, and its site is becoming a most engrossing topic of conversation.

The location will likely be determined by the stockholders—a vote to a share—and the largest subscribers may have already chosen the ground.

The most appropriate site, all things considered, is Golden Gate Park, west of and including Strawberry Hill, but should it be decided to hold the Fair elsewhere, and if on land privately owned, the query naturally arises—who is entitled to the increased value of such land?

What would make an increase in value? The holding of the Fair thereon, the improvements of the ground and the approaches thereto; and above all the boom the land would obtain as a building tract for homes after the exposition had been closed. A live real estate firm could sell all the lots before the Fair was over and with little effort because of the magnificent advertising the district would obtain.

Public Entitled to Increase

Well, who is entitled to the increase? Who originated, financed and who will carry the Exposition to a successful conclusion? The people or those representing them, and the people are most assuredly entitled to any increased value.

The crime of omission is just as great as the crime of commission, and to allow this unearned increment to go to those who are not entitled to it would be a crime against the people.

But how to realize this increased value and divide it rightfully amongst those to whom it belongs?

This would necessitate the Fair managers going into the real estate business,—something foreign to the carrying out of an Exposition.

A Company to Handle Sale

But why not? If an honest consensus of opinion were found against utilizing the natural site—that part of Golden Gate Park before mentioned—and for holding the Fair on land presently the property of private individuals, from whence could come the objection to the formation of a subsidiary company to look after the increased value, to realize such and to pay it back to the people to whom it is rightly due? The high character of the men who have done all the arduous initial work of the Fair is a guarantee that no suspicion of graft or wrong-doing would knowingly be allowed to creep into anything connected with the Exposition, but good men are often inadvertently led to do things that, forewarned, they would have scorned to do. The subsidiary company would be composed of men above reproach, and all chance of graft is forever eliminated when honest and thoroughly capable men are put at the head of any enterprise whether public or private.

Suspicion of Selfish Interests

Then what sane objection could be raised against the people obtaining what is justly theirs? But suspicion would naturally be aroused if selfish interests were to be benefited through this public enterprise and the cry of graft would be heard if a proposition were made to hold this Fair on private property if the millions of enhanced value of the land would go to the owners of such land.

Which is the juster course—the profits going to the whole people who earned them, or allowing the millions to go into the pockets of those who did nothing to make them? Surely there is but one answer to this question.

But what is meant by the profits going to the people—which people?

Stock Subscribers First Beneficiaries

Firstly, the subscribers of stock would get their money back with 5 per cent interest, and the balance would go for providing our city with such public improvements as would be most beneficial to the great body of the people.

To give an illustration of my meaning, suppose land surrounding Lake Merced was adjudged the best for a site, and outside of Golden Gate Park this place would be as good as any and better than most, how would the people realize on the increase of the value of the land? And the arguments here advanced are equally applicable to all locations outside of public property—Lake Merced being only used as an example.

Valuation by Arbiters

A valuation of the land required would be made by arbiters, two to be appointed by Spring Valley Water Company, to whom the land belongs, and two by the subsidiary company, and these arbiters to name an oversman, and their award to be final and binding, such valuation to be based upon the present value of the land and not on any prospective value because of the Exposition being held thereon.

Then the subsidiary company, which would finance the Fair on the award being pronounced, would be deeded the land and in return would grant a mortgage to Spring Valley Company for the price, bearing 5 per cent net interest.

Let us suppose that 2800 acres were thus acquired and that the price was $750 an acre—$2,100,000.

Estimating Expenditures

The subsidiary company would then proceed to estimate the expenditures for preparing the ground for the Fair and, in doing so, would keep in view that this land would ultimately be sold as a building site for homes, such expenditures thus serving a double purpose. Streets would all be macadamized, curbs laid, sewers put down, water-mains put in, and gas and electricity would be provided for. Expenditures for these and for all the Exposition buildings which the management have to supply would, including the price of the land, amount to, say, $10,000,000.

Twin Peaks Tunnel

By the district assessment plan or in some other way money may be raised soon to tunnel Twin Peaks, and in that event and if it were found impossible to extend our municipal railroad so as to run through the tunnel and out into this new district, the company might turn to the United Railroads. But there is no hope in that direction, for with a host of lawyers and other parasites to keep the treasury in a chronic state of depletion there never is any money available for railroad purposes. The millions wantonly wasted would have been amply sufficient to have given the best of service on existing lines and to have extended the same to all outlying districts. The subsidiary company would therefore require to obtain a franchise and make the requisite addition from Market street, through the tunnel and out to the Fair Grounds—not only so, but a sum sufficient to intersect the tract when the Fair was over would have to be provided for, because lot buyers would then be assured of rapid transit. All the extensions would be double-tracked, roadbed to be the best that could be made, and from curb to curb the streets would be macadamized—say 3 miles, at $75,000 a mile, $225,000.

Expenditures

The expenditures would be something like this:

The two sums before mentioned... $10,225,000
Interest on mortgage to Spring Valley Company for purchase price of $2,100,000, at 5 per cent for 5 years 525,000 Interest on stockholders' subscriptions, including the appropriation to be obtained from State because money would be held to be a subscription—$10,000,000 at 5 per cent on an average of 3 years.... 1,500,000

The expense of the subsidiary company and for all initial work of Exposition till opening day..... 250,000
Advertising throughout the world... 3,000,000
Miscellaneous expenses 500,000

Probable expenditures $16,000,000

When the Fair is over and the last building has disappeared the subsidiary company would immediately lay down the double line to intersect the tract and the land would then be ready for homes. Should the company then desire to wind up its affairs, it should find a ready purchaser in some rich syndicate—the investment would be so very desirable.

Sale Price

What should the tract be worth to sell as a whole? Well, a good idea can be obtained from the price of lots at Parkside, a little to the north. With poor transportation, 25-foot lots there are bringing $1000 and up. Now, the Lake Merced lots would all be 50-foot front and of great depth, with the best car service provided, and these lots ought to be worth $2500; but to sell as a whole, they would bring, say, $1500 apiece.

11,200 lots at this price amounts to... $16,800,000

But the owners of property along the new car line from Twin Peaks tunnel to Exposition grounds would be required to assess themselves for a share of the expense of the line and for the macadamizing of the street—2200 lots, say, at $125 a lot..... 275,000

The United Railroads would give their bonds in payment of the car lines when same were turned over by the subsidiary company, but these bonds might bring only about 70 per cent of their face value when sold..... 157,500

Provided the income from concessions would pay the running expenses of the Fair, the admission fees would be profit—$500,000 a month for 6 months at 50 cents each 1,500,000

$18,732,500

Deduct expenditures 16,000,000

Balance to the good..... $2,732,500

And if all the affairs of the Exposition were managed upon a strictly business basis, with an eye to economy, the realization of such a surplus is not beyond belief.

The Surplus

The surplus could be spent in many ways to benefit the city, amongst which are, a zoological garden and a splendid aquarium for Golden Gate Park, together with large open-air swimming pools for old and young at the westerly end of the park, the water for the same to be pumped daily from the ocean and to be heated sufficiently to take off the chill, with pavilion and dressing rooms to be erected around the pools. The expense of suits and towels and attendants' wages would be defrayed from the nominal charge of 10 cents collected from bathers. Say a million of the surplus were thus spent, the balance would purchase sufficient ground in that section most in need of it for a playground where our young people would have a chance of physically developing themselves.

But above all a splendid residential district would be opened up and poor old San Francisco, cursed by her public-service corporations, might begin to put on a healthy growth, for that vast tract of land lying between the park south to and including the Fair site would soon be built up and two or three hundred thousand people could be living healthily and happily where now are only sand dunes. Other cities are making far more rapid strides than we are in increase of population, but how can you people vast tracts without transportation or water? The cause of our slow growth can be justly laid at the doors of our public-service corporations.

Would Receive Popular Support

I believe if such a proposition as I have outlined were laid before the people of our State we would soon cry out, "Our subscription lists must close. We cannot accept any more money." And the whole people would be aroused to such enthusiasm that every one would become a booster.

Let us show the people that nothing of a selfish nature will enter into the Exposition's affairs, that all things are being done for the common good, that no one will benefit at the expense of another, and the population of the whole State will feel proud to lend their aid in making our Exposition the wonder of the world.

Future generations would bless the great Fair of 1915 for the legacies of priceless value left behind commemorative of the glories that were, and the names of the patriotic men who had devoted their time and genius unselfishly to make these blessings possible would for-

HONOLULU and back first Reduced Rate $110 class from San Francisco

The splendid steamship SIERRA (Grap Screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5 1/2 days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, June 18, July 9, and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sails from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS 309-310 MARINE BUILDING CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 433,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy. Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco)

526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909.....38,610,731.93
Total Assets41,261,682.21
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President, Emil Rohde; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, George Tourny; Assistant Secretary, A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohde, Ign. Steinhardt, I. N. Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

ever be enshrined in the hearts of countless thousands yet unborn.

What greater reward could our leading citizens desire—the men who have banded themselves together to do a mighty work—than the heartfelt gratitude of their own generation and the generations yet to come?

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor California Weekly.

The "Weekly" in each number is giving some space to comments on the pending Jeffries-Johnson fight; will you confer a favor on many here who are apparently as dull of comprehension as I am, by explaining—if possible—why such a furore has been raised about this particular fight while just such fights have been going on for years in all the principal cities of California, in regularly established fighting rinks, and are taking place every week, and in these places young boys under fifteen are taking lessons and engage in fights under the prize rules. Hundreds of young boys are being trained in the prize rings throughout the state, for prize fighters, and fighting in them. The moral people and the preachers know this, for the advertisements and reports of the fights of these boys are reported in the daily papers beside the sermons of the preachers. How is it that these are not noticed? Is there anything particularly sacred about these two big old prize fighters, that it would be a calamity if both were killed? Does this fight really "threaten the moral, social and financial foundations of the state" as one preacher declares? The common mind would suppose that the prize ring nurseries were the more dangerous to morals, but it appears that the religious and moral minds are different. Please tell us why and how this Jeffries fight is so much more dangerous to morality, and the state, and religion, than all the fights going on in the rinks between the youngsters and the "bantams" and the "middle-weights."

Very respectfully,

W. W. BOWERS.

San Diego, Cal., May 30, 1910.

We presume that the reason that there is a bigger interest in the big fight than in the little ones is that it is a bigger fight. The demoralization is almost in geometric ratio to the size and prominence of the combatants, and it is because of the heavyweight "contests" that there is any interest at all in the little ones. If by any means the big prize fights could be prevented the little ones would soon perish through lack of public interest. Sparring, of itself, is not worth going far to see, but when there is a prospect of seeing something gladiatorial, men will cross oceans to be in at the blood spilling. The extreme concern over the greater event cannot be urged as an excuse for lack of concern over the smaller, but the greater is father to the smaller, not the smaller to the greater.

Dollars Buy—

Houses, Lands,
Stocks,
Bonds,
Furniture,
Automobiles;
But they don't buy—
Love,
Happiness,
Health,
Life.
What's the use?

The Cinematographed Funeral

King Edward's funeral ceremonies will be cinematographed and shown at the Eden Musee immediately after the arrival of the films from London.—Press report.

Oh, Edward, you who ran a kingly race,
And found at last a narrow, uncrowned space,
Your subjects, sore bereft, as they all said,
Now cinematograph your final bed.
A show in life, in death no less they hold
The show should be continued for their gold,
And thus the truth of Shakespeare's words
they show:

"These be the trappings and the pomp of woe."

The manufacture of artificial rubber still is very costly, but it is believed that it can be largely reduced so as to make a formidable competitor of natural rubber. Already it is being manufactured in a small way, in Germany, for sale.

Rubber Stamps 10 CENTS PER LINE

AT Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information
from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country.
Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining,
but thousands do.
To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well
you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law
SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3 1/2 per cent. per annum paid
on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

J. Downey Harvey S. G. Murphy
John A. Hooper James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper J. H. Skinner
Thomas Jennings Rudolph Spreckels
James K. Lynch John W. Van Bergen
Walter S. Martin Clinton E. Worden
J. K. Moffitt George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults
provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

LET me draw your muffler tighter, Uncle, and I can spare you one of my hot bricks, for my feet are now as warm as toast."

"Thanks, honey, I am getting thawed out, too. Old Sol has warmed things up wonderfully."

"And look, Uncle Dick, towards the east. Such a sunrise! And this glorious, snappy air. Aren't you glad we are up in time to enjoy it?"

"We are making good time this morning," replied her uncle. "At this rate we shall reach home just about in time to watch the sunset. Then we can compare that with this."

"I shall be so glad to see mama again," exclaimed the girl with real warmth and affection, but somehow her thoughts trailed off in true girlish fashion. "To think that Mamie Glenmore's whist party comes this week and me away; my first really grown-up party, too. All the boys will be home from college, and I shall miss all the fun. Leonard's letter is sure to come tonight. Why couldn't we wait at least one day more before going to the ranch? He says he can't come until the 23d, but I do hope he will get here in time for the party at Mamie's." And so her thoughts wandered on and on.

The Rev. Richard Graham and his niece, Marcella Yates, had been on the road since early morning. In fact, when they started there was not even a faint ray of light in the east to indicate that day was nearly at hand. In spite of warm robes and hot bricks for their feet, they had suffered considerably with the cold in the first few hours of their ride, especially in that mysteriously dark and apparently coldest time just before dawn. But if anything could compensate a seventeen-year-old girl for being carried off at the holiday season, when parties and all the joyous festivities of that glad time were in prospect, it would be a ride far out into the open country. After a term's hard work in the school room and some burning of midnight oil over troublesome studies the change was invigorating.

Their way lay at first through vineyards and orchards whose rows were so symmetrical and carefully tended as to be a joy to the eye even without their leafage. Then the alfalfa fields growing larger as they traveled farther from town. Next came wheat fields for miles and miles. Then sandy wastes. Even these had beauties of their own. For eyes accustomed to the limited view allowed by trees and houses, the immense distances were a relief and a delight.

Thirty-five out of the forty-five miles of their journey found them with the sun only two hours high and the worse part of the road still before them, for they were now traveling through a sage brush country with the alkali mud rolling up on their wheels, making progress slow. Being now on the home stretch, they had rosy visions of a hearty greeting, cozy fire and all the delights and comforts vouchsafed to weary home-comers by eager home-watchers.

In the distance behind them Marcella called her companion's attention to a dark speck approaching. Now the chief pleasure on the desert is in watching these same dark objects and speculating upon the outcome. It may prove a horseman from one of the sheep camps, or one of the settlers returning from one of his rare trips to town. Maybe one of the Spanish families from the western hills coming back from a trading expedition to the valley, in which case, while the cavalcade stops for water, the handsome daughters of the party may be admired and offered little courtesies, though conversation is limited. Possibly the speck may develop into a party of jolly campers to the coast who have got off the main road and lost their way. Indeed there is no end to the surprises in store from this source. But alas! sometimes they have proven to be only optical illusions, and after faithfully studying a certain point for a long time, to discover that it does not move and is only a sage brush after all.

But this particular object promised developments more or less interesting, for the dark splotch on the horizon was certainly growing larger and must be traveling fast in spite of the heavy roads. As they had already passed all branch roads to settlements of any size, it was probable that whoever it was would pass their way. Of course, there followed the usual speculation as to who it might be.

THE FEE

BY

DORA M. BISHOP

Closer and closer came the object. Maybe it is Colin Campbell with his span of fleet little mules, or old man Duncan on his return to the ranch. But no, the object soon appeared to have more height than breadth. Some one on horseback, undoubtedly; unmerciful rider, from the speed he was making; either drunk or crazy to ride at that break-neck rate. When was anyone ever before known to hurry in this easy-going country? Oh, maybe an outlaw in advance of the posse. Was it not about here that famous horst thief, Joaquin somebody, was shot when he inadvertently raised his head above a sage brush after days of fruitless search? These and similar questions Mr. Graham and Marcella asked each other as the rider rapidly gained on them.

The occupants of the buggy tried not to look too enquiringly as horse and rider dashed alongside. Curiosity is sometimes resented when travelers are in great haste to cross the valley to the timbered hills beyond.

"Hey, thar, stranger," in a terrific bass. The girl shrank back among the robes. "Hain't you a preacher?" Was it to be a funeral or a hanging? The Rev. Richard Graham gravely answered, "Yes." "Wal, there's a feller back thar apiece wot wants to get spliced up and he seen you when you passed Wheatville's corner. He kinder lowed you'd be along this here way terday and sort o kept one eye on the road?"

Some inquiry developed that "Bill Jenkins and Lyde Terry" wanted to get married quick as the preacher could drive to the girl's home, which was three miles back over the same heavy road they had come, and three miles to the left over a much worse one. Should they turn back now when they were almost in sight of the ranch? The preacher cast longing glances toward the homeward path, but consented to go back, for who could disappoint two fond hearts aching to beat as one—certainly not a dear, old bachelor preacher.

The stranger led the way back to the turning, and, after pointing out the road, galloped on ahead—no doubt to prepare for his duties as best man.

Though the road was rough, the horse tired, and hands and feet growing cold again, the prospect of a country wedding was enough to keep their spirits from drooping. The warmth, the cheer, even thoughts of a wedding supper, were not discouraging to two tired and hungry travelers.

"Aren't we foolish, Uncle, to be so near home and yet turn back for these strangers?"

"Yes, perhaps we are, but think of their disappointment. Besides, you'll like it. Don't you remember how entertained you were at the last rustic wedding we went to?"

"Guess I do. When I wished the bride a life time of happiness she giggled and said, 'Ah, now you just quit teasing me,' and the groom gravely answered my congratulations with, 'You the same, lady.' But do you remember what you received as your fee?"

He drew his shaggy brows down in an effort at recollection. "Let me see, I believe it was a dollar. Oh, no, that was that runaway couple. This fee consisted of a box of raisins, a sack of potatoes and a promise of all the watermelons I want next season. But the fee for tonight's service shall be yours, Marcella."

"Oh, thanks, Uncle Dick. At any rate, it will not be potatoes or raisins, as they raise nothing except wheat around here. How much do you suppose it will be? You ought to charge mileage and extra for short notice, like laundry bundles, you know. But I suppose you would consider that unprofessional. Do please tell me the average fee."

The brows were once more performing a dance of delight. "Think about $2 a fair average."

"Now, Uncle Dickey, that is too bad. You often get five, don't you?"

"Well, once in a while, honey."

"That is better." To herself she said, "I'll get that new party dress, after all, and I know I can coax papa to let me go back in time for Mamie's party. Won't it be lovely? And I'll write Leonard to get here by all means. I do want to look nice. I am so tired of that old cream colored nunsveiling. I'll get pale blue. Let me see, 8 yards of albatross at 50 cents would be four dollars, and I can get a pattern and some cream lace applique with the other dollar. I want a touch of black, too. Oh, yes, I have some black velvet ribbon that will do. Oh, dear, I wish I could have silk mull. All the other girls have albatross or something like that."

"Are your hands warm? So glad."

"Oh, Uncle Dickey, do you ever get as much as ten dollars?"

"On very rare occasions, little girl."

"Well, the old, mean, stingy things. I shan't marry anybody who wouldn't give the officiating clergyman a nice big check. Well, ten yards of silk mull at 75 cents would be seven dollars and a half—one good thing, silk doesn't require much trimming—then I could get new slippers or—oh, dear, I do need so many things. And I just must go to that party—course I can if I beg dear old dad. Oh, Uncle, didn't you tell me once about getting $20 from a young farmer?"

"Now, Marcella, you are building air castles. But no doubt this hasty gentleman will be very liberal. So near Christmas, too."

"Yes, turn to the left over that narrow bridge. Did you ever see mud roll up so? Poor Ben is about dead, and if we have much further to go—but that must be the place, Uncle Dick."

"Your eyes are better than mine, child. Isn't that our horse and rider with that group of men under the tree a hundred yards or so from the house?"

"Yes, you are right. The horse and buggy undoubtedly belongs to the prospective groom, who is ready to make off with the bride as soon as you have your say. Guess I will get my new dress all right. Don't you think pale blue becoming to me?"

"You have had quite enough assurance on that point, young lady, and from more critical judges than a doting old uncle."

"Good evening, gentlemen," to two of the group who came forward to meet them.

One of the men rather awkwardly said, "Will the lady step over to the house?" The girl found herself knocking at the door while her uncle was drawn to one side for private consultation. A spirit of puzzled uncertainty seemed to hover over the people in the yard. And when only a tiny bit of a girl appeared at the door and hesitatingly asked Marcella to come in, the mystery deepened. The room they entered had an unpainted floor with a few home-made rugs, a bed with patch-work quilt and elaborate crocheted lace on the pillow slips. A few chairs and a geranium struggling to blossom at the window sill gave a homelike look to the plain room, but certainly it had no appearance of coming festivities. To add to Marcella's sense of discomfort, she heard from an adjoining room a sound of suppressed sobbing accompanied by a monotonous voice speaking in an undertone.

The little girl silently led the way to the kitchen back of the front room. Here was a girl about Marcella's own age, apparently engaged in preparing the evening meal. A few commonplace remarks about the weather and condition of the roads were exchanged, during which Marcella grew more and more embarrassed. As no mention was made of the wedding, she hardly knew whether to apologize for her intrusion or speak plainly about the purpose of their visit.

Her companion was busily occupied in beating up some sort of batter in a tin pan and finally explained, "I just thought I'd stir up the wedding cake while we was waiting for Jim, that's my brother, to come home from the ditch meeting."

Marcella made a mental comparison of this dilatoriness in making the wedding cake to the elaborate preparation of that all-important adjunct to the nuptial feast to which she was accustomed. However, it seemed to put the marriage and the new blue party dress on a little surer basis.

"May I ask what hour had been set for the ceremony?"

"Ma's in there arguing and a jawing with Lyde about that now."

"Oh, does your sister desire to postpone her wedding?"

"Ma's in there arguing and a-jawing with You see, Lyde and Bill, they been keeping company for nearly a year, but mostly on the sly because ma and pa just hate Bill like poison, and wouldn't let him come here. Since pa died last fall, ma has been so cut up that she hasn't said much to Lyde, and so when they was at Millar's dance last week they made it up to get married some time soon. Bill, he saw your pa—oh, your uncle—pass Wheatville's corner today and, thinks he, 'this is just the time,' and so he sends after you and comes himself to tell Lyde that she's going to be married today."

Marcella fairly gasped. "And tells her she is going to be married today! You mean that the day had not even been set—that she was not expecting—that she—well, of all extraordinary things!"

"Yes, that's just what ma says. She tells Lyde it is no way to treat a girl—giving her no time to make a wedding dress or invite her folks."

"Well, I should think not. But what does your sister say to that? I should think she would consider such an act—well, rather masterful."

"Oh, Bill is all right. It's just his way. He means good enough. Besides, Lyde says she don't care nothing much about a new dress or a big pow-wow."

"Poor thing."

"Then ma says, 'Jim ain't home.' So Lyde sends for Jim 'cause she knows Jim will do like she wants. And now ma is trying to persuade Lyde she's too sick to get married today. Humph! but she ain't sick. She is a whole lot worse afraid Bill will be awful mad at her if she refuses. She does love Bill so much, and ma won't even let her see him today."

By this time the wedding cake was pretty well baked and Marcella detected an odor of chicken and other good things simmering on the stove. It was evident that the sister was doing the best she could, and that she, as well as the brother, sympathized with poor Lyde. After the cake was deftly iced, the long table occupying one side of the large farm kitchen was spread and set. The muffled talk still went on in the other room, but now the sobs were growing fainter, from exhaustion probably.

At last Jim came and the mother drew him into the council room. After a time he joined the group outside and a settlement was finally reached.

Mrs. Terry entered the kitchen and announced the decision. A compromise had been effected. Her daughter had decided because of illness to postpone her wedding for a time, the mother agreeing to withdraw her opposition and provide her daughter with a proper trousseau.

"No wedding," exclaimed Marcella, and with difficulty refrained from giving greater expression to her disgust and disappointment.

The crowd outside gradually melted away, leaving only the minister and Jim. Lyde was too much overcome to appear, but the other members rallied their forces and insisted, with true country hospitality, on the preacher and his niece staying the night. They consented to accept supper for themselves and horse and Jim as a guide to show them a short cut back to their road home.

When Jim finally left them and was out of hearing, Mr. Graham gave vent to his feelings by roar after roar of laughter. When he could speak he said, "Next time I will ask to see the license, the groom, the bride, the bride's mother, the bride's brother and all the bride's folks."

Poor Marcella let fall a few tears of disappointment as the vision of the new party dress faded away, but in time she, too, saw the humorous side of the situation and could join her uncle's laughter. "And you don't catch me again counting any chickens before they are hatched. Humph! New dresses and air castles! Anyway, I have eaten worse wedding cake. But, dear Uncle Dickey, won't you please coax papa to let me go back to town in time for Mamie Glenmore's party on the 22d? After all, my old cream nunsveiling doesn't look so bad."

CARUSO'S STAGE FRIGHT

Caruso confesses to a growing case of stage fright. "I often have it," he says, "and it spoils my existence and makes me sometimes long for the hour of my retirement from the stage."

"When I made my debut I was full of confidence. I was unknown. I sang like a bird without either care or emotion, and, had I committed faults, the public would have been indulgent, because of my youth; but the more my reputation has become established, the more my talents have been vaunted and the spectators have become prepossessed to favor, so much the more exacting they become. To-day, when I am struggling with a weight of renown which cannot grow any greater and which the slightest vocal accident may compromise—for the human voice, of course, has its failings—I have my anxieties, my troubles, climate, temperature, fatigue influence me. The public, who desire the perfect artist of their dreams, don't think of these things at all."

The first historical appearance of the swastika, or armed cross, fourteenth century B. C., is apparently on a small leaden figure three and a half inches long found by Dr. Schliemann in the second city of the ruins of Troy, together with many crosses of gold, silver, etc., the location of the symbol on the figure having generative significance.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded)

name, alias, or nomenclatural alibi. Joseph H. Scott is the same old J. Harry. And he won't near do.

A Joke on the Curry Forces It is all very well to call reformers "long hairs," but the Independent Republicans of the Thirty-ninth District, San Francisco, rather took the edge off the joke last Tuesday night. The Thirty-ninth is a redhot reform district, and the Independent Republican Club is ten years old and ten hundred votes strong. So when the Curry forces tried to invade the district and get a Republican club endorsement for Curry and for Edgar S. Levy, a Curry man and candidate for the senate, they ran into trouble. The Currys issued postcard invitations to "all Republicans" to meet Tuesday evening at 619 Sixth avenue, and they paid in advance for the hall. The meeting proved to be quite large. But when the Curry men nominated John R. Jones for chairman, W. S. Scott, a Johnson man, was also nominated, and—elected. Before the dazed Curry men knew what had happened the Johnson men had elected J. P. Sessions secretary and D. F. Hutchings treasurer, the Johnson chairman had announced that he would name a committee of 41 to organize the district for Hiram Johnson, and the Curry men found themselves sadly looking at a receipted rent bill and pondering on the peculiar things that occur in politics.

Chandler Will Probably Run It now seems certain that W. F. Chandler will run for the assembly from the sixtieth district, which comprises the county of Fresno exclusive of the city of Fresno. This is cheering news. Mr. Chandler is exactly the sort of man California needs in the legislature. He is a success in business, who has retained the honesty and convictions of youth. He has been tried in public life and made good most emphatically. And he is alive to the issues of the hour and is on the honest and progressive side of them. He ought to win. And he probably will win.

PERSONALIA

Miss Jane Addams is the first woman elected an honorary member of the Chicago Association of Commerce.

Kyrle Bellew has sailed from New York for India, where he will spend his vacation. He was born there and spent his early days in Calcutta.

Madame Curie, the co-discoverer with her husband of radium, has been elected a member of the American Philosophical Society. She was the only woman on the list of fifteen members elected.

The business men's league of New Orleans has given Miss Kate M. Gordon a gold medal in recognition of her services to the city as president of the women's drainage and sewerage league. It was largely through the efforts of Miss Gordon that the women of New Orleans got tax suffrage.

Helen L. Sumner's book on "Equal Suffrage in Colorado" is having a wide circulation. The accuracy and fullness of its information makes the volume valuable. It is an impartial report of the effects of equal suffrage in that state. There is not a line of argument in the book. The author has simply followed facts.

Alfred Noyes, who has been hailed as the author of the greatest modern English epic, has now turned to the drama and has written a play which Sir Herbert Tree is to produce in London. It is in verse and has a "fantastic" subject, but is said to be on very modern lines.

Miss Mary McKay of Concordia, Kan., is a candidate for treasurer of Cloud county. She is a graduate of the Concordia High School and the Nazareth Academy. She has served for eight years as deputy in the offices of the county clerk and treasurer. There are four women in Kansas now holding the office of county treasurer.

Miss Lucy M. Salmon, professor of history at Vassar College, has just been chosen by the Chamber of Commerce of Poughkeepsie to head the committee to clean up the town. Miss Salmon is said to intend to make an energetic campaign against untidy backyards, unsightly vacant lots and other blots on community cleanliness.

The newest musical wonder-child is a composer, Erich Korngold, son of a Vienna music critic, who is upsetting to theories of hereditary talent. At 13 he has written a sonata, a pantomime and a suite which Richard Strauss praises. Prof. Kretschmar, director of the Royal high school of music at Berlin, says that he knows of no analogous case except that of Handel.

It is said of Henry Wallace, editor of Wallace's Farmer, a western publication, that when his name was once mentioned for United States secretary of agriculture, he remarked that his family for 250 years had been farmers; that none of them had ever held offices higher than justice of the peace; and that he could never think of breaking so honorable a record.

Miss Sadie American, president of the New York Council of Jewish Women, was one of the speakers at the Jewish international conference which was recently held in London. She explained the work of the Jewish Council in protecting and assisting Jewish girls in this country. Last year over 6,000 girls between the ages of 12 and 15 were visited, 3,200 of them received assistance and work was found for 500.

Elizabeth Hirsch has been elected vice-president of the City Council of Liegnitz, Germany. She is the first woman to occupy that office and was chosen because of her ability as a business woman. Several years ago her husband died and she inherited his large manufacturing business. She assumed the charge of the business, stepping at once into her husband's place. Under her management the business has prospered.

Mrs. Mary Emery of Cincinnati is building a park solely for birds on a two acre tract of land adjoining Evanswood place. The ground has been placed in charge of the department of biology of the University of Cincinnati. The park is to be known as the Mary Emery Bird Preserve, and it is estimated that it will cost fully a quarter of a million dollars before Mrs. Emery gets it arranged to suit her.

Dr. Marian Parris presided at the congress of women interested in agriculture which was recently held at Bryn Mawr College. Women with practical experience spoke on their experiments in general farming, fruit growing, landscape gardening, bee keeping, poultry raising, dairy farming, truck gardening and horticulture. The general opinion seemed to be that women could ordinarily carry on successfully any of these branches with a profit of from 10 to 20 per cent.

Carmen Sylva, Queen of Rumania, is said to be one of the best business women in Europe. It was her idea to use the Rumanian talent for embroidery as a commercial asset for her country. She opened workrooms where the peasants could obtain materials for their embroidery and sell it at a fair price. The surplus work was sent abroad and the profits divided among the workers. In this way hundreds of peasants have been able to free their land from debt, to rebuild their cottages and educate their children.

Josephine Lowe of Washington has given to the botanical department of the university of Pennsylvania 360 specimens of moss. These specimens will be made the nucleus of a large collection of mosses representative of every section of this country and of many other countries of the world. In it were rare specimens from Canada, Ireland, England and Japan. The work of increasing the number of moss specimens will be delegated to members of the society and men connected with the university botanical department.

Richard Mansfield in "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" won great applause in London, but his season there was not pecuniarily profitable. He complained to Sir Henry Irving of the strain involved in the acting of the difficult parts of Jekyll and Hyde. William Winter, in his life of Mansfield, says: "Irving, at most times prone to more or less playful satire, listened observantly, and then in his bland, piquant way replied: 'Ah—yes—interesting—very; but, Mansfield, my boy, if—if it isn't wholesome I wouldn't do it.'"

Miss Elout van Soeterwoude and Miss J. Quarles van Ufford of The Hague, Holland, arrived in New York the other day on a trip for the purpose of inspecting the hospitals of this country. Miss van Soeterwoude is the directress and Miss van Ufford the secretary of Deaconess House, a hospital and home at The Hague, of which the Queen Dowager is the patroness. Additions are to be made to this hospital and the two women have been sent here to inspect American institutions of a similar nature, especially those in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore.

Pauline Viardot-Garcia, who died lately in Paris, was a very great singer and teacher, and belonged to a famous family. Malibran was her sister, and their father was the celebrated teacher, Manuel Garcia, who died a few years ago at the age of 100. Pauline Garcia was a great friend of Liszt, of Tourgenieff and of Heine, who unkindly likened her large mouth to that of a hippopotamus and said that when she sang he felt like tossing her lumps of sugar. His admiration for her genius no doubt made up for his rudeness.

Fraulein Brustlein, daughter of a federal judge, is the first woman to practice law in Switzerland. She recently won a remarkable case in Zurich. A woman railway gatekeeper was accused of criminal negligence. She had closed the gate too late, and in consequence an express train had killed a small child that had wandered on the track. Fraulein Brustlein pointed out that her client received only $10 a month, twelve hours work a day, from the railroad for her services, and was forced to take outside work to support her four children. She also proved that on the day of the accident the express was on time for the first time in several months. The jury acquitted the woman gatekeeper.

SHEAR WIT

Little Willie: "Say, pa, what is worldly wisdom?" Pa: "Worldly wisdom, my son, is a perfect knowledge of the failings of our neighbors."—Chicago News.

"Here," said the disgruntled actor; "I don't want this part. If I play it, I'll have to die in the first act." "Well," replied the manager, "what are you kicking about? You die a natural death, don't you? If you came on in the second act the odds are the audience would lynch you!"—Puck.

The editor of Punch, when told that the paper was not so funny as it used to be, sorrowfully replied, "It never was!"

The maid was in the garden hanging out the off her nose. "I'll have an employer's liability act on you," she told the queen. Thus we see the beginning of the movement.—New York Sun.

"What I want," said the theatrical manager, "is a genuine noycty." "Something realistic?" asked the playwright. "Yes; but I don't want any real pugilists, or real naval disasters, or real livestock, or real battles in it." The playwright looked wearily thoughtful, and, after a pause, inquired: "How would it do to spring something on the public with real actors in it?"—Life.

Edward Fitzgerald, the translator of the Persian poet, Omar Khayyam, was a more or less genial opponent of matrimony as a state. One day he said to his friend, Miss Ellen Churchyard of Woodbridge: "Do you know, Nell, what marriage is?" Miss Churchyard thought not. "Then I'll tell you," said he. "Marriage is standing at one's desk, nicely settled to work, when a great big bonnet pushes in at the door and asks you to go for a walk with it."—Cleveland Leader.

Various large tracts of land in the vicinity of Sacramento are being subdivided and sold in five or ten acre lots.

Lodi farmers are reported to be offering as high as two dollars a day and "found" for men to work in the hay fields.

The San Bernardino Sun issued a 46-page "centennial edition" which left no feature of the southern city's centennial celebration unnoticed.

Work has been begun on the electric line that is to connect Sacramento and Elmhurst.

Six of the first carloads of cherries shipped East from Central California sold at auction for $28,000.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

FOR SALE—Complete set, from first year, of 108 volumes Harper's Magazine, bound in cloth and morocco; excellent condition. Address Dr. L. C. Marshall, Vacaville, Cal.

Ross Valley Real Estate

$90—Lots for a few days. So many people were delighted with the unique grandeur of Los Lomas Terrace at last Sunday's auction that I have determined to make a few more sacrifices in my educational campaign.

Many hundreds of visiting people were amazed to find such natural forests of redwood, madrone, etc., so close to San Francisco, and only 4 minutes from trains. It was hard for them to realize there was such a rustic spot so near.

$1000—4-room furnished cottage. Terms like rent.

$175—Lots, 5 minutes from station, Stadium and Speedway, in the heart of Kentfield, on established street, sewer, water, all conveniences of city, gas will be in soon. Street lights, without the usual towering municipal bond issue and high taxes.

$1100—4-room furnished cottages, same location.

These properties were taken in a deal at a great bargain and must be sold.

Terms 20 per cent cash, balance 36 monthly payments.

J. L. LEWIS, Kentfield

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of HELEN S. TRIPP, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON,
Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910.
W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

Estate of GEORGE E. WOODBURY, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administrator with the will annexed of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within ten months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of Oliver Ellsworth, Room 824, Mills Building, corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco, Cal., which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.

A. M. HAINES,
Administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of George E. Woodbury, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, May 2nd, 1910.
OLIVER ELLSWORTH, Attorney for Administrator,
Mills Building, San Francisco.

5-6-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of IRENE A. CONNER, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700 Claus Spreckels Building, southwest corner of Market and Third Streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON,
Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910.
W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate.

6-3-5t

NOTICE TO STOCKHOLDERS OF GIGANTE MINING COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in accordance with a resolution of the Board of Directors of Gigante Mining Company, duly adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, held on the 31st day of March, 1910, a special meeting of the stockholders of Gigante Mining Company will be held on the 14th day of June, 1910, at the hour of two o'clock P. M. of that day, at Room 269 in the Russ Building, on the west line of Montgomery street between Pine and Bush streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the principal place of business, and the office of said corporation, and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet. That the object and purpose of said Stockholders' Meeting is to take into consideration and then and there act upon a proposition to increase the capital stock of said Gigante Mining Company by the amount of $25,000.00, that is to say, from $100,000.00, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each, its present capital stock, to $125,000.00, divided into 125,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each.

Dated at San Francisco, California, the 31st day of March, 1910.

AUG. WATERMAN,
Secretary of Gigante Mining Company.

4-8-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Needed Amendments to Primary Law

The Direct Primary Law as it stands is a better law than many suppose, but it needs amendment and probably will need amendment ten years hence. In a few points it is purposefully wrong, made so with aforethought, but in more cases its lapses are to be accounted for because the problem of voting is to an extent unsolved. Civilization has not found out how to take the consensus of public opinion speedily, accurately and cheaply. It may be generations before it does. Here are some amendments which suggest themselves.

1. This law should not apply to the judiciary which should be non-partisanly nominated and, therefore, by petition only.

2. The advisory vote for United States Senators should be state wide, and that it was not made so in the law as first enacted was the result of deliberate intent to hamper, if not annul, the attempt to express a free, popular choice.

3. The law should not apply to municipal elections, or to other than general elections where party politics may properly enter into the determination of issues. In city elections nominations should be by petition.

4. All restrictions upon candidates as to how they may have voted at previous elections should be stricken out. The people are their own best judges as to whom they want to nominate for office. If Democrats want to nominate a Republican, or Republicans a Democrat, that is their business and none of the business of the legislators. The liberty of popular choice, and of candidacy, should be as broad as the field of political interest and any attempt to curb that freedom in the interests of party is at once artificial and an invasion of the Rights of Man, tyrannous and not to be endured.

5. So also the provision in the law that, "A candidate defeated at a primary election, held under the provisions of this act, shall be ineligible for nomination to the same office at the same election," is an unnecessary limitation upon popular choice. If a candidate bolt a convention, or a primary election, without proper justification, the voting constituency will make short work of him at the general election. If such candidate has, however, been the victim of fraud or mischance at the primary he and the people should have the right to vindicate him at the polls in November.

6. The names of candidates should not appear on the ballot alphabetically as the law provides, thus giving an unfair advantage to candidates whose names chance to begin with one of the earlier instead of later letters in the alphabet. All names should be so rotated that Zachariah's name will be first on the list on as many ballots as that of Abraham. Careless voters, and they are many, often fail to vote to the end of their tickets. Rotation of names places all candidates on an equal footing as to that element of mere chance.

7. It is just as necessary to mail sample primary ballots to voters as sample general election ballots and the law should be so amended as to provide for their being printed and mailed. Often the only real contest will be in the primary election.

8. Section 23 of the Direct Primary law should be so amended as to provide that if any candidate for any office receives a majority of all the votes cast for that office by all candidates of all parties having tickets in the field, he shall be declared elected to that office without being required to stand for election at the general election following. This would do more than anything else, short of compulsory voting, to bring out a full vote without which any election is a delusion and a snare. It may be objected that this would shut out of participation those who do not affiliate with any political party. Good enough for them! Inasmuch as affiliation with a political party, as the law stands, wisely provides for such affiliation only as to the next primary election each voter should affiliate with the political party, having a right to a separate ticket, that comes nearest to his way of thinking. This amendment would make every primary election as full of life as Resurrection Morning and forever prevent elections going by default, and in conformity with the wishes of the schemer, the boss and manipulator of the political machine.

9. The political platforms made and promulgated under the law as it stands will be null, void and of none effect, being made after, and not before, the candidates have been nominated. The only platforms worth the paper they are printed on are those made by the candidates and their sponsors prior to, or during, the primary campaign, and the law may properly be so amended as to give such platforms recognition and permit them to be mailed to voters with the sample ballots. Anyhow, the existing provision should be stricken out.

10. The provision of the law whereby delegates to county conventions, called to elect delegates to a state convention, called, in turn, to elect delegates to a national convention whose province it will be to nominate candidates for president and vice-president, are to be elected twenty-one months before such state convention is to be held is preposterous. It should not be tolerated longer than until the first week of the next session of the legislature. That state convention should be constituted of delegates elected to it by a primary election called for that purpose with the law simplified, as to that primary, to meet the requirements of that primary. It can be done, and must be. Few voters can, on the 16th of August, 1910, know whom they will, in May, 1912, want for their party candidates for president and vice-president.

11. There is a little blunder in the last half of paragraph 4 of Section 5 of the law that needs straightening out. The candidate has until 30 days before the primary in which to file his nomination papers; the county clerk has 10 days more (up to within 20 days of the election) to forward such papers to the Secretary of State, while the Secretary of State must report back all nominations at least 25 days before election. That conflict of dates can be easily remedied.

12. In the writer's judgment superintendents of schools, as well as judicial officers, should be non-partisanly nominated, that is, by petition. We want neither politics nor religion in the administration of justice or of our public schools. Fitness for the task in hand should be the only test to be determined at the polls.

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE
Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.
1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary.....$50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary..... 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary..... 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week.. 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

☞ Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

This Week: "SOME TRENDS IN HIGHER EDUCATION"

—By Guido H. Marx

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: JUNE 10: '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH·GOOD COURAGE·GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 29.

Hedging Alden In

MR. ALDEN ANDERSON IS REPORTED to have said that, in going about the State, he has found no insurgency sentiment. Has not the idea suggested itself to Mr. Anderson that, within the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company and its many ramifications, is a poor place to look for sentiment of insurgency against corporation domination in affairs of government? The President also saw no indications of insurgency in California during his visit. Governor Gillett so hedged him about with the editor of the Argonaut that he couldn't.

In the Tall Timber

NEWSPAPER SLEUTHS HAVE DISCOVERED the lamentable Jim Gallagher in the tall timber of Vancouver, B. C., where he peacefully alternates between sunshine and shade as the temperature suggests, gorges himself with siestas and otherwise makes the most of the ample pension with which the San Francisco grafters must have provided him that he may make the way of Fickert easy and his burden light. When we get that parliament of the world extradition laws will be so framed that a material witness in a criminal case will not be able to put himself beyond the jurisdiction of a competent court without taking himself off the earth, but, until then, justice must continue to be made a fool of on behalf of any scoundrel able to pay the price.

A Chance to Be Funny

IF THE PRESIDENT ACCEPTS from the conference committee and Congress any railroad regulation measure less meritorious than the railroad regulation bill as it passed the Senate, and afterwards undertakes to defend it as a substantial redemption of party and administration pledges on the subject, he will constitute himself the most boisterous joke of the new century. Here is a chance to be funny that it is to be hoped the President will miss. Another Winona incident would ruin his administration beyond redemption.

A Lucid Interval

IT IS PROPER THAT AMERICA should have one day in the year dedicated to safety and sanity, and it may not be improper that the Fourth of July should be that day, but, somehow or other, the editor-in-chief of this paper cannot repress a sense of joy in the fact that providence permitted him to live through his boyhood while the right to burn his fingers with firecrackers and to singe his eyebrows with Roman candles was not infringed. For boys to see grown up men discharge fireworks will prove about as satisfying as for girls to see nicely dressed ladies eat ice cream through plate-glass windows, spectacles unlikely to be forgotten but unattended by patriotic emotions. Is it not conceivable that there might be an independence day celebration reasonably safe without being too sane?

Homeward Bound

THEODORE ROOSEVELT SETS SAIL for home today. May the Kaiserin come prosperously to its desired haven! It was better that he went to Africa. Had he remained at home he would have been charged with the short-comings of the Taft administration without being responsible for them, and the President would have been looked upon as a "me-too," when he is not. Now Theodore may be able to help pull his friend Will out of the muck which Aldrich and Elkins, Cannon and Dalzell, have mixed for him, set his feet on terra firma and so give him a chance to try again, but first there must be a house cleaning at the executive office building. We hope he'll lend a hand.

Worthier Reason Wanted

THE PROGRESSIVE ELEMENT in the order of Native Sons of the Golden West does well to stand for worthier reasons for existing as an order than that members chanced to be born in California. That was none of their business. But the maintenance of scholarships for the study of California history, the finding of childless homes for homeless children, the maintenance of a home for aged Californians, the preservation of old landmarks and the marking of the trails of the Argonauts,—these things are richly worth while and will give the order a better right to be than will serving the narrowed function of obtaining the election to office of native sons merely because their particular accidents happened here and not elsewhere.

To Study Graft in Europe

THOSE WHO HAVE FEARED that Rudolph Spreckels was "out of it" will be cheered to know that he has gone to Europe with the view of studying the graft situation there, as well as here, to the end that he may organize an anti-graft movement on national lines. No better cause ever engaged the attention of a loyal and honorable gentleman, such as Rudolph Spreckels unquestionably is, but if he would make his life count for national integrity in business, fidelity in office and truth in all things, he must learn to work with, as well as for, other men as single-minded, as resourceful and as wise as himself, and that lesson can as well be learned in San Francisco as anywhere else in the wide world.

Nice Man, Mr. Shand!

COMING OUT OF AN OAKLAND THEATER, where Maud Adams had just played, "What Every Woman Knows," a woman ejaculated, with an intensity of disgust in her voice, "A nice man, that Mr. Shand!" Evidently she would have liked to get her fingers into his hair for just one brief, blissful instant. But John Shand is not the only stupid, intensified, oblivious, self-made ass, magnified sufficient diameters to be rendered obvious, who has gone shouldering his way to fame, supposedly under his own steam and sail when, as a matter of fact, it was a delicate hand at the steering gear that kept him off the rocks. Let those who saw the play place this to his credit: He did, finally, come to himself. Most of his kind never do.

Returned With Thanks

SAN FRANCISCO PRESENTS COMPLIMENTS to New York and ventures to express the hope that the report that New York is about to resume residential relations with Mr. Patrick Calhoun is not ill founded. The climate of San Francisco has been distinctly less salubrious since Mr. Calhoun took up his residence here and, while the odor of the fumigation he has undergone at San Francisco's charge will attend him to his dying day wherever he may go, San Francisco will feel safer from further contamination if there be a continent between. New York is so thoroughly infected that one more of the same can hardly be looked upon as objectionable. Therefore your gift will be returned with thanks, Father Knickerbocker.

The President and the Railroads

The President appears to have handled the railroads rather well. We shall know with more certainty, however, after that abominable conference committee has made its report and congress has acted on it. It was their purpose to forestall the action of congress in railroad legislation by putting themselves beyond the reach of the new railroad-regulation law before it went into effect. That law, thanks to the determined opposition of the insurgents, will not, unless emasculated in conference, exempt the railroads from the operation of the Sherman anti-trust law, and that law carries imprisonment as a penalty, and no railroad president or traffic manager contemplates imprisonment with equanimity.

Perhaps the railroads ought to be permitted to increase their rates commensurately with the increased cost of operation, and perhaps they ought not. It should not be for them to decide. When the power of decision has been left in their hands they have abused the power. Their measure of rate making is the value of the service performed. That value is reached by ascertaining the cost of production at the initial point and the salable value at the point of destination, and taking the difference for the freight, or so much of it as will leave it an object for the shipper to ship. This has tended to enable the railroads to take to themselves the net results of doing business in this country, and they have come far too near it for the good of the country.

Government and the Interstate Commerce Commission appear to be working out a doctrine of reasonable rates for freights and fares that shall return the railroads a reasonable income on a reasonable valuation of their investment. This should not be difficult. If we accept long term bonds or the rate of interest paid on savings bank deposits as a basis for an interest rate where risk is reduced to the minimum, and add a percentage for each element of risk, it should not be difficult to fix upon a rate of income for transportation companies that would be reasonable and which should hold the stocks of those companies at or near par value. Any going of the stocks much above par should be notice to the rate-fixing power that rates are too high, that wages are too low, or betterments too few on that line.

This problem can be worked out with justice to the railroads, justice to shippers, justice to consumers and justice to those sections of the country that require additional railroad facilities, provided that the powers of government are retained in the hands of the American people and are not permitted to be usurped by the railroad interests, but if the railroads are to choose our Presidents, our United States Senators and our members of the House of Representatives; if they are to name the Interstate Commerce Commission and the judges that sit on the bench of the Federal Commerce Court; if we are to have railroad control of government instead of government control of railroads, then all this effort looking to government control of railroads will come to naught.

That issue is before the people of California now. On the side of government control of railroads is Hiram Johnson and the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. On the side of railroad control of government is Mr. Alden Anderson and the "Regular" or "organization" Republican machine, with an alternative ally, in the event of the probable defeat of Anderson, in the person of Charles F. Curry, candidate of the Royal Arch and such of the associated villainies as may be thrown from Curry to Anderson, or Anderson to Curry, as the exigencies of the campaign may require. The issue is so plain that no man need err regarding it.

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

The Ideal Laborer

Thanks to the injurious promulgations of one of the "organization's" serviceable officials, the public has been given official notice of what a certain agricultural constituency in California regards as ideal labor for their purposes. What they desire is a notch lower than slave labor in that it is required to take itself off when not needed and to bury itself when dead. This raises the issue as to what the ideal laborer really is.

The ideal farm hand is he who works and strives in the hope of by and by becoming a renter and, through prudent management of a farm on shares, of becoming a farm owner, head of a family, citizen of the commonwealth, calling no man master and owing suzerainty to no lord.

The ideal kitchen maid is the one who hopes some day to have a kitchen of her own, a rented roof over her head for a while, then one to be paid for perhaps on the installment plan, then one in fee simple absolute, a snug haven from which she and those she loves can never be evicted by the sheriff.

The ideal mechanic is the one who hopes some day to be a joint owner with his fellow mechanics and others in the business of the firm or corporation for which he works, to the end that the firm's interests shall be his interests, its success his success, its capitalization in part his own capitalization, supplementing the earnings of his hands with the earnings of his head. No other kind of labor can make a nation great, and no kind that cannot make a nation great can lay claim to being ideal.

How to Head Off the Commuter

Laying aside whatever advantages may accrue to commuters from living across the bay from San Francisco in either direction, it cannot be disputed that their so living is a distinct disadvantage to San Francisco.

The crux of Mayor McCarthy's opposition to the Spring Valley proposal, which this dense, megalomaniacal, obdurate person gave as a reason for opposing the purchase, was that he did not wish San Francisco to go into the real estate business. That is a business that it should go into as liberally as possible, and Mayor McCarthy, and those whom he assumes to represent, should be the first to lead in such a movement.

Many German cities have bought largely of their environs with great advantage to themselves and their people and every growing city should buy as largely as its credit will allow, and never sell. What if the city of San Francisco, at its inception, had owned the peninsula and had give ninety-nine-year leases at a moderate ground rental for so much as each person desired to improve and no more? By now the income from this source would meet all the requirements of a municipal revenue and yet furnish homes for the people at so much less cost than under private ownership that the transbay communities would not have been able to compete except on a similar basis. San Francisco would then have been a city of homes, and not of tenements, apartments and family hotels.

But, be it always remembered, society must move toward, rather than from, correct principles of government. It does not lie within the foresight of Man to provide for the future far in advance, but the world is now old enough, and the histories of peoples have been writ large enough to furnish modern cities a sure guide to needs for a generation or two at least and probably for a century. The greatness of these needs is homes for the people.

It requires about $2,500 to buy a bit of earth big enough to make a home for a middle-class family anywhere within reach of the factories and workshops of San Francisco. That sum represents many years of scrimping on the part of a wage earner. Eliminate it and he will get his home built and paid for in half the number of years that will otherwise be required.

Now let the city buy of Spring Valley, with its water system, all the land it has. Let that be set apart for the water system which the system requires and all the rest for homes for the people. Sell none of it. Lease it for ninety-nine years to persons who will improve so much as they will build on and no more. Upon this collect taxes as upon other property similarly situated and such a rate of interest as will reimburse the city for its outlay in process of time, but never part with the fee.

This idea, carried out, would, in the long run, cost the city nothing but the use of its credit, enable thousands to obtain homes of their own who otherwise would not, bring in a comfortable revenue forever and people this peninsula to overflowing before there would be any overflowing. This is worth thinking over.

There is nothing else so demonstrably certain to eat up the substance of a great city as its ground rents. The ground rent roll of New York City approximates $200,000,000 a year and is divided among a few hundred persons, not one of whom created a square foot of Manhattan Island. It was the gift of God to those who had use for it, but the laws and customs of men stepped in between God and his providence for his people and suffered them to be mulcted forever in the interests of a few.

It was God Almighty who made the Golden Gate, San Francisco Bay, the great interior valleys, the peninsula upon which San Francisco has pitched its tent. Ground rent is the tax which everyone not an owner of his home or office or store must pay for the right to live, and that tax should be paid, not to any individual whose grandfather chanced to buy a bit of land, but to the community as a whole which, as a whole, has made ground rent possible. The city should be the ultimate owner of every foot of land within the city and the use of that land should pay enough to meet all the needs of the city. No man should charge or be charged for such use except by the city for the city.

Society did not lay its plans that way, but it must work toward those plans or take the consequences. What those consequences are the life of every people under the sun lays open to our view if we will but look. The result is written in terms of aristocracy and poverty, idleness and sweatshops, a vicious plutocracy of landlords and a criminal proletariat of hate-infected misery.

Mayor McCarthy should have thought again before opposing the purchase of the Spring Valley lands.

Taft on Socialism

It is well for the country that the President is not blind to the menace of Socialism, and it is encouraging to know that he perceives the source of it to be that exaggerated individualism that has turned over to the exploiting few the heritage of the many. As the best remedy for the faults of democracy is more democracy, so the best antidote to Socialism is more of Socialism; that is, a larger devotion of the common heritage to the common good. The gist of Socialism is that "all the means of production and all the means of distribution shall be owned and operated by government," whereas very few of the means of production and very few of the means of distribution should be so owned and so operated. They can be better owned and better operated by private enterprise, but there are things that should be owned, if not operated, by government, and so owned and so operated that the multitude shall not be forced to pay taxes to anyone but government for the right to live. The things that God made should belong to government as representative of our common humanity. The things that man makes should belong to the man that makes them until he disposes of them to some one else in free competition in a free market. But the preachments of the President against the aggressions of Socialism will count for little so long as he surrounds himself with, and takes counsel of, those exaggerated individualists whose depredations against the public welfare have caused all of Socialism we have in this country. The Aldriches and Hales, the Cannons and Paynes, and more especially the interests whose servants they are, are the fathers of American Socialism, fathers of all the Socialism we have or are likely to have. Let the President look well to his political advisers. A more objectionable assortment no President ever had.

Knute Nelson on Conservation

Senator Knute Nelson of Minnesota is an honest man. Men of liberal minds have been fearful of his influence on the Ballinger investigating commission, and with reason, but not because of any want of integrity of character, rather because of an unfortunate bent of mind. He believes, with Aldrich and his group, that the only hope for the poor man lies in the activities of the rich, and that the rich will be active only when and where they see a chance to make much money.

There is truth in this view, but not all of truth is in it. The world of industry is dependent upon the man with initiative, and the man with initiative must see large prizes in sight to spur him on. If he be spurred on he will, in making room for himself, make room for many others. This is true. Knute Nelson is right.

But must the prize be ever and always The Cinch? Will the man with initiative put forth no effort unless he can find an opportunity to rob the multitude rather than to serve it? It may be so as long as The Cinch, and its greater gains, are within reach, but there have been men of great initiative who have been content to live and let live.

Once the anthracite coal beds of Pennsylvania were common property. They belonged to all the people. There were many coal operators and they brought the people's coal from where it lay buried to where it was wanted and sold it at $2.50 to $3 per ton. All was well. Then the railroads obtained control of the coal fields by cinching operator after operator out of a chance to operate his mine at a profit, ransacked eastern and southern Europe for cheap help to displace the help of self-respecting Americans, and proceeded to double the price of coal to consumers. It is this sort of application of The Cinch to the fencing in of the necessities of life that moved Gifford Pinchot, Glavis, Secretary Garfield and others to suggest that the United States government retain the ownership in fee of the Alaska coal fields, but permit their being freely mined, coal transported and sold to the people on terms fair to the people and for preventing The Cinch.

It is not proposed to keep these coals in cold storage or Alaska in a straight jacket, but if the Guggenheims and the Morgans get their clutches on these coal deposits they will straight-jacket Alaska and the whole Pacific Coast in the twinkling of an eye.

It is a reproach to Knute Nelson that he does not perceive this and array his fine talents against that form of aggression instead of on the side of it. He is old enough to know better. His bent of mind may prove a national calamity, for his influence is great.

Charter Amendments

The San Francisco Charter Convention is doing good work. Its progress reports are full of encouragement. There is small use for national parties in municipal affairs, but there may be great use for voluntary associations, local in their scope, taking part in city elections. Therefore there should be places on municipal tickets for party designations of whatever kind.

There is some danger, too, that simplification of nomination may result in complication in the election. If ten or twenty persons may nominate for office the ballot may come to be as long as the charter itself. No man should become a candidate who cannot command at least a hundred sponsors.

The People should be free to make all the use that The People wish to make of the initiative, the referendum and the recall, but it should not be within the power of a handful of cranks to keep the machinery of election going all the time or the community stirred up without respite. The Charter Convention has dared much in that direction.

Majority rule is good, very much better than rule by a small plurality, but what about proportional representation? Has the Charter Convention looked into that?

The division of the supervisors into commissions, instead of duplicating by appointment of the Mayor from outside the board, promises well, provided that the Mayor constitute these commissions after the election and that the supervisors be not elected especially to fill particular places on such commissions. The minute that function enters into the question a premium will be put upon the election of certain men to certain commissions that they may be serviceable when they get there.

Democracy cannot be a success in the nation and a failure in the cities of the nation. The problem must be worked out in cities, but democracy does not consist in government by men of no reputation, or by that froth on the mug that is always in evidence but ever without substance. Nor can it consist of those incapacious enthusiasts who are ever in full cry after some panacea or other, and our Charter Convention must have a care how they put opportunity into the hands of such enthusiasts in the belief that they are giving The People a chance to be heard.

Finally, what about compulsory voting? True democracy cannot consist in the participation in government of every fourth man, while permitting the self-elimination of the other three. It would be more to the purpose, could it be done, to compel the participation of the negligent three and the elimination of the self-seeking fourth, who is usually a retainer of some anti-social interest bent on ravaging the many for the benefit of the few. The Charter Convention should grapple with compulsory voting. There is a chance for San Francisco to lead the municipal life of America. Let the non-voter be stricken from the great register if nothing more. He will have to be at some pains to get on again.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There are times when one could wish that humans had been as the angels, that babies had grown on trees or the moon had brought them, and that Man had been sexless. It would seem that, in that case, half the world's misery had remained unwritten. Man's inhumanity to woman all down the ages, the stupid unconcern of both of them for their progeny, the rapacities of lust and the awful retributions inflicted upon those who live the licentious life—and upon their children and their children's children and grandchildren, on to the extinction of the strain! The world holds nothing more awful. The half, almost, of that which is awful owes its existence to the fact of sex.

Per contra, the writer has in mind a cozy cottage he saw in the building and heard it whispered that it was to be for a young couple soon to marry and found a home. They had selected the lot together for its outlook, not especially for the arability of the soil or the lay of the land, and by and by the house was ready, there was a wedding and the young people entered into possession. The dead grass clung to the doorsill, nothing grew but weeds and every stroke of shovel, pick or hoe into the ground tended to set the teeth on edge by reason of coming in contact with a rock, something like sawing on a nail.

But what fun have they not had digging out those rocks, fetching in good dirt, leveling and terracing, watering and tilling, haunting the woody places for leaf mold, planting and transplanting, watching for the buds and their opening into blossoms, training up vines where they would have them grow, conferring over color schemes for the different little plots and corners into which their home fraction of an acre is divided, making a home!

By and by, perhaps, the female of the species will nestle close to the male and say: "There is a ship upon the sea that will bring to you and me a baby, maybe." What a changed life from that day forth while the mystery of homunculus is being worked out! There is not, and will never be, in all the world another so great a mystery as the coming into being of a human soul.

And after it comes, what a new opening out in life's interest! Men join lodges and with solemn ceremonial are initiated from degree to degree until, by and by, if they live long enough, and their money holds out, they reach the holy of holies, the final niche in the maze of their own making. How trivial it all must be compared with degree after degree taken in ordinary family life betwixt cradle and grave!

So by and by there will, let us hope, be sons and daughters in this home to be put through college and to see, in their turn, settled for life. What an experience when sire and son, mother and daughter, stand shoulder to shoulder!

The crop marketed, so to speak, then follow the evening of days, the fires burning low and the embers faintly glowing, but the twain more dependent upon each other than ever before, the delicious period of restfulness in the cool of the day with the day's work done. Then curtains drawn and lights out!

Booker Washington has given it as his judgment that, putting on the debit side of the ledger the atrocities of the slave and the injustice of slavery, the carnage of the war by which the slave was freed, the years of upward struggle and those other years that must follow before the black man may take his equal station with the white, and, on the other side of the ledger, merely the chance to be a man over-balances all the cost. It was worth it.

So, multiply the domestic experiences sketched above in barest outline and crudest form by the millions on millions of such homes and such lives the world has known and Sex stands justified notwithstanding its cost. It is better to be as Man than as the angels.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

How Our East Indian Imports Live

Now that State Labor Commissioner Mackenzie—California's political pick-up from the "organization's" San Jose Market—has made himself heard in behalf of the importation of Oriental labor, it becomes of interest to learn just how that Mackenzie-desirable class of immigrants exists when it is on its native heath. It opportunely chances that General Benjamin Le Fevre, formerly a Congressman from Ohio, has returned from a trip around the world, and has published his observations concerning how various alien peoples live. His Asiatic observations apply particularly to the Hindoos, but as they are a notable addition to our human imports in recent days, what he tells is apropos enough to our situation. The most permanent and regular work to be found in India, he ascertained, was in the jute mills of Calcutta, which employ 57,000 people. The unfortunate expert workers in these mills receive twelve cents a day, others from eight to ten cents, or from $38 down to $25 a year—this, of course, if neither sickness nor anything else prevents their working every day. This pay seeming scandalously small to the Occidental mind of the General, he set to work to learn how the workers lived, ascertaining that a family of five or six persons can and does live on five cents a day, practically the sole food being rice. This is about the cheapest of Asiatic labor, but in some degree it represents all of it. And of such are the human cattle of whom "Johnnie" Mackenzie would see American competition constructed! And he, by the grace of the machine, officially represents labor in this State! Verily, it is full time for the change which is impending.

What a German Claims for Germany

The figures given in this paragraph were prepared by Otto von Gottberg, a well-known German war correspondent, and, while presumably fairly authentic, they may be colored to suit the German point of view. If not, they are, to say the least, suggestive. Herr von Gottberg compares German gains in population and business during the period from 1900 to 1907 with those of England during the same period, with the following result: English gain in population 6,000,000, German 12,000,000; English in exports 62 per cent, German 116; English in imports 53, German 113; English in railway earnings 52, German 102; English iron production 26, German 174; English coal consumption 33, German 91; English savings deposits 100, German 151. Summing it up, Germany in the designated time doubled England in increase of population, and more than doubled it in increase of business. As has been said, these are German statistics, and may lead us astray, but it is difficult to suppose they are so entirely wrong that the comparative gain is not on the German side to some extent, at least.

Travel to Europe Increasing

Travel to Europe from this country is decidedly increasing, and during the present month it will exceed that in any June since 1907, the year of the panic. On the nine transatlantic steamship lines centering at New York City it is estimated that 17,535 first-cabin passengers will be carried to European ports, and these people will pay about $3,000,000 for their tickets alone. Add to this sum the fares paid by second-cabin and steerage passengers, and it is probable that the above figures would be fully doubled, or, say, $6,000,000 for fares in one month. Then, the travel during the first five months of this year was more than twice that estimated for the month of June, so that the sum total paid for fares alone would amount to $18,000,000 or $20,000,000, a sum which would feed several hungry people, were it diverted from the good time to which it is devoted in most cases. Steamship-travel experts estimate that the June crowd of ocean travelers will pay more than a quarter million dollars in tips while on the liners.

Saturday a Bad Day for British Rulers

Since the year 1700, and prior to the beginning of the reign of George V, Great Britain has had nine rulers, and it is a rather curious fact that all but four of the nine died on Saturday. The ones who died on other days were George I, William IV, Victoria and Edward VII, and of these George I missed dying on Saturday by only two hours, his passing taking place at 2 a. m. of a Sunday. William III died on Saturday, March 8, 1702; Queen Anne on Saturday, August 1, 1714; George II on Saturday, October 25, 1760; George III on Saturday, January 29, 1820; George IV on Saturday, June 26, 1830. The late Edward VII missed a Saturday death by barely fifteen minutes, passing away at a quarter before 12, Friday night, May 6. Five of nine, then, died on a Saturday, another escaped by two hours, and yet another by but a quarter of an hour. Britain's superstitious monarchs, if she have such, might look upon the last day of the week with dread.

Money in the Aviation Game

The pioneers of aviation may take chances on their lives as their machines mount higher and higher, but there certainly is some rich financial picking in the game. Witness the fact that the prizes already offered to the "bird-men" during this season will amount to almost, if not quite, a million dollars. Already Curtiss has received $50,000 and Paulhan as much more, while the prizes awarded at the Californian and French meetings amounted to nearly as much more. To this $200,000 add $250,000 in prizes offered in England for events to take place this season. Then, as prizes to be awarded at fourteen contests to be held in Europe and this country, $548,000 is offered. These sums amount to almost a million, and to them eventually will be added prizes for events as yet undesignated. As the number of successful aviators still is decidedly limited, it will be recognized that those who succeed are going to be well rewarded. Indeed, it will not be surprising if in the end they divide as much as $2,000,000 among themselves.

New York Law to Protect Boys

Whatever may be the faults of the New York legislature, or the scandals springing therefrom, it has done a good and righteous thing in enacting a recent law. The law forbids the employment of boys under 21 years of age in the telegraph messenger service between the hours of 10 p. m. and 5 a. m. The demand for the law came from those who were most acquainted with the details of night messenger service. It is a law which, for the welfare of our youth, should be adopted in all States, for there is no depth of depravity and vice to which the boys of the night service are not introduced, and unnamable debaucheries become familiar to their eyes. These facts have been often enough revealed by public or quasi-public investigations, but New York is among the first, if not the first, of States to act upon their evident suggestion.

A Place for Oliver Cromwell's Head

After all these centuries it comes almost as a shock to learn that Oliver Cromwell's head still is on earth, and that a movement now is on foot to secure a final resting place for it in Westminster Abbey. It appears, as the story is told with apparent veracity, that the embalmed head now is in the possession of Rev. Mr. Wilkinson, a clergyman of the Church of England, in whose family it has been for a long time, but whether kept in the parlor or among the preserves in the cellar the report does not say. At any rate, Mr. Wilkinson has the head, its record is well authenticated, and the ghastly relic is said to be recognizable by comparison with portraits, etc. Now, as has been said, an effort is being made to secure for it a final resting place among Britain's great dead in Westminster Abbey. The effort should culminate in success, for among these illustrious ones the doughty Oliver of right should take his place.

Railroad Building in 1909

During the year 1909 3,784 miles of railroads were built in the United States and 1,487 miles in Canada, a total of 5,271 miles. The States in which the largest number of miles were laid were Texas, Nevada, California and Washington, as follows: Texas, 666 miles; Nevada, 303; California, 247, and Washington, 162. More than one-fourth of the building in both the United States and Canada was done in these four States.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

IT'S OUR MOVE

TO OUR NEW STORE AT

42 and 44 CALIFORNIA ST

One half block off Market St.

Calendars, Pocket Diaries
Office Diaries for 1910

LE COUNT, CLARK & ORMOND

STATIONERS AND PRINTERS
San Francisco

"We Hold Thee Safe"

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

ROLLA V. WATT
MANAGER

N. W. Corner Pine and Sansome Streets
SAN FRANCISCO

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

THE LOVE KNOT

William Henry Rhodes

William H. Rhodes, a pioneer lawyer of San Francisco, was known to readers of a former generation as Caxton, the name under which he published various literary contributions, notably a series of scientific hoaxes which for a time deceived and excited credulous people. After his death a volume of his writings was published under the title Caxton's Book. This little poem is known to many who are not aware that it is by a California writer.

Upon my bosom lies

A knot of blue and gray;

You ask me why; tears fill my eyes

As low to you I say:

"I had two brothers once,

Warm-hearted, bold and gay;

They left my side—one wore the blue,

The other wore the gray.

"One rode with Stonewall and his men,

And joined his fate with Lee;

The other followed Sherman's march,

Triumphant to the sea.

"Both fought for what they deemed the right,

And died with sword in hand;

One sleeps amid Virginia's hills,

And one in Georgia's land.

"Why should one's dust be consecrate,

The other's spurned with scorn—

Both victims of a common fate,

Twins cradled, bred and born?

"Oh! tell me not—a patriot one,

A traitor vile the other;

John was my mother's favorite son,

But Eddie was my brother.

"The same sun shines above their graves;

My love unchanged must stay—

And so upon my bosom lies

Love's knot of blue and gray."

OF CHARACTERS IN NOVELS

The interest in a work of fiction lies in the drawing of characters rather than in the unfolding of the plot. The plot is necessary because the characters must do something to show how they react to the stimulus of events, but in fiction, as in real life, what we are essentially interested in is people, human beings, creatures of emotion, slaves or masters of passion, re-enacting the eternal and universal drama of existence.

And it is the strength of our great novelists that they depict the children of their imagination with uncommon vividness, and that the characters they choose to describe are interesting characters and the scenes in which they place them are interesting scenes. That seems an obvious enough statement, but, let us inquire, why is one character interesting and another not, why is one scene picturesque while another offers no spur to the imagination?

Our notion is that, aside from other considerations, the most interesting character is the character with the most clear-cut purpose in life, and the character who pursues that purpose with the most intensity. Given a man (or woman) who knows what he wants and who goes after it with all his soul, and that man makes things interesting for all about him. He stands out clearly from his surroundings; his personality is vivid because it is the same all the time, because it is readily defined to those who know him by defining his predominating impulse. Given two such men, and have their paths cross, and at once you have the first elements of a drama, which is conflict, the struggle for the supremacy of man over man. Given a dozen such men and women, and place them in the same scene, where all are acquainted with one another and where their paths cross at various times, and you have at once a miniature of real society and the characters of a novel.

Consider some of the characters in fiction from this point of view. Take Dickens' "Tale of Two Cities," for example. Charles Darnay has one fixed purpose, to repay to France in service the debt of his ancestors' tyranny. Stryver, the bulldog attorney, his purpose is to achieve success at the bar, and he pursues it with the ruthlessness of a dragon. Miss Pross, who lives to serve and protect her mistress, and who plays her part with the fire and fearlessness of a game cock. Madame Defarge, who lives for vengeance and steadily, and intensely follows it down the years and through labyrinths of intrigue and the horrors of the Revolution. The old Monseigneur, who lives for power and pleasure, and proudly pursues them to his death. Each person in this drama knows what he wants, and with all his soul strives to achieve it. Ah, but you say, how about Sidney Carton? We answer, did he not, more passionately than they all, long for two things, for a woman's love and for the approval of his own conscience? And does he not loom grander and more vivid in the picture because they were both unattainable? Did he not strive the harder just for that? And did these longings not lead him to the supreme test, and did he not meet it nobly at the end? Purpose and intensity, every character in the book reveals them.

Follow the same process in "Vanity Fair," with Becky Sharp, who sought conquest and pleasure, with the Marquis of Steyne, who sought evil, with all the other characters who crowd that sordid story. Or follow it in the most tremendous of all novels, "Les Misérables." See here how Javert stands out in sombre outline, with his grim determination to catch his man and vindicate the letter of the law; how Thénardier rises in evil shape, with his skulking but no less intense greed for gain; how Fantine makes a picture, with her devotion to her child; how Valjean eclipses them all with the melancholy grandeur of a soul determined to master itself and to conquer the untoward elements of fate.

And here we would suggest a weakness of the modern novel. Rarely do we find a character who stands out from the current commonplace. To speak out rudely, they are mostly uninteresting. Why? We think they are so mainly because they do not want anything in particular, or if they want something they seek it with lackadaisical interest. This is especially the vice of psychological novels. In them the characters are described mostly in those moments of irresolution when the mind is searching the soul to find what it should do. Sometimes this is dramatic, but in the psychological novel the only thing described is the process of making up one's mind and no description is given of what the soul does after it knows what it wants. The internal conflict is all very well, but the external conflict of man with man makes the story. And it illuminates character too.

OF BOOKS FOR BOYS

Adventure—that is the word that sets the nerves of boyhood tingling and fires youth's imagination. The instinct that impels all boys to play "robber and police" is the same instinct that calls insistently for stories of adventure. The mind of boyhood personifies all things; it broods upon conquests of which he is conqueror, upon daring enterprises of which he is the hero. The virtues of manhood glow in a boy's mind with vivid splendor, and he dreams of courage and self-sacrifice and loyalty and stirring action. The hymns he hears in church are more likely to form pictures of cavalry charges and the carnage of artillery than they are to suggest to him the motions and emotions of worship. A boy lives in a wonder-dream land, where he is a knight achieving noble deeds.

So the books boys choose are nearly always books of adventure. The story of Robin Hood holds a charm for them that time cannot wither nor custom stale. The knights of Arthur's Round Table imperishably feed the awakening fires of their spirit. And the Arabian Nights appeal perennially, and, most especially of these, the most adventurous, the tales of Sindbad the Sailor.

Of modern writers two have most keenly touched the heart of boyhood. Robert Louis Stevenson, himself a boy to his dying hour, wrote straight to the spirit of his fellows. Adventure loomed as gorgeously alluring to him as it does to other boys, and he wrote it from a full heart, in simple faith with his boyish nature. "Treasure Island!" Show any boy that title and he wants the book. "Treasure," ah, ha! Mystery is here; buried treasure, likely; pirates, perhaps; fighting, certainly. And "island," that ensures sailors and storms and loneliness and more daring possibilities. Give us the book. Once given us, how satisfying it is. All the golden promise of the title is fulfilled: pirates, fighting, treasure, mystery—all. Here is adventure, we are the hero, and bravely we breast the dangers of our part.

The other who reached to boyhood's heart was Mark Twain. The adventures of Tom Sawyer, the adventures of Huck Finn. Exactly! What boy of us that read them—what boy of us has not!—would not have given his most-prized possession to have gone camping on the island, to have floated with Huck on the raft, to have been lost in the cave with Tom? Perish the spineless Sunday-school Sidney who did not thrill to the adventure of it!

Of course, we cannot forget the Henty books, nor the Mayne Reid books, nor "Robinson Crusoe," nor "Swiss Family Robinson," nor Paul du Chaillu, nor "Darkest Africa," nor—well, you may finish the list as you please. But these and their kind are the books for the boys. Leave poetry to them that like it, sentimental novels to the girls, psychology to the esthetes, but for us boys, old and young alike, trot out the old, familiar, well-thumbed stories of adventure and leave us to the unclouded joys of wild romance.

Miss Janet Beecher has been engaged for the leading feminine role in David Belasco's production next season of "The Concert," an adaptation by Leo Dietrichstein.

VERSE THAT TOUCHED

A bit of New York Times verse, published last winter in the "southeast corner" of the editorial page, brought from the late Samuel L. Clemens a note to the writer in which he gave ample proof of his affection for the great mass of people who knew and loved their Mark Twain.

The verses, which touched him deeply, were as follows:

TO S. L. CLEMENS

(Mark Twain, on sailing for Bermuda, said that his cigar was his only pal.)

Your only pal. Since first you wrote

Your pals began to troop your way.

And Fate has never struck a note

Of sorrow, and the smiling way

Of fortune never opened wide

That we weren't by your side.

Your only pal! Why, Mark, you seem

To overlook ten million folks

Who weep when sorrows 'round you teem—

You can't discard us as old jokes!

Your chasms never opened wide

That we weren't by your side

Your only pal! Sam Clemens you!

When you say that, don't treat us right:

Your pals are millions and they're true

Until the coming of the Night.

Mark Twain, mark thrice before you chide

Old friends who have not died!

JOHN A. MOROSO.

His letter to the author of them was as follows:

Hamilton, Bermuda, Jan. 24, 1910.

Dear Mr. Moroso: Many kind, good words have been said for the healing of my heart since the Christmas brought disaster to me again, but you have gone deepest and touched me most. I want to thank you for that eloquent utterance. Sincerely yours,

S. L. CLEMENS

FRANKLIN K. LANE

A BIG MAN WITH A BIG HEART AND A BIG BRAIN

Franklin K. Lane, Interstate Commerce Commissioner, first drew breath in Prince Edward Island, July 15, 1865. He soon removed to a less rigorous atmosphere, however, for at three years of age he was toddling alone to public school in Oakland, California, thus pretty nearly equaling Horace Greeley's record of precocity. At about thirteen he graduated from the Oakland High School, the most youthful graduate that institution had ever turned out. The University declined to admit him on account of his tender years, and he got even by going to work in the office of the Oakland Times and later showing how little he needed the University, anyway, by taking three years' work in two and leaving without his degree. He treated the law college in the same off-hand way, studying for a year and a half and leaving to take the bar examination, which he passed without any trouble.

But the usual fate of the precocious child did not get in its deadly work on Frank Lane. Instead of growing up to be a thin-bodied, big-browed, spectacled library recluse, he grew up to be two hundred pounds of the most human and sociable person that ever happened. He made friends as fast as he could talk, and kept them through the vicissitudes of an active newspaper, legal and political career. It was not that he sought for friendship—he simply couldn't help it. He loved human fellowship, enjoyed meeting and talking to people, and people were irresistibly attracted to him for these most human qualities.

In college, Lane reported Berkeley news for the San Francisco papers. Later, when he started to practice law in San Francisco and found it slow work, he accepted an offer to become Eastern representative of the Chronicle, and spent some time in New York, sending back special news items and editorial notes that would otherwise have got lost in the routine press dispatches.

In 1891, Lane went to Tacoma, Washington. Tacoma was then very much on the boom, and he bought a half interest in a daily paper, the Tacoma News, and went light-heartedly to the task of making a fortune. It looked as if he might do it until the panic of '93 struck town, and squeezed the everlasting bottom out of Tacoma's boom. Lane went broke with the rest of the country, settled his debts as best he could—as everybody else had to do—and came back to San Francisco. He had one achievement to the credit of his Tacoma experience, however: he had waged a newspaper war on the corrupt boss of that city, a professional gambler, and after resistance and threats to kill had proven vain, the gambler had to leave town. Some years later he met Lane in San Francisco, and was very friendly; he had gone up against a good fighter and appreciated the quality of the man who had whipped him.

In San Francisco, Arthur McEwen's "Letter" was the weekly sensation of the town. Frank Lane undertook the management of its small business interests and also wrote the lighter stuff that went in to make a background for McEwen's slashing comment. When McEwen went East, Lane went into the practice of the law again, with his brother George. The law was better luck this time. In 1898 it offered Frank a first-rate chance to make a name for himself, and he seized it. The new charter of San Francisco was then being drafted by a board of freeholders, who were being guided through their legal difficulties by an advisory committee. Lane was put on this committee. Here he distinguished himself by his laborious efforts to make the charter bullet-proof. These efforts were rewarded in 1899 by his election to the city attorneyship.

As city attorney under the first year of the new charter, Lane was put in an odd position. The charter was attacked by high-priced attorneys on behalf of the public utilities corporations, and Lane vigorously and successfully defended it. But it was generally commented on at the time that he should defend it so vigorously, because the defeat of the new charter would have added a year to his term in office. That did not worry him, and it really made no difference, as time proved, for he was twice re-elected. His first campaign for the office cost the magnificent sum of $470. But he did not need to spend a great deal of money. His very enthusiastic friends did so much of the work of his campaign that hired help was superfluous.

In 1902, he ran for Governor on the Democratic ticket. We had forgotten to record formally that he was a Democrat—everybody knows that, anyhow—but it is proper to add what many people do not know, that he was taken East by the national Democratic campaign managers, when he was only twenty-four years old, to stump New York State for Grover Cleveland for President. In his campaign for Governor of California, Lane made a light of the "whirlwind" variety, and it was characteristic that he came out at the end of it weighing two pounds more than when he went in, with his smile as serene and his spirits as high as when he began. The campaign affected him as a vacation affects most people; he thrived on it; he so genuinely enjoyed meeting people that it was a pleasure instead of a task. He believed that he was "counted out" of his election, and that he was rightfully the Governor, but, again a characteristic of the man, he was not embittered. The failure of the party vote in the Legislature, a year or two later, to land him in the United States Senate, was likewise insufficient to ruffle his philosophy.

But a more distinguished fate than either of the two big things he missed was lying in wait for him around the corner. President Roosevelt was planning great things for the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body at that time with only perfunctory powers and composed of men of rather conventional abilities. The extension of the powers of the commission was one of the principal aims of Roosevelt's administration, and he looked carefully about for men to sit upon it who would measure up to its enlarged responsibilities. In 1905 he sent to the Senate the name of Franklin K. Lane. Upon his retirement from the presidency, Roosevelt expressed his satisfaction with his choice in the phrase, "The best appointment I made in the whole seven years."

Lane made good on the commission. He worked early and late, and he began to take life much more seriously than he ever did before. But he retained his sense of humor, and this fact saves him from the effects he might otherwise suffer from the strain. A hearty laugh at a good joke toward the end of a driving day puts him back to his accustomed easy good humor.

And he has retained also the human quality, the frank man-to-manness that won and held the admiration and respect of his old comrades in California. At the famous quizzing of Harriman on the subject of control of competing lines, this openness of character produced a startling result. The other commissioners had approached the subject they were trying to trap Harriman on, by a dozen different indirect methods. Harriman had skillfully avoided a direct committal. At length Lane, wearied with these tactics, frankly put the bald question to Harriman, what would he do with the railroads of the country if government regulation were stopped. Harriman was struck by the openness of the attack and met it as man to man, and as bluntly gave the reply the committee had vainly tried to drag out of him—he would consolidate the parts of a transcontinental system and boss the whole thing himself.

It is not the intention in this article to lead the reader into the mazes of Lane's routine work at Washington. It is enough to point out that the Interstate Commerce Commission seems likely to become one of the very most important bodies in the American government, and that of that commission Franklin K. Lane is considered to be the strongest force.

His recreations are simple. A man who enjoys so thoroughly the mere give-and-take of ordinary human intercourse needs few avocations to relieve his mind. Lane loves good music, he loves a good story. Perhaps as much as anything he enjoys a long walk in the open country. But he does not qualify as a member of the "golf cabinet." He belongs to the Chevy Chase Club in Washington, which includes the President and the golf cabinet, but after he carried his golf sticks once across the links he remarked that he had enjoyed the walk but that next time he would leave the sticks behind.

The real, deepest joy of his life is his home, and the pet of the household is his younger child, Nancy. In the account of his Tacoma experience we forgot to say that he there married Miss Wintermute of Chicago, and that they have two children, Ned, aged thirteen, and Nancy, aged eight. Nancy is a very imaginative child, and Lane has for a long time had an evening duty to perform in the telling to her of a story. Once he gave a vivid account of the adventures of one "Big Chief," whom he manufactured out of his fancy for the occasion. Big Chief made such a hit with Nancy that she demanded that all future stories should contain Big Chief as the hero. This simplified the story-telling business for a while, until all the imaginable changes had been rung upon him, when it decidedly complicated Lane's job. At length he was driven to recall every story he had ever read and every play he had seen, and to reframe it so that Big Chief could qualify as hero. At last accounts the supply was holding out pretty well, but more adventures for Big Chief may now be a more trying problem for Lane than preferential rates or the long and short haul.

Ned rather startled Lane once. Mrs. Lane has found the Washington climate rather trying, and last summer Lane sent her and the children to Maine. Before they started he took Ned aside and said to him:

"Now see here, Ned; your mother wouldn't write it to me even if she were to get sick. So I'm going to give you a dollar on the side, and if she does get sick, don't say anything to her, but telegraph me."

Some weeks later Lane was sitting at a hearing before the commission, deep in some dry detail of rates, when a telegram was handed up to him. Hearings are usually disturbed by no such events, so he thought it must be important. When he ripped it open and saw "Ned" signed at the bottom he went weak all over. The telegram read:

"Have landed biggest land-locked salmon of the season. Six and a half pounds."

"NED."

In business, politics, or in any way, Lane has never been of the conventional type. He has done what appealed to him as the right thing to do, regardless of custom. If two years of college supplied his needs, he took that much and quit. If half of a regular law course was sufficient, he let the diploma go hang. He never played by the rules. He simply took a human survey of the case and attacked it from that standpoint.

As a politician he would now be called a reformer. He was straight and clean, and enjoyed the respect, even the friendship, of his political enemies. His career has been a pleasant thing to look upon, the career of a man who loved work and loved his fellow-men, and who has found life a very joyous series of events, who took misfortune and reverses without bitterness and has endured success without vanity.

THE "LABORATORY BRAIN"

Henry James' attitude toward immortality which he reveals in the new book, "In After Days," is one of "desire." He describes it as the outgrowth of the extension of his consciousness, and the vast immaterial fields it traverses. In his own words, Mr. James declines to accept the limitations of the "laboratory brain."

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Monument to Will S. Green

(The Sacramento Valley Development Association will erect a monument at Colusa in memory of Will S. Green.)

So should it be; yet well 'tis known
No granite plinth or marble shaft,
Though graven with all the sculptor's craft,
May add one glory to his own.

A simple man, yet strong withal,
And kind and brave and true in deed,
"Help others" was his life-long creed;
Help others, though reward seem small.

He saw while others still were blind
How waters stored of winter rains
Should turn to fruitage arid plains
And closer Wealth and Labor bind.

"He is a dreamer," cried our throng,
Our throng unwise, both sire and son,
"We'll trust to rains, as we have done."
But he was right, and we were wrong.

So aye he built for better ways,
For better ways and better deeds,
For actions fitted to our needs,
For added blessings for our days.

Then raise for him with kindly art
The shaft, yet know, though laurel-crowned,
His truest monument is found
Deep graven in the people's heart.

* * *

Mr. Stafford and I at Work

W. V. Stafford, president of the State Board of Harbor Commissioners, sends in two dollars for a subscription for The California Weekly—which was a most just, righteous and Stafford-like thing to do—with the announcement that he conditions the subscription that I shall during the coming year, and in the Weekly, settle "the many vexed problems that he and I left in a chaotic condition years ago when we used to endeavor to settle the affairs of the universe, while seated on the courthouse curb in the city of Stockton."

Mr. Stafford has an excellent memory, but it has betrayed him in this instance. We did not endeavor to settle the affairs of the universe at the time to which he refers; we merely judicially and regretfully pointed out that those affairs were dead wrong in all important particulars, at the same time freely admitting that either of us could have done a better job.

"Why," Stafford would say, "look at the grinding poverty and the horrible injustice on every hand. If I had the fixing of—"

"Hold on, dear boy," I would interrupt, "that is the trouble with you; you don't want to give others a chance. Now, if I had the opportunity of fix—"

"See here!" he would break in. "I don't doubt your ability; in fact, you wouldn't have to have any ability in order to fix things better than they are now, and so the job would just suit you. But you are on the newspaper treadmill and have no time to spare, while I could devote odd moments when I am off duty to fixing things up and making life sweet and beautiful for everybody. Oh, I tell you that I—"

But by this time I would have succumbed to the force of the argument, and would urge him to go ahead and fix things. Often and often he has promised me that he would do so, but I never knew him to do it except in an oratorical way which fed the mind, but did not comfort the stomach. I think, though, that he will do so some day, and even when hope is faintest in my breast it looks forward to that day and is revived.

I do not doubt that Mr. Stafford will pardon me for thus calling his attention to the palpable error into which his memory has betrayed him, and I am sure that as he looks backward he will recall that I am right.

The Opinions of Rufus

Job's patience stood boils middlin' well, but I can't help wonderin' what would have happened if they'd tried fleas on him.

Sometimes I can't help sighin' for Adam an' Eve. Without any neighbors to talk 'bout their days must have been mighty dreary an' monotonous.

The hull biography of some men's lives—all they've done an' all they've 'complished—could be written in a dollar mark with some figgers after it.

Men an' women are like books: Quite often the best article comes done up in the plainest bindin'.

I reckon they's nuthin' in the world that's fooler than a hen, 'less it is some men.

* * *

Thoughtful Man on an Impending Event

"It is rumored," said the Thoughtful Man, "that my friend, Patrick Calhoun, is to be gradually and gracefully removed from the presidency of the United Railroads. Soon, then, it will be time for a farewell banquet, which should be attended by any and all of our leading citizens who feel grateful to this great and noble man for showing them a way out of difficulties which may overtake them at any time. Add to these the ones who are willing to kowtow to the owners of money at any time, no matter how acquired, and the banquet would be certain to be largely attended. It would bring great relief to the realm of shades, would it not?"

"I don't understand why," I said.

"Then you hadn't heard about it? 'Twas like this: Two ghosts were wandering through the land of shadows, when they chanced to meet, and each was surprised to observe that the other was weeping bitterly.

"What's the matter?" one inquired.

"Why, dadburn it! the other replied, 'I established a justifiably great reputation when I was on earth, but I was fool enough to leave a descendant to represent me there today, and now look at me! I—I—' He broke down utterly.

"That's queer," the other remarked. 'My case is precisely similar—great reputation, descendant to represent me, and all—all! Ah, woe is me! I—I—'

"For a long time they wept together. Then one brokenly inquired, 'What is your name?'

"Patrick Henry, and you—yours?"

"John C. Cal—Calhoun."

"Then they fell to weeping again. Don't you think that a largely attended banquet might chirk them up a little?"

"It might," said I, "if they don't see the list of guests and know all about them."

* * *

Gems From a Gem-Factory

Mr. William T. Valentine has issued a large and glittering announcement that he is a candidate for the office of Mayor of San Francisco. It sparkles and scintillates, and, tenderly and lovingly, I select just a few verbal gems from its coruscating abundance, so that the public may realize what is open to it if it grabs quickly. Here are the sparklers—wear blue glasses and take a look at them:

"My knowledge of the law, coupled with the special training I have received as a business man, thoroughly fits me to fill the Mayor's chair."

"Mr. Valentine was greatly impressed by the appreciation of confidence showered upon him."

"William T. Valentine, the most prominent tailor in the city, * * * is a brilliant, broad-minded, well-trained, right-thinking, energetic, aggressive man."

"He will be to our city what Roosevelt was to our nation."

"There is a great similarity in the physical and mental make-up of William T. Valentine and Theo. Roosevelt."

"He is a man of action and might, swift in doing things."

Add to the foregoing Mr. Valentine's modesty, which he strangely neglects to mention, and it will be realized that the people of San Francisco ought to jump at the chance. It should be mentioned, in conclusion, that Mr. Roosevelt's twin—of course, I refer to William T. Valentine—is "not an office-seeker," but he is willing. Now remove the blue glasses; it is safe to do so.

* * *

Young Bings, and a Parable

It is true, as you say, Malachi, that young Bings does seem to be a somewhat hopeless case. He is graceless, unpleasant and puts in his nights accumulating headaches for the coming days. If I were his father I am quite certain that I should worry about him a great deal. And yet, my boy, I am not so certain; sometimes—But listen to a parable, a parable based upon facts.

About fifteen years ago I was in Bakersfield, and there a friend took me out for a ride. We rode up the river valley a way, and then he said: "Now, I am going to show you the worst tract of land, probably, that lies out of doors in the United States of America." We rode up a little ravine, looked out upon the land lying between us and the foothills, and, Malachi, I judged that my friend was right. I wouldn't have given a cent an acre for that land unless I had money to throw away. Like young Bings, it seemed worthless.

Three or four years later I looked upon that land again. There was an oil derrick every few rods, and wells were being bored almost everywhere. The land was not worthless; on the contrary, men were paying about steen thousand dollars an acre for it. You see, my friend and I did not see beneath the surface.

Perhaps that is what ails us in the case of young Bings, Malachi. You see, we do not know in his case, more than we did in that of the land, what God has hidden beneath the surface. His exterior is rough and unpleasant, but who knows? Let's not get discouraged too soon; it may be that our young Bings—whatever his other name—will pan out more thousands to the acre than did the Bakersfield land.

* * *

From Some Unknown Singer

(Not long ago verses of mine, entitled "Let's Keep Hopin'", were published in this department. The other day the mail brought to me a copy of them, and to them some kind but anonymous singer had attached the following verses, which were captioned, "To A. J. W.," and were signed simply, "One Who Reads." One need not be worthy of so sweet a tribute in order to appreciate it.)

"Hopin' for the morrow"—yes, too oft the heart forgets

That with Springtime and the sunshine always come the violets;

And the roses—smiles from Heaven!—with their hearts aglow with dew,

Dip and nod in balmy breezes, saying, "Howdy-do" to you.

And you, sweet singer of the heart, who know the causeway tares,

Sing on! That we may see, like mist, the fading of our cares.

Let's keep trustin', always trustin',—aye, our faith oft turns to fear,

When the heart goes back in day-dreams, and there comes the blinding day;

And we see gaunt, ghostly shadows leering at us as they thrust

Their grim shapes upon our pathway, till our hope is turned to dust.

So you, who know of heart's own pain and sorrow's pointed dart,

Sing on! That we may have more faith and trust within the heart!

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

In Justice to E. A. Williams

As his sources of information regarding things political The Watchman appeals to the best men he knows in each community and that information seldom proves ill founded, but sometimes the best of men misinterpret indications and errors are made, albeit in the best of faith. Last week it was stated in these columns that "Ed" Williams of Fresno was "understood to be the machine candidate" for the Republican nomination for the Assembly in the Sixty-first Assembly District. Mr. Williams denies absolutely any such affiliations and his denial has been voluntarily sustained by so many persons in whose sincerity and intelligence one may implicitly rely that The Watchman accepts the denial as conclusive. However, Mr. Williams is not wholly to be acquitted of having given at least some color to the suspicion that his affiliations might be of the character "understood." In his letter to us he declares that, "I am seeking the nomination on my reputation as a citizen independent of any organization whatsoever." This is the position that is almost uniformly taken by "organization" candidates throughout the State. Outside of certain city districts, where an indictment for felony would be looked upon as entitling the indicted to the entree to the best society, no candidate dare stand up and say, "I am an 'organization' candidate. I owe allegiance to the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau." On the contrary, they say: "I am a Republican, the candidate of no faction. I stand on my record." The bluff seldom works and very few voters will go to the polls on the 16th of August in doubt as to the affiliations of any candidate for Assembly or Senate. But we are assured from so many sources that we cannot doubt it that Mr. Williams' independence of candidacy is due to a temperamental independence of spirit that militates against his surrendering any part of his self-dependence to the keeping of any organization or association of his fellows, a trait of character that, by the way, often makes the best of men of little practical value in associated effort for even the best of causes, because it stands in the way of effective team work. Let it be understood, then, that Mr. E. A. Williams of Fresno is entirely acquitted of "organization" or other affiliations in his candidacy for the Assembly. He is going it alone, and if nominated and elected, will be guided by his own conscience and not another's.

W. F. Chandler Will Not Run

It is with regret that The Watchman has to announce that Mr. W. F. Chandler will not be a candidate for the Assembly from the Sixtieth District. He is not a man to shrink from duty and not a man to shrink from a fight where the cause is just. The considerations which have persuaded him to refrain from being a candidate must have been weighty. To be sure, his district is a difficult one. It takes in the saloon district of Fresno and the rather wide-open town of Coalinga, and Mr. Chandler has little sympathy with that factor in our political life, but the district also includes a large number of men of patriotism and good sense and their displacing Mr. Chandler with Mr. Odom by a plurality of only 88 votes has proven so odious that there can be little question that Mr. Chandler could be elected this time. The next Legislature will need as many Chandlers in it as possible. If it could be made up altogether of such men, California could be advanced on the road to Right Things a quarter of a century in a single session. May we not hope that Mr. Chandler will move to reconsider his own determination not to stand for nomination?

Allison Ware A Live Wire In the person of Allison Ware, Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican candidate for the Republican nomination for State Superintendent of Public Instruction, the League has sent out a live wire. He is a young man, strong and capable, with a good voice and a fine delivery and, what is more important than all else, he has a real message to carry to the patrons of education in this State. He is ready to back that message with a boundless enthusiasm and, if commissioned to undertake the task, will make the State office what it was designed to be, a source of inspiration, information and stimulation of the educational spirit throughout the commonwealth. He is aggressive as well as progressive, and the grass will not grow under his feet in office or out of it, and, if life and health are spared him, he will prove a factor in the educational life of California. Without disparaging the clever gentleman who now holds the office of State Superintendent, it is within bounds to say that if Allison Ware reaches that office it will experience a resurrection.

Things Above Ground And Away Down Below

So far as can be seen from everything that lifts its head above ground, the campaign of Hiram Johnson and his associates is making splendid headway. Johnson gets the audiences that no other candidate can approach and no man can challenge anything he says with a "taint so." Everybody knows that what he says is true, but will all those who know these things to be true vote as well as they know? That is the issue that only the 16th of August can determine, but everything above ground indicates that they will.

But what is going on away down below? It is inconceivable that William F. Herrin, Jere Burke, Walter Parker, J. C. Lynch and the rest of the force that constitute the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company are asleep. The campaigning that Anderson is doing is scarcely creating a ripple on the sea of politics. The swashing around of Ellery kicks up more spray. In fact, Ellery is getting to be obvious on the horizon's rim like a whale spouting, while Anderson seems to be water-logged and drifting.

Of course, Curry and his friends are busy, mainly under the surface of things visible. Rumor has it that the Political Bureau is under cover, too, working to undermine Curry, but what profit can there be in that? It must be plain to both of them that Johnson is the man they must beat if they are to win. It is impossible that either Curry or Anderson can win by defeating each other, and yet neither of them is seriously opposing Johnson, that is above ground, whatever they may be doing below. One always feels easier when he knows what the enemy is up to, and the Bureau appears to have masked its batteries well.

"Dark Horse" Dodge Against Eshleman

John M. Eshleman has the race for the Republican nomination for railroad commissioner in the Third District securely in his grasp, as against Theodore Summerland, the incumbent. Summerland does not realize this fact, but the railroad machine does, and is trying to pull Summerland out of the race. That failing, as it probably will—Summerland has had a good thing so long he hates to let go—the machine will probably try to bring out another candidate, not labeled as a machine candidate, but as an "independent" Republican or as a "leading citizen." It is known that the machine is now trying to find such a man. This paragraph is written to warn the voters of the Third District that the man who enters that race at this late date enters it because the machine wants him to, and because the machine hopes thereby to beat Eshleman. Now, Eshleman is the right man, a clean man, an able man, the man. Look out for his "dark horse" opponent.

F. F. Morse to Beat Bridge

F. F. Morse is the man chosen by the Independent Republicans of the Second Supervisorial District of Alameda County to make the fight against William Bridge. The "courthouse ring" over there is entrenched in the Board of Supervisors by the votes of three out of the five members. Bridge is one of the three. He is a political "me-too," who takes his voting directions from Kelly, the leader. Kelly is up for re-election, too. Morse has a good chance to defeat Bridge. He should be elected. With him on the Board of Supervisors, voting with Foss and Mullens, the two good members of the Board, the first big blow at the ring could be struck. Mr. Morse is a lifelong Republican, is supporting Hiram Johnson for Governor, and has a good record as a citizen and as a school director in the Lockwood district. He lives in the Old Kimball place on Seminary avenue, near Mills College. Most of the supervisorial district that he would represent is in the district recently annexed to Oakland—East Oakland, Fruitvale, Elmhurst, Fitchburg, Melrose, etc. The evils of the Kelly-Bridge domination of Alameda County show up in the finances of the county. In 1903, when Kelly got control, the taxes of the county yielded $795,981. In 1909, after six years of Kelly rule, taxes were $1,795,200, or an increase of an even million dollars. And yet today there is a deficit in the county treasury!

A Disadvantage In Taking Turns

It is unfortunate that when citizens contemplate assembly district lines they can not forget the county lines that run across and cut the assembly district up, but it is not easy to down a county line even in the interests of good government. In the last session of the legislature Harry Polsley represented the fifth district in the assembly. This district is composed of Tehama, Plumas and Sierra counties. Polsley comes from Tehama. It is claimed to be Plumas' turn to name the assemblyman and the candidacy of George S. Redstreake is announced. He is a Republican and is well spoken of. Mr. Polsley has the infirmity of being a Democrat, but his record in the last legislature was hard to beat. According to the Hichborn test he voted right eleven times out of eleven chances to vote right and there wasn't anybody who did better. Other things being equal this paper wants to see Republicans elected to office in preference to Democrats, for the reason that this is a Republican and not a Democratic paper, but the people of the fifth district would do better to elect Polsley, Democrat though he is, than to take any chances with a Republican of unknown affiliations. Mr. Redstreake may be as true blue as Polsley for aught this paper knows. It hopes that he is and knows no reason for suspecting that he is not, but Polsley has proved his quality by a record that was not beaten during the session. At all events his record should count for more than county lines in an assembly district.

Mr. Herrin's Grievance Against Charley Curry

Men have wondered why, if it be indeed true, Mr. W. F. Herrin should cherish a grievance against Charles F. Curry, a politician after his own heart and one who has never been disobedient to the policies of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. Well, here it is: Mr. Herrin has felt that, when through his influence, any candidate for office has been landed in office the least he could do by way of showing gratitude was to allow Mr. Herrin's handy men, Hatton, Parker or Burke, to name his subordinates or most of them. In this particular, and this alone, Mr. Curry has been disobedient. He not only would not permit Mr. Herrin's men to name the attaches of his own office but, by hook or by crook, he has stuck into nooks and crannies in all the institutions of this state men who were Herrin men all right, but were Curry men first. See? This has moved Mr. Herrin to express the opinion that Mr. Curry is a dangerous man. If made governor he would have a political bureau of his own and he would so entrench it, re-enforce it and hedge it about that perhaps the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company might not be able to prevail against it. This, away down low, is Mr. Herrin's one and only cause of grievance against Mr. Curry. It will be noted that it runs merely to patronage and not to principle.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

Fine Records But Oh So Different

The San Diego Union congratulates San Diego county on the fine records made in the last legislature by Senator Leroy Wright and Assemblyman E. C. Hinkle. That Leroy Wright proved himself a strong man in the last legislature no one cognizant of the facts will question. That his record was fine depends upon the point of view. No doubt Mr. Herrin pronounced him a good and faithful servant. He helped to cripple the direct primary law in the very nick of time, and he dug his railroad regulation bill up out of nowhere and contrived to get it substituted for the much better Webb-Stetson bill greatly to the joy of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau. Judged by the Hichborn standard he voted against progress and reform seven times and for them nine, not so outrageous a record if the votes told half the story, which they do not. He was looked upon by many as a friend to the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau stationed in the opposition camp, or as far in as he could get, that he might render more important service when needed.

Now with Hinkle it was different. He was elected as an "organization" man, nobody expecting anything but that he would "take orders," like Percy Johnson, for instance, who, by the Hichborn test, voted right once, wrong nine times and was absent once out of a possible eleven points to score. But Hinkle surprised everybody by standing up for Right Things every time, manifesting a clearness of understanding and integrity of character that had been little looked for. He voted right ten times out of Hichborn's eleven test votes and the one he got off wrong on was the party circle which did not involve any issue of corporation domination. San Diego cannot do better than to return Hinkle and keep Leroy Wright at home. As for Percy Johnson, he is unthinkable.

Judge Works' Views of God

In the Twentieth Century for June is an article on "Two Conceptions of God," from the pen of Judge John D. Works, Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican candidate for Republican endorsement for the United States Senate. It is a reverent, well written article, taking the view that God is spirit and not a greater Goliath sitting up in the heavens somewhere with his feet on the earth that he may judge men with stern relentlessness except they cringe and crawl before him. The Examiner has undertaken to make it appear from the article that Judge Works is some sort of an advanced, rationalistic, unorthodox if not infidel chaser after "New Thought." Of course anyone who can entertain two views regarding God is twice blessed above the Examiner, which is incapable of entertaining any, but when the Examiner comes to the defense of a personal devil it has Judge Works at a disadvantage. Having maintained contractual relations with his Satanic Majesty from the beginning it knows whereof it speaks. Judge Works' article is very well buttressed by the Scriptures and his view that God is Spirit, and not a corporeality, was better presented than by Judge Works by one Jesus of Nazareth, who made the concept intelligible to even an ignorant Samaritan woman at the well, to which she came to draw water. If the article squints at anything out of well-beaten orthodox paths it is at Christian Science, not a bad sort of Science when there isn't much the matter with one, as there is not with Judge Works, but this thing of trying to arouse religious bigotry that it may be made to "do politics," negatives the Judge's intimation that there may not be a literal hell. If there is not there ought to be, in order to furnish the proper entertainment for men who print papers after the character of the Examiner.

Assembly Candidates In San Francisco

The legislative candidates in San Francisco are mainly in the field now, and a rapid survey may not be amiss. It is pertinent to note beforehand that nearly all the undesirable candidates are out, while many who should be elected have so far failed to announce themselves. Only assembly candidates will be considered in this review, Senate candidates will be discussed next week. In the Twenty-eighth Assembly District the only conspicuous candidate is one Cunningham, a politician of the Tom Finn type. No desirable candidate has yet been announced in this district.

Twenty-Ninth

The Republican aspirants in the Twenty-ninth are J. P. Tighe, Daniel Reminger and Chris Walsh. Tighe is a small real estate dealer, of unknown political affiliations and equally unknown ability. He is a business partner of Lon Schaefer, candidate for the assembly from the Thirtieth. Reminger is a machine man, and should be beaten. Walsh is a young cement worker, manager for and member of the firm of Wesley & Co., a clean, forthright man, who has stood consistently for Right Things.

OVERSHADOWED THIS, FOURTH

Thirtieth District

The only Democratic candidate announced in this district is William Doell, an average type of the "Sout' o' Market" candidate. Three Republicans are in the field so far—McAllister, Lon Schaefer, and T. H. Horn. McAllister is a teamster and little known. Schaefer's campaign cards are printed in green, red and white. T. H. Horn is an ex-assemblyman who made a bad record, an ex-Ruef man, an ex-Schmitz man, a McCarthy man, and probably the organization candidate. There is room in this district for a good candidate.

Thirty-First

The only announced candidate is a Republican, universally known as Roughhouse Billy McDonald, an ex-prize fighter, and the hero of many a bar-room brawl. He is in the field at the behest of Tom Finn and of Hopkins, who represented the district in the last legislature. Hopkins insists that McDonald would make as good a record as he did. That is the reason his candidacy should not be encouraged. Probably the best man to run would be Fred Haws, manager of the Central Hotel, who is the right sort, but who is very reluctant to enter. He should be urged.

Thirty-Fourth

Two Republicans are announced here: Eugene E. Pfaffle, who served a term in the assembly in 1905, and Thomas J. Feeley, who is "machine." There are two good men in the list of possibilities, one of whom will probably be persuaded to go into the fight: Matt Harris, Jr., and Robert Hampton. Both are clean men, with good brains, members of the Olympic Club, and equally qualified for an argument or a fight. They are for Right Things, both of them. The one Democratic candidate announced is John J. McKeon, former associate of Florence O'Neill.

Thirty-Fifth

Morris J. Winter is a "push" politician and candidate for the Republican nomination. Frederick C. Pattison is unknown to The Watchman. Two equally good possibilities for the Republican nomination are Fred Gerdes, the incumbent, whose record in the legislature is good (Hichborn gives him 9 votes for reform, 1 against and once absent), and C. L. McEnery, a civil engineer and adviser to the Mission Promotion Committee. One or the other of these men will probably be nominated.

Thirty-Sixth

L. B. Sibley is the only candidate out for the Republican nomination here. He is a contractor, a man of means, clean, and has always stood for Right Things. He will have opposition, however. Tom Finn will bring out a candidate here, not yet known. Fred Eggers will also bring out a man.

Thirty-Seventh

E. J. Baumberger and John J. McManus want the Republican nomination. Baumberger is a young lawyer, and a member of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican movement. McManus is the incumbent. His record in Hichborn's "Story of the California Legislature of 1909," on eleven test votes is: for reform, 0; against reform 10; absent, once. He missed one chance to go wrong. He should be provided with a permanent leave of absence by his district.

Thirty-Eighth

The best candidate so far in this district is a Democrat, Herman M. Levy, son of Rabbi Levy, and a clean man. The Republicans are Gus G. Brown, a young attorney of unknown possibilities; Edward Barron, alleged to be a tenderloin politician; Mark Sena, whose candidacy is not considered seriously; Isaac Leipsic, another unknown; and Edward Nolan. Nolan is the organization candidate, and would probably follow Johnny Lynch's advice in the future as he has in the past. Pugh, the incumbent, is afraid to run again. Hichborn's record shows him right once, wrong eight times, and absent twice.

Thirty-Ninth

Two Republicans are announced, J. E. White and Julius Frankel. White is a lawyer, a fine, clear-cut fellow, who knows right from wrong and prefers to choose the right. He should be vigorously supported and elected. He would make a first-class legislator. Frankel lives in the Sunset district, has associated all his life with the vicious saloon element in politics, and supported McCarthy last year for the promise of support in his assembly ambitions this year.

In the Fortieth

Three Republicans possibilities here: Milton L. Schmitt, incumbent, whose record leaves much to be desired—2 right, 6 wrong, 3 absent; Henry Thompson, a former representative of the district, with a non-reform record; and Milton G. Banner, who should run, but so far won't. He is the right man if he can be persuaded. He ought to be forced into the fight.

Forty-First

Nat Coghlan and Abraham Perry Harris are out for the Republican nomination. Coghlan is the familiar Nat, former aspirant for district attorney of San Francisco against Fickert, "machine" through and through, and an impossible person politically. Harris not well known, but

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor California Weekly.

Dear Sir: Find enclosed a check for $2, for which please send me The California Weekly for one year, beginning at once. The Weekly is fighting for a mighty good cause and I wish to be posted on the progress of the fight.

Yours truly,

LARRANCE PAGE.

Greenville, Cal., June 4, 1910.

In the opinion of a newspaper man of state reputation, and himself the editor of one of the best papers in the state, the review of current political affairs to be found in The California Weekly is the best to be found in any paper in California. Anyhow, whoever reads out Table Talk will get as near to the pith of politics as he can get without being in politics himself.

Editor California Weekly.

Dear Sir: In response to yours of June 1st, I en-

JULIUS GALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
10 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY The Complete Text of the REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

cost my check for $2.00 to pay for The California Weekly for the ensuing year. I read no paper with deeper interest. I find no abler editorials anywhere. I detect no keener insight into affairs civil, social or moral. The only fault I have to find is that sometimes the issues fail to reach me. This occurred for several weeks in succession lately, so that I feared that a journal standing for righteousness had failed for lack of support in a community like that of California. I am relieved to find that this is not the case.

Cordially,

W. M. C. POND.

Redwood City, R. F. D., June 8, 1910.

If those who miss their copy of The California Weekly would take the trouble to drop us a postal card this office will not only forward another copy immediately, but will do all it can to find where the trouble is, and we generally find it.

Editor California Weekly.

Dear Sir: I am handing you herewith my check No. 9, your favor, for $2.00 in payment of my subscription for the ensuing year. Kindly acknowledge receipt.

I desire to thank you for the pleasure I have derived from reading your paper and have often thought I would avail myself of your kind invitation to express my opinion of the way you conduct it.

In this day and generation when the pursuit of mammon seems to be the ruling impulse of most business enterprises, it is truly refreshing to find one conducted along the lines of public righteousness, as exemplified in your editorial and other departments.

I am particularly impressed with the department headed: "The Deeper Significance of Living." It has provided me with much comfort, especially when I notice my young son taking a great interest in it also. He is just at an age when the lessons such as you seek to impress are readily absorbed and I have to thank you for your influence in the right direction with this young man.

California certainly owes you a debt of gratitude for the stand you are taking against all forms of evil and in favor of clean living.

Yours very truly,

T. W. MADELEY.

Sacramento, Cal., June 3, 1910.

Letters like the foregoing make it seem worth while to be alive and trying to do something to make things better than they are, especially to those who, like the writer of the "Deeper Significance of Living," have been, figuratively speaking, pouring water down gopher holes for thirty years without ever seeing a gopher come out. It is one of the penalties of writing things that the writer seldom sees that anything comes of it. A builder can point to this structure and that one and say, "I built them." The lawyer can say that he won this case or lost the other and point to the record in proof of it. The man who sets posts around a field can point to the posts as evidence of something done. Even the minister can point to now and again a person received into the church, but the writer, he whistles down the wind for a lifetime and rarely hears so much as an echo from all his puffing and blowing. To such an one the report that some growing boy is perhaps being helped to be a Man and Citizen, through reading the things that one writes, comes like being given a lift along a dusty road on a hot day by being taken into an automobile going his way. Thanks!

Editor California Weekly.

Dear Sir: I am an appreciative reader of your paper as it appears, but your issue of last week (June 3) calls for special commendation.

From your initial paragraph alluding to the address of Mr. Roosevelt in London, proceeding with your comment on the relation of the Federal government to the railroad, and great corporations, in the exercise of its power to supervise their action in the interests of the public; in your article "The Deeper Significance of Living"; in your reference to politics and politicians in connection with the present campaign in this state, and particularly in your sketch of the career of William Kent as an incentive to others of his class to exert themselves in promoting civic and general righteousness, there is more to induce clear thinking, and right action regarding the vital issues of the day, than can be found in a week's reading of the three daily morning papers of your city. I take them all, and read them with some care, but, with little profit, apart from merely material interests. As to the London address of Mr. Roosevelt's, anyone who expects on such an occasion to hear from him meaningless platitudes, or brilliant generality, manifests an entire ignorance of the spirit which animates him. Theodore Roosevelt is a MAN, and because of this fact, he in consonance with the old Roman poet, feels "that nothing pertaining to the interest of humanity is a matter of indifference to him." Whenever he has an opportunity to serve those interests, no one who knows him need be in doubt regarding his position. Long life to the man, success to his principles, and ever increasing extent to his influence in behalf of righteousness among men and nations.

With all good wishes for the success of The California Weekly.

Yours truly,

E. C. WILLIAMS.

An especial reason for appreciating the foregoing is that it was written by a man who has seen ninety years of American history made under his own eyes, a man whose clearness of vision and keenness of interest in the affairs of men, and sympathy with whatever helps to make for human welfare, is not exceeded by any man in the prime of life. We prize this because it comes from Oakland's Grand Old Man, old in years but young in spirit, in hopefulness, in love for his kind. Profoundly religious all his days, and looking upon his church as dedicated to that only which is holy and into which there should come no unworthy thing, yet it was this man who rose in his place before his church packed with men as never before, and proposed three cheers for Rudolph Spreckels and Francis J. Heney, inasmuch as they were doing God's service in striving to redeem San Francisco from the clutches of organized graft and ignoble greed. Will not our readers join with The California Weekly in venturing the hope that Deacon Williams may turn the century corner as young in heart and sympathy with Right Things as he is now?

TINIEST DOLLS IN THE WORLD

The smallest dolls in the world are made by Isabel Belauzaran, a Mexican Indian girl of such skill that she is known as the "Queen of the Needle." The tiny manikins are barely three-fourths of an inch long but are perfect in all details.

She first makes a diminutive frame work of wire. This she winds with fine silk thread until she has secured the proper figure. The clothes are then cut according to the character of the doll and fitted carefully to it.

With a needle that can scarcely be held in the fingers and whose eye is almost invisible, various designs are actually embroidered on the clothes with the finest of silk threads. So cleverly are they executed that even through a powerful magnifying glass the details appear to be perfect, yet the entire work is done without the aid of an enlarging device of any kind.

After the dressing has been completed it is necessary to add the hair. What is undoubtedly an example of the tiniest hair dressing on earth is then performed on each doll, writes Russell Hastings Millward in the Bulletin of the American Republics. Even to the details of the braids and ribbons, the work is most completely carried out. The eyes, nose, mouth, hands and feet are then formed.

They are sold for the ridiculously low sum of 25 cents gold. It takes two hours of painstaking work to make one of the simplest of these little dolls. Many of them are provided with tiny baskets of flowers, fancy sombreros, water jars and other paraphernalia. The little baskets are made of fine hair by the Indians of Guanajuato. The little pieces of pottery are made of clay in exact imitation of the practical sizes. All these accessories are sewed to the dolls.

Miniature roses are actually embroidered in the dresses of the dancing girls and ornaments are arranged in their hair. Wreaths of flowers are hung about the shoulders and the arms are formed in graceful and lifelike attitudes of dancing. The matador is complete in every particular, his costume being gayly decorated in many colors, the hair dressed in true Spanish fashion, including the conventional queue.

The first dolls of this kind were made eight years ago, since which time specimens have found their way into the possession of almost every royal family in the world, as well as into many private collections.

The New York Times has found something new in obituary notices. It quotes a small western paper's account of a funeral, which concludes with the statement that the deceased "was dressed in the conventional black."

While in India Lord Kitchener visited an out-of-the-way district where a new fort had been erected. He was astonished to find that it was commanded by a hill close by. "I congratulate you, colonel," said Kitchener to the officer who had selected the site. "What a capital fort! Er—when do you begin to remove the hill?"

SOME TRENDS IN HIGHER EDUCATION

AND SOME STATISTICS TO ILLUSTRATE THEM

By PROFESSOR GUIDO H. MARX, of Stanford University

No modern social phenomenon is more worthy of the attention of the thoughtful citizen than the remarkable growth and spread of interest in higher education, and the consequent tremendous increase in the number of those pursuing advanced studies and receiving higher training, for none is fraught with the possibilities of more significant social consequences. The purpose of this brief paper is to present to the readers of The California Weekly in compact form some of the more salient features of this movement. The writer is indebted to the editor of "Science" for the privilege of using a portion of the material which he originally published in that journal at greater length. Some of the data, however, are here published for the first time.

In the modern recognition of the value of trained intelligence Germany has been the pronounced leader. If we plat the combined attendance at the twenty-two German universities for the last seventy-five years, year by year, the resulting chart reveals at once a most striking fact.

It will be seen that prior to 1870 (the year of the Franco-Prussian war) this attendance was fairly uniform (the yeast of the spirit of 1848-9 can, however, be seen to have been slightly working), keeping regular pace with the population and thereby betokening a certain stable condition of the social order. Immediately after this date we find the curve taking a sharp upward bend and an increase in attendance growing much more rapidly than the population. Nor does this increase show the slightest tendency to fall off. It is even more marked if we plat the combined attendance at all the German universities, polytechnic and professional colleges above gymnasial rank.

At the beginning of the period of rapid development (1870) we find one matriculated student for every two thousand inhabitants, while in 1907 we find one for every thousand inhabitants. This denotes twice as widespread a participation in the benefits of higher education—and, involving, as this must, higher personal efficiency, needs and aspirations, it is not too much to claim that we are well on the way toward an entirely new social order; that we are in the midst of an intellectual renaissance of profoundest import, of a movement which is one of the most significant in the history of the development and progress of the race.

Were Germany alone in this movement so broad a statement would be unjustifiable—but she does not stand alone, she is simply preceding the other nations.

To show this, we may take the official statistics of the United States, as given in the annual reports of the Commissioner of Education, and, year by year, plat the combined attendance at all the colleges, universities, scientific, technical and professional schools, omitting preparatory departments.

Up to the year 1885 we see a condition of practical stability, but beginning with that year the curve takes an upward bend and continues with no sign of falling off. We see repeated the same story told by the German curves but beginning fifteen years later. In 1885 we find one student for every seven hundred inhabitants, twenty years later, in 1905, one for every four hundred—or, if we include the Normal School attendance as given by Curve A, one for every three hundred inhabitants.

Even though the United States shows the same phenomenon, our broad statement might have to be qualified. But the following table (I.) shows that the movement is not confined to these two countries. Here we see that Russia is the only western country of prominence which has not passed Germany's figure of the year 1870, namely, one student for two thousand inhabitants.

The figures given in Table I. are the most

TABLE I.

Country.	Population.	Number of Students in Higher Educational Institutions, 1906-7.	Population per Student.
United States	83,941,510 (Est. 1906)	283,395 (Incl. Normal Schools)	296
Switzerland	3,463,609 (Cen. 1905)	212,956 (Excl. Normal Schools)	394
France	39,252,267 (Cen. 1906)	10,511	330
Denmark	2,605,268 (Cen. 1906)	50,935	771
Germany	60,641,278 (Cen. 1905)	3,363	775
Austria-Hungary	46,973,359 (Est. 1906)	73,020 (Incl. Hearers)	830
Greece	2,631,952 (Cen. 1907)	51,691	909
Italy	33,640,710 (Est. 1907)	2,836	928
Belgium	7,238,622 (Est. 1906)	33,174	1,014
Netherlands	5,672,237 (Cen. 1906)	7,139	1,044
United Kingdom	44,100,231 (Est. 1906)	5,435	1,068
Spain	18,831,574 (Cen. 1906)	41,305 (Excl. 22,159 "Evening Students")	1,204
Roumania	6,585,534 (Est. 1907)	15,642	1,234
Sweden	5,337,055 (Cen. 1906)	5,336	1,324
Portugal	5,423,132 (Cen. 1900)	4,032	1,382
Norway	2,321,088 (Est. 1906)	3,923	1,547
Servia	2,676,989 (Est. 1904)	1,500	2,619
Russian Empire	149,299,300 (Est. 1906)	1,022	2,754
Bulgaria	4,035,623 (Cen. 1905)	54,208	3,048

Note—Population from "Statesman's Year Book—1908."

Number of students from "Report of U. S. Commissioner of Education, 1908, Vol. I."

complete which the writer has been able to compile from official sources. Insofar as they err, it will probably be found that they understate, rather than overstate, the number of students for some of the countries. It is not likely that the errors of omission are very great or that they would make any marked change in the order of the countries as here given, except possibly that Norway would move up several places. The striking fact of the state, through the schools, to the highest and best things which men can achieve. To make such paths, to make them open to the poorest and lead to the highest is the mission of democracy." Our table discloses the encouraging fact that in this respect democracy appears to be fulfilling its mission.

To analyze the forces underlying this great wave of emancipation, fascinating as the study may be, is a task lying beyond our present

TABLE II.
Ratios of Attendance of Various Courses at the German Universities, Technical and Professional Colleges

Faculty.	1830	1869	1905	Ratio	1869	1905
					1830	1869
Universities
Theology	6,076	2,986	3,846	0.49		1.29
Law and Finance	4,502	3,178	12,456	0.71		3.92
Medicine (Including Dentistry)	2,355	3,140	6,142	1.33		1.96
Philosophy (Incl. Philology, Mathematics and Science)	2,937	4,853	19,494	1.65		4.03
Polytechnica
Architecture and Civil Engineering ^a		942 ^a	5,443			5.75
Mech. and Elec. Engineering ^a		241 ^a	5,161			21.50
Chemical Technology		213 ^a	1,431			6.70
Special Branches		418 ^a	1,577			3.77
Professional Colleges
Mining		144	686 [835 Incl. hearers]			4.77
Forestry		306	309 [366 Incl. hearers]			1.01
Agriculture		357	1,517 [1,698 Incl. hearers]			4.25
Veterinary Medicine		267	1,120 [1,260 Incl. hearers]			4.20
Commercial Universities			1,076 [3,098 Incl. hearers]

Unless otherwise stated, the numbers are for matriculated students only. The ratios are for matriculates.

Population: 1869, 40,805,000; 1905, 60,314,000. Ratio: 1905/1869, 1.5.

^a Original data not segregated.

brought out by the table is the leading position of the three great republics. In this connection the following words from the inaugural address of President Bryan of Indiana University should have place: "What the people need and demand is that their children shall have a chance—as good a chance as any other children in the world—to make the most of themselves, to rise in any and every occupation, including those occupations which require the most thorough training. What the people want is open paths from every corner powers. It remains a problem for the future historian. We must content ourselves with noting the phenomenon and passing on to some of its effects. It is also to be noted in passing that going side by side with the great increase in numbers there has been a vast improvement in the standards of the educational institutions as affecting both their entrance requirements and their own grade of work. Whether as cause or effect there has also accompanied this wonderful growth a remarkable broadening of curriculum and quite

TABLE III.
Comparison of Attendance of Various Courses in Germany and the United States 1905-6

	United States	Germany	Ratio U. S. G.
Population	83,935,000	60,314,000	1.39
Theology	7,968	3,846	2.07
Law	15,411	12,456	1.22
Medicine	24,924	6,142	4.05
(Incl. Dent. and Pharmacy)	36,945		[6.01]
Philosophy or Liberal Arts	94,200 ¹⁰	19,494	4.83
Arch. and Civ. Engineering ¹⁰	10,200 ¹⁰	5,443 ¹¹	1.86
Mech. and El. Engineering ¹⁰	15,150 ¹⁰	5,161	2.95
Chemical Technology	1,420 ¹⁰	1,431	1.00
Mining	3,260 ¹⁰	686	4.75
Agriculture	5,000 ¹⁰	1,517	3.3
Veterinary Medicine	1,445	1,120	1.29

Data from Ascherson, Lexis, Minerva and Report of U. S. Commissioner of Education, 1906.

¹⁰ Not segregated in German data. In United States, 900 Arch., 9,300 C. E. and 2,700 Gen'l Eng.

¹¹ Computed on basis of returns for 86.5 per cent. of total. See Report U. S. Commissioner of Education, 1906, p. 446.

¹² In 1902 there were 1,995 Arch. and 2,852 C. E. On a proportionate division this gives in 1905-6, 2,220 Arch. and 3,223 C. E.

a complete change of emphasis on what constitute the essential factors of higher training.

It is of interest to compare this vast and increasing throng of students to a powerful stream which, refusing longer to be confined within narrow, artificial banks, has burst through and found its own natural channels. What these have been can be seen from the accompanying table (II.), comparing the German student attendance in the various channels of work for the years 1869 and 1905.

The accompanying table (III.), comparing American and German attendance, also throws light upon this phase of our subject.

In making this comparison too definite conclusions must not be drawn, as the writer is well aware of the differences in standards and curricula. Thus it is probable that quite one-half of our collegiate students are doing work of German gymnastic grade. In the technical and professional fields it is possible that the work is more nearly commensurate. Another item not indicated here is the much larger proportion of women students in the United States. However, this broad subject of comparison can only be touched upon and left with the statement that American standards are rapidly improving, more rapidly than they are aware who have not been giving attention to the subject.

In the light of these charts and figures is it too much to claim that they betoken a rapid breaking down of old forms of caste, class and privilege—a great social upheaval signaling the imminence of a new social order? Can no connection be traced between this increasing stream of trained young men and women taking up their duties of citizenship, and the great wave of awakening to a higher sense of social obligation and civic righteousness now rising in our country?

In view of recent happenings, however, this query may not be pushed too far by one who writes from Stanford for readers familiar with San Francisco's late political history. But viewed nationally the query is more than justifiable.

It is folly to dream of checking this mighty stream or of turning it back into the banks of a narrow scholasticism. Our problem is to provide adequate and suitable channels for it. Conditions are rapidly changing and educators must face the facts as they are.

The profound demand of this army of nearly three hundred thousand students in our country to-day is for an education which will enable them to live most worthily and effectively the life of to-day and to-morrow. The demand, which will not be denied, is for breadth of culture coupled with an effective bearing upon the needs and problems of life—a culture whose key-note shall be efficiency in action and service.

It is toward this end of service to humanity that our institutions of learning are receiving generous public and private support—not for the selfish development of a higher capacity of enjoyment in the few—not for the training of men away from life. The world looks to the universities for citizens trained to do useful and necessary work and anxious to carry their share of its burdens—not for men and women who desire to evade these responsibilities, to gain special privileges, or to prey upon their fellows by exercise of the very training which has been bestowed generously upon them. Moreover, it looks to the universities to inculcate and preserve the ideals of high character applied to these tasks of ordinary citizenship. From those who have enjoyed the privilege of university training it expects superior devotion as well as individual efficiency.

These demands upon the universities, and the changes brought in the train of their phenomenally rapid growth, involve new, reciprocal obligations on the part of society toward the institutions. The discussion of the nature and extent of these, however, lies beyond the scope of the present paper.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

his inclinations and affiliations have always been right.

Forty-Second Arthur Joell, a clean, upright young fellow, is the proper man of the two announced candidates for the Republican nomination. The other man is F. V. Kingston, formerly an understudy of the convicted perjurer, George D. Collins. Kingston was one of the men whose names were unpleasantly associated with the wrecking of the State Commercial and Union state banks. He should be defeated.

Forty-Third Frank N. Rodgers is a young printer whose ambitions politically have led him into the mazes of tenderloin politics, where he is reputed to accept the orders of the machine bosses. A man who should be a candidate, if he can be persuaded to run, is Francis Dunn, an attorney and a clean and able man.

Forty-Fourth Daniel Giovannini is probably the best of the offerings in this district. The other Republican aspirants are Melville Hermann, formerly secretary of the Schmitz Central Club; Victor A. Sbragia, S. P. Blumenberg, Walter J. Bryant, and Henry Stern. The last named a small real estate dealer and a machine follower. The picking is poor in the list.

Rubber Stamps

10 CENTS PER LINE

AT Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do. To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

HONOLULU

Reduced Rate $110

and back first class from
San Francisco

The splendid steamer SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 52 days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, June 18, July 9, and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire coast the world over. Volcano, Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sails from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS
GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS
309-310 MARINE BUILDING
CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed $1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits... 435,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.
Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital $1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909..... 38,610,731.93
Total Assets 41,261,682.21
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President, Emil Rohde; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, George Tourny; Assistant Secretary, A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohde, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.
RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital $3,000,000.00
Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL $1,500,000.00
Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper Mark L. Requa
Thomas Jennings J. H. Skinner
James K. Lynch Rudolph Spreckels
Walter S. Martin John W. Van Bergen
J. K. Moffitt Rolla V. Watt
S. G. Murphy Clinton E. Worden
George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

I.
WELL, young man," observed the Superintendent of Schools, as a modest appearing young gentleman entered his office, "I have been looking over your credentials and find them good, very good, and your examination papers speak well for your attainments; but you come late, and the fact is there is but one school in the county which has not engaged a teacher for the coming year and that one would not be left unsupplied if a teacher could be found who would have it. Sorry, but it is that or nothing, and probably nothing would be preferable to you."

"Where is this school and what is the matter with it?" inquired the applicant, brightening a shade at the prospect of securing employment of any kind.

"Thereby hangs a tale," was the reply; and the venerable chief of our educational department interlocked his fingers above his head, slipped a notch lower into his chair, extended his legs and otherwise composed himself for the narration.

"This district is in the most benighted neighborhood in all California, and I doubt if Arkansas or the Cracker settlements in Georgia can produce its fellow. It is the one great humiliation of the county, and the only missionary work I have ever done in my life I did up there, and even that has not borne fruit to speak of so far. Would you believe it? Those people have been up in those scrub-oak hills—up where one may see out only by looking straight up—for twenty years and have just built their first school-house and will open their first school when I can send them a teacher.

"Oh, no! they are not at all vicious," the superintendent hastened to assure his interlocutor. "They are as harmless as so many sheep; but they are 'dumb' and thriftless and superstitious beyond all things. Hot sour milk biscuit, bacon fat and black coffee three times a day, year in and year out—bah! I'm afraid I'll never be able to send them a teacher. What? No! Will you? Goodness gracious! but that takes a load off my mind. Well, come up into the cupola and I'll show you just where the district is"; and the old gentleman led the way, puffing, up the winding stair.

It was a leg-wearying climb up into the birdcage of a cupola surmounting the great white courthouse; but an airy height was finally reached where the view was unobstructed by house or treetop. Miles upon miles of level plain lay unfolded below them and from above the Sierras looked gravely down through the dusky murk; for the long, rainless summer was not yet at an end, and a canopy of dust overhung the valley like an Indian summer haze.

"Do you see that bank of snow up yonder? Now below and a little to the right, that big, black mass of wooded mountain? That is Black Mountain. Halfway down it now a jagged line of naked rocks, extending across its face and away beyond on either side? That is Hatchet Mountain, thirty-odd miles away. Around the base of that mountain are Wilkerson's Flats, called 'flats' not all because they are flat, but because there are limited areas a trifle flatter than their surroundings, which pretty generally stand on end. Your best way to get there will be to cut straight across the plains. Drop into the office as you pass, and I'll give you a letter to Borden. Borden can't read, but his wife can a little, so he is king bee of the community. Better stop and take in this view while I'm writing. Hard to beat, hey? Strikes me that way. So long." And the old gentleman picked his way cautiously down the stairs, leaving the newly employed teacher to his own thoughts and the view.

Royal Archer had been out of Ohio a month, out of Oberlin College a year, and the unhappy possessor of a broken heart for just five weeks. His refusal had been kindly enough, but so unequivocal as to leave no doubt as to its finality.

Matilda had been his nearest neighbor and dearest playmate all her life long. He could remember well when she was born, and often in dimpled infancy she had been intrusted to his care, and it had given him joy to wheel

THE REGENERATION OF WILKERSON'S FLAT

BY

ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY

her in her tiny buggy up and down the shaded avenue. From that time until within a few short weeks he had confided in her his most cherished ambitions, and it had always seemed to him that the interest she took was sincere, and yet when he offered his hand she refused him.

"No, Royal," she had said, "I respect you sincerely, as all must who know you; but I have thought of life a great deal of late, and know that I have no heart for the career you offer me. Frankly, now, you have not talent enough to secure the better paying charges, and to live the dependent life of the wife of a poor clergyman, a stinted pensioner upon the meager bounty of a small community, would embitter my existence. The spirit of martyrdom is not in me, and if I ever marry, the one of my choice shall be a hearty, generous man of affairs, who shall love me so truly that, if need be, he will sacrifice all other interests to our common good; not our common good to all other interests. Such a man in making room for himself, and me, will make room for many incapable ones; and he who, by promoting industry, feeds the hungry and clothes the naked, cannot be least among the servants of God."

Archer had dreamed of a great work for the Master done in the world; and a full half of the dream, and half of the work too, it may be conjectured, had concerned Matilda, her positive, hopeful, stirring nature so supplemented his more negative temperament; but now that she was to bear no share in the world-work that he had dreamed of doing rather than planned, it seemed that it could not go on. His little bark had been set adrift, and, simply because it had not drifted elsewhere, had drifted to California.

Feeling that he must have something to do, Archer had applied for a school to teach; but was there nothing better anywhere for him to do than to immerse himself in this cast-off community? It was a far more important work than this, of which he had dreamed. Left alone in the cupola he cast a half-interested glance at the view, sank upon a bench and proceeded to enjoy anew the exquisite torture of his great disappointment. It was wonderful how much misery persistent brooding contrived to make it yield.

"Feed my sheep," Archer started. Whence came the thought? Dreamer that he knew himself to be he could scarcely believe this inward voice a dream. "Feed my sheep." Was this to point the path of duty? He would so interpret it anyway; for he had always loved to think that some time a special and not inglorious mission would open at his feet, and a sweet but exalted voice would call him to his work. Yielding to a sudden impulse, the dreamer dashed down the stairs, secured his letter of introduction to kindly Borden, and turned his face toward the hills.

It was an exhilarating canter across the plains that afternoon, exhilarating because the spirited young mare Archer rode would have it so, for otherwise it would have been dull enough. A long and rutted, dusty lane, then out upon the billowy hog-wallows, limitless fields of stubble, a jack rabbit bounding away on the segment of a circle—surely nothing could be more uninteresting. But the mare's pace was rapid, and the veil of dust which hangs before the face of the mountains in summer time soon began to lift, disclosing the velvety, angular, grass-covered foothills.

Archer thought he had not seen anything more beautiful.

As he drew nearer he saw that myriad hoofs of sheep had trampled the faces of the hills into tiny terraces, and in the shimmering sunset light, the landscape seemed to flow and flicker like dissolving views from a stereopticon lantern; and above, their granite peaks bathed in sunlight, the Sierras looked down in solemn majesty. "Surely the souls of men accustomed to scenes like this cannot be wholly dead," Archer reflected, hopefully, as he rode along.

Turner's wheat ranch was the last place "fit for a white man to stop at," the superintendent had said; so Archer spent the night at Turner's.

It was Friday, and the forenoon was half spent when a dusty horseman drew rein before a little corral of poles filled with lithe, long-horned, impatient, lowing cattle, and one was being milked by a fuzzy faced youth, long of limb and lank of body.

"My friend, are you not a trifle late about milking?" the traveler called, cheerily.

"The world owes us a livin'," and I reckon we ort er git it the easiest way we kin," the young man drawled, as he rose from his stool and moved toward the bars. "Thar ain't no hurry in these parts no way. Won't ye light?"

"I might if by so doing I could get a drink of water for myself and another for my mare. We have found it rather a dry road coming to Wilkerson's Flats this morning," Archer replied.

"I reckon ye kin git it, stranger. Thar ain't no better water 'n the hills than we've got down back of the house. Runs the y'ar roun'. Better look out fer that thar cow brute with the bell on," he added, "she's kinder handy like with her horns long er strangers; but she's tolerable peert for all that. Every one of them thirty critters thar 's her kin, 'nd Pap's sold nine hundred dollars' worth from her besides. It's a power of terbacker 'nd caliker she's fetched us, 'nd she hain't cost nary a cent yit. The world owes us a livin', 'nd I reckon we ort er git it the easiest way we kin; 'nd critters like that ar fetches it erbout the easiest, I reckon."

By this time they had reached a gap in the fence which served for a gate, where a meager sow was suckling a litter of starveling pigs. A pack of baying hounds came bounding toward them and, being so directed, set upon the pigs and sent them squealing off up the hills making way for the entrance of the mare and her rider.

Three women, representing as many generations, attracted by the din, filed through the cabin door and stood with arms akimbo staring. A grizzly-headed man sitting with chair tipped against a poplar tree took his pipe from his mouth and blurted, "Howdy, stranger," resuming his pipe again. Two other men, lank and long as the youth at the cow pen, got up from the ground, shook themselves a notch or two further into their pantaloons, and gazed upon the well-dressed stranger with open-mouthed but speechless curiosity.

"You appear to have a nice, quiet place up here among the hills," Archer observed, as he rinsed, refilled and raised to his lips the proffered cup (oyster can) of water.

"Y-e-e-s," the old man drawled, "thar ain't much rar'n roun' hyer'bouts; but we've ernough ter eat and ernough ter war sech as 'tis. The world owes us a livin', 'nd I reckon we ort er git it the easiest way we kin."

The house was a low, unpainted, weather-worn shanty of one story, made from a single thickness of rough boards put together box fashion. To serve for a porch, poles had been put up and covered over with scrub-oak boughs, and fallen leaves cluttered the ground about the doorway. A big chimney, built outside from sticks and stones and mud, just tall enough to clear the shake-covered roof, completed the habitation, and therein dwelt in tolerable harmony five men, three women and four children.

And yet some suggestions of refinement were not wanting. A pretty curtain shaded the upper half of the one window visible from Archer's point of view, and through it he saw that tiny pictures in homemade frames hung against the walls. While taking observations Archer's blue orbs caught for an instant the gleam of a pair of dancing brown ones; but they vanished at the moment of contact. He wondered to whom they could belong, and looked again and again; but they eluded him after that, though he felt sure that they were watching him constantly.

"Can you direct me to Borden's place?" the visitor inquired, without addressing his question to any one in particular.

The pipe slipped from the old man's mouth, and its stem, with an accompanying grunt, was thrust over the right shoulder. The younger men canted their heads in the same direction. The women faced to the southeast and stared, and Archer's acquaintance of the cowpen extended his arm, unfolded the index finger joint by joint, opened his mouth and spoke: "Over yen, beyant that gap er mile 'nd er half. Ye cayn't miss it." Six pairs of lusterless eyes returned from a southeasterly direction, and dumbly certified to the accuracy of the information given.

"And the schoolhouse, where is that?"

Once again the pipestem pointed, the eyes focused on the gap between the wooded hills, the long arm extended and the finger protruded; but before a word was uttered there came a rushing from the cabin door, bare feet pattered across the beaten yard, and a pair of big brown eyes scintillating with excitement looked up into Archer's, and an eager voice asked: "Be you the teacher? Did the superintendent send yer? Will school take up er Monday maw'nin'?" Without waiting for a reply the voice went off into a succession of uncontrollable oh, oh, oh's, and its owner danced up and down in a delirium of expectancy.

"Jess! Jess! Jess! You Jess!" broke simultaneously from a half-dozen throats. "That gal's gone plumb crazy sence the fust nail was druv in that thar schoolhouse," the old man explained, apologetically.

"Pears like she's gwine ter turn the settlement upside down," added the middle-aged woman, taking her pipe from her mouth for the moment.

"Yes, my child," Archer replied, soothingly, taking the child by her hand and drawing her toward him, "I am the teacher, the County Superintendent sent me and, God willing, we will open school Monday morning. You will be there, I know."

There was something in those wide, starved eyes upturned and filled with gathering tears of joy which affected Archer strangely, and he made haste to be off about his business. "Feed my sheep." Surely here is one hungry little lamb, Archer thought, as he rode along.

"The world owes us a livin', 'nd I reckon we ort er git it the easiest way we kin." So that was the philosophy of Wilkerson's Flats. Not so bad if accompanied with a knowledge of how to employ one's leisure. Archer had always looked upon the world of business with abhorrence.

Money-making impressed him as being such a spendthrift squandering of precious time. Work was necessary in some measure, but people ought to transact business that they might live, not live that they might transact business, as most people seemed to do. Possibly the people of Wilkerson's Flats might teach him how to make his wants few and supply them easily, and he, in turn, might teach them how better to employ their leisure hours. Straightway our hero fell to dreaming and, long enough before reaching Borden's place, saw a wonderful work performed in Wilkerson's Flats, under God, but by means of the invaluable services of Mr. Royal Archer.

When, after studying the life and work of Abraham Lincoln, one turns to trace his ancestry, it seems almost that God in his providence saw fit to keep the Lincoln family impoverished, intellectually, for successive generations in order that those great qualities of mind and heart might be husbanded against the time of the nation's greatest need. So, in lesser degree, with this delicate flower of Wilkerson's Flats, otherwise whence came those speaking eyes of Jessie Ware's? That grace, intelligence, ambition, hope? The eyes of her kindred lacked luster, their movements were clumsy, intellects dull, and habits shiftless beyond all things.

Jessie Ware was thirteen years old, and she had been so far from home as the county seat but once in her life. The County Superintendent of Schools, upon one of his visits to the Flats, became greatly impressed with Jessie's intelligence and, after much persuasion, was able to take her home with him for an extended visit.

This stay of a few weeks at the county capital was a profound experience for Jess, and opened bud after bud of her being. How her eyes sparkled at the wonderful things she saw in the shop windows! The superintendent and his wife took pains to show her whatever might excite interest or quicken ambition, and not many things escaped her vigilant eyes. The great buildings and cozy cottages were so unlike the little brown cabins people lived in up at the Flats; and the women and little girls looked so beautiful with their ribbons and feathers and nicely fitting clothes. Jess never wearied of watching the people go by, and not once did she see a woman smoking.

The greatest event of all was the visit to the public schools. The superintendent took her through ever so many rooms filled with children, and they were doing such wonderful things, what, she had not the smallest idea, for she had never been to school a day in her life before. But she said very little about it, for thinking very much about it, and spent the entire evening in looking at the books in the superintendent's library, though she could not read a single word in one of them.

Late that night the old gentleman and his wife were awakened by sounds of sobbing coming from Jess's room, and the good woman hurried to see what the trouble was. She found Jess curled up into a little heap in the middle of her bed, crying as hard, yet as softly, as ever she could. For a time nothing could be learned from the child as to what the trouble was, who only sobbed the harder for the caressing and motherly comforting; but by and by her reserve was broken through and her trouble all came out.

"I want to learn to read," she said, her bosom heaving, her breath coming in great gasps; and though the confession wounded her pride not a little, "I want we-uns ter be like you-uns—oh! oh! oh!"

It seemed the child's heart must burst its bonds, so hard it beat, so great her distress; but the good mother of children grown pressed her tight to her own bosom, gray locks mingling with brown, and tears streaming down furrowed cheeks as well as fair; for the enormity of the child's deprivation weighed upon the motherly heart oppressively. She promised to teach Jess to read before she went home if Jess would try very hard to learn, and the child's paroxysms of grief at once gave place to large-eyed, rapturous joy.

"I declare, Josiah," the wife exclaimed upon returning to their room, "it is a burning shame that those heathen up at Wilkerson's Flats are allowed to act as they do. The idea of their living in a country for twenty blessed years without so much as teaching a child its alphabet! It is a disgrace to the county, and I wonder that you allow it. There is that child, as bright as ever a child was, breaking her heart because she cannot read and dress and be like other children, and her people be like other people. You really ought to make them build a schoolhouse, Josiah, and support a school. You can bring it about in some way if you set your mind to it, I know; and you will deserve to lose your office if you do not. I'll work against your re-election myself. I declare I will if you don't take those people in hand."

"That settles it," the old gentleman answered, laughing; "but really, Mother, I do not know whether anything can be done with those people or not. I exhausted every argument I knew long years ago. They are a strange people. They came from down in the White River country somewhere, and the War stripped them of about all they had. The War was a great mystery to them, and they never understood what it was all about; but they did understand that the people who made the war, on both sides, were educated people, so they concluded that education must be a very bad thing indeed, and as for them they would have none of it. When the war was over they gathered up what remained of their effects and traveled west, to seek an asylum from educational, not religious, intolerance, and it cannot be denied that they have found it."

"I am afraid that nothing can be done for them, Mother," he said, with a yawn. "Persuasion will not reach them, and if ever anything is accomplished it will have to be through some sort of compulsion; and I'll try compulsion if ever an opportunity offers." And the good superintendent turned over and dropped into restful slumber on the strength of his newly formed resolution to try compulsion if ever an opportunity offered.

Such an opportunity did offer itself, and most unexpectedly. Few of the settlers at Wilkerson's Flats had perfected titles to their lands, and squatters began to take advantage of their neglect. They suddenly found themselves in danger of being divested of their homesteads, and, knowing no one else to whom to turn, came to honest Josiah Bartlett for aid and counsel. He gave, but not without condition. He exacted a solemn pledge that, in case they were successful in retaining their homes, Wilkerson's Flats should be organized into a school district, a school-house built and teacher employed. The conditions were thought to be hard, but their need was great, and, after fullest deliberation, the promise was given and the superintendent put them in the way of straightening out their land titles—a matter of no great difficulty.

This was great news for Jess, and came to her while yet under Mrs. Bartlett's tutelage. She studied every waking moment, almost, and with so much success that she could read, by spelling out, almost anything at all easy when her visit ended.

When the wagon which was to take Jess home was ready to start, a package of books was put in, elementary school-books, mainly, which had cumbered the superintendent's closet. What a comfort those books were to Jess during the long months which intervened before the opening of school no one but Jess herself will ever know; but many of the words were strange and conveyed little meaning to the child's mind, and there was no one in the settlement who could help her, and she had counted the days and even the hours until the teacher might be expected.

The building of the schoolhouse occasioned much talk in the settlement, and not a few of the older heads were shaken dubiously. There were many who "lowed" no good would come of it; but their promise had been given, and with these simple people a promise made was as good as a bond executed. The schoolhouse was built, the superintendent himself coming to the Flats to select the site and secure the adoption of suitable plans for the structure. When at last the work was done one thing at least could be said to the credit of the Flats. It had as pretty and well-appointed a rural schoolhouse as there was in the county, and scarcely a nail had been driven without Jess's having witnessed the operation.

(To be Continued)

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

The school census of Stockton shows the number of children in that city between the ages of five and seventeen years to be 3,776.

There are 2,610 children between the ages of five and seventeen years in Santa Cruz according to the school census.

The Humboldt Times has issued a 56-page "promotion edition" which is calculated to do much good for Eureka and Humboldt County in general.

The Gilroy Hotel, which, as travelers will remember, was located opposite the Southern Pacific depot, was burned last week, as were two Japanese stores adjoining it.

Dr. Samuel T. Black, during the last twelve years president of the State Normal School at San Diego, has resigned.

Although the Los Angeles Express moved into its own home but eight years ago, it already has outgrown it, and is about to move into a new and larger building which has been constructed for it.

About ten miles south of Chico 800 acres of ripe grain recently were burned over. The loss is estimated at $40,000, with some insurance.

SHEAR WIT

A stingy angler was fishing on a Scottish loch on a pouring wet day. He had been consoling himself from his flask and forgetting his gillie. Presently he asked the gillie if there was a dry place in the boat on which to strike a match. "You might try my throat," said the gillie. "It's dry enough!"—Fishing Gazette.

Even the brightest boy in the class can be scared into stupidity by the wrong kind of teacher. "You boy over in the corner!" cried the man behind the desk. The boy over in the corner shot up like a bolt. "Answer this," continued the examiner. "Do we eat the flesh of the whale?" "Y-y-yes, sir," faltered the scholar. "And what," pursued the examiner, "do we do with the bones?" "P-please, sir," responded the boy, "we l-leave them on the s-s-sides of our p-plates."—Answers.

A young college man, city bred and reared, says Success, answered the call for harvest hands in Kansas. Reaching a farm house late at night, he was promised work and assigned to a room. It seemed to him that he had hardly fallen asleep when he was asked to get up. Disgustedly, the young man dressed himself in the darkness, and, picking up his grip, walked downstairs. "Say, there, young fellow," said the farmer, trying to be helpful, "you don't need to take your valise out to the field with you." "I know it," replied the young man tartly. "I'm going to look for a place to stay all night."

Occasionally the fashionable English breakfast parties of a generation ago were not a success from the point of view of some of the guests. A foreign artist, for example, who once felt flattered by an invitation to breakfast with Whistler, was subsequently asked if he had lately seen anything of that militant immortal. "Ah, no, not now so much," he replied, and proceeded to explain as follows: "He ask me a leetle while ago to breakfast, and I go. My cab fare, two shillings, 'alf crown. I arrive, very nice. Gold fish in bowl, very pretty. But breakfast—one egg, one toast, no more! Ah, no! My cab fare, two shillings, 'alf crown. For me no more."—London Chronicle.

Gen. Stewart L. Woodford has a unique way of avoiding after-dinner speaking when called on at a late hour. "I always have a speech ready for impromptu delivery when I am called on unaware," he says. "But I hesitate to deliver it. I delivered it in St. Petersburg during the reign of the uncle of the present Czar, and the next morning his Imperial Majesty was assassinated. I delivered it in Madrid and war broke out soon afterward between Spain and the United States. I gave it in Germany and the American insurance companies were expelled from the Fatherland. The last occasion on which I delivered it in this country was followed by the panic of 1907. You can understand why I hesitate to deliver it to-night."—New York Times.

Francis Wilson, the comedian, said at a dinner in New York apropos of the law that forbade the performance of his play, "The Bachelor's Baby": "The law against child labor is an excellent one, but it is an abuse of this law to forbid children, properly protected, to appear on the stage. The best of things are open to abuse, you know. Even prayer meetings; William Spargus rose in prayer meeting one night and said he desired to tell the dear friends present of the great change of heart that had come over him, so that he now forgave, fully and freely, Deacon Jones for the horse he had sold him. Deacon Jones was too shocked at first to reply. He soon recovered himself, however, and he rose in his pew and said: 'I am, indeed, glad, dear Christian friends, to have gained Brother Spargus' forgiveness, but all the same he ain't paid me for the hoss yet.'"

PERSONALIA

Mme. Rejane says she always seeks out the face of a child in the audience and plays to it.

Francis Wilson has invested $40,000 of his earnings as actor and author of "The Bachelor's Baby" in a private golf course on his 170-acre estate near Lake Mahopac, New York.

Miss A. Van Dyke of San Francisco, who has been a pupil of Jean de Reszke for the last three years, has been engaged to sing at Covent Garden. She so pleased Harry Higgins when she sang for him recently that he is arranging for her debut in "I Pagliacci."

Miss Jane A. Delano, superintendent of the army nurses' corps, has reported to the American Society of Superintendents of Training Schools for Nurses that nearly 10,000 nurses have already been enrolled as members of the corps. Miss Delano was at one time superintendent of nurses in Bellevue Hospital. She makes her headquarters in Washington but will leave shortly to make a tour of inspection through the hospitals of the Philippines.

Miss Margaret Anglin's appearance in the "Antigone" at the Greek theater of the University of California has been set for the night of Thursday, June 30. George Riddle is producing the tragedy; Percy Anderson of London has designed the costumes in the primitive Greek style; Prof. Fred Wolle of the California University will direct a symphony orchestra for the music which Mendelssohn wrote for the tragedy. Miss Anglin is bringing several actors from New York for this one performance.

Mrs. Charles Netcher of Chicago is acting manager and owner with her children of one of the largest department stores in the world. The store covers fifteen acres of floor space, represents an investment of more than $15,000,000 and employs upward of 3,000 persons. Six years ago when her husband died the store occupied an old building. Mrs. Netcher has replaced it with a fireproof structure more than five times as large as the old one. Besides managing her store, Mrs. Netcher is bringing up three sons and a daughter.

Senator Nelson W. Aldrich is to become a farmer. He is to head the Warwick Farm Company, which has been incorporated in Providence, R. I., by the senator and two of his sons, Stuart M. and Richard S. Aldrich. Under the articles of association which have been filed at the Secretary of State's office the newly organized company has the right to go into the real estate business not only in Rhode Island but in any other state. Other activities of the company will be the raising for sale of all kinds of farm products, cattle and poultry. The capital stock of the Warwick Farm Company is placed at $10,000 with shares at $100 each.

FOR SALE—Complete set, from first year, of 108 volumes Harper's Magazine, bound in cloth and morocco; excellent condition. Address Dr. L. C. Marshall, Vacaville, Cal.

Ross Valley Real Estate

$90—Lots for a few days. So many people were delighted with the unique grandeur of Los Lomas Terrace at last Sunday's auction that I have determined to make a few more sacrifices in my educational campaign.

Many hundreds of visiting people were amazed to find such natural forests of redwood, madrone, etc., so close to San Francisco, and only 4 minutes from trains. It was hard for them to realize there was such a rustic spot so near.

$1000—4-room furnished cottage. Terms like rent.

$175—Lots, 5 minutes from station, Stadium and Speedway, in the heart of Kentfield, on established street, sewer, water, all conveniences of city, gas will be in soon. Street lights, without the usual towering municipal bond issue and high taxes.

$1100—4-room furnished cottages, same location.

These properties were taken in a deal at a great bargain and must be sold.

Terms 20 per cent cash, balance 36 monthly payments.

J. E. LEWIS, Kentfield.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of HELEN S. TRIPP, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON, Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910. W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate.

6-3-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF GEORGE CHILDS, DECEASED. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administrator, at the office of W. H. Payson, room 1700, Claus Spreckels Building, southeast corner Market and Third streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

RUFUS H. CHILDS, Administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, June 10, 1910. W. H. PAYSON, attorney for estate.

6-10-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of IRENE A. CONNER, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700 Claus Spreckels Building, southwest corner of Market and Third Streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON, Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910. W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate.

6-3-5t

NOTICE TO STOCKHOLDERS OF GIGANTE MINING COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in accordance with a resolution of the Board of Directors of Gigante Mining Company, duly adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, held on the 31st day of March, 1910, a special meeting of the stockholders of Gigante Mining Company will be held on the 14th day of June, 1910, at the hour of two o'clock P. M. of that day, at Room 269 in the Russ Building, on the west line of Montgomery street between Pine and Bush streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the principal place of business, and the office of said corporation, and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet. That the object and purpose of said Stockholders' Meeting is to take into consideration and then and there act upon a proposition to increase the capital stock of said Gigante Mining Company by the amount of $25,000.00, that is to say, from $100,000.00, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each, its present capital stock, to $125,000.00, divided into 125,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each.

Dated at San Francisco, California, the 31st day of March, 1910.

AUG. WATERMAN, Secretary of Gigante Mining Company.

4-8-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Nomination By Petition

As many times explained, government, where there is any measure of self government, is generally by and through political parties, and nearly all voters belong to, or affiliate more or less closely with, some political party. But there are those who either do not find any political party going their way, or else the nucleus of a political party to which they belong has not yet been able to cast as many as three per cent of the total vote cast at the previous election. In such cases the only way left for a candidate for office to get his name on a regular election ticket that he may be voted for is by petition, not at all a bad way of being nominated.

Where a person wishes to run for an office, and has no political party to nominate him, the law virtually forces him to create such a party in order to be nominated that his name may have a place on the ticket. He can give it any name he wishes to give it, or call it by his own name, and those who make up his party must sign their names to a paper certifying the facts in the case and must make oath to it when signed. And there must be enough of them to equal three per cent of the total vote cast in the state, county or district to which the office relates.

The petitioners may appoint, of their own number, a committee of not less than seven or more than twenty-five, to act as the committee of this new party and to have in charge the interests of their candidate. In order to be valid petitioners they must not have signed the petition of any one else for the same office, or participated in the primary election for the nomination of a candidate for such an office. These petitions must be on separate pieces of paper and treated as nomination papers are treated under the direct primary law.

The county clerk to whom these certificates of nomination, or petitions, are presented must verify them just as he would verify nomination papers, disregarding all signers who are not qualified voters, and if he find the requisite number of bonafide names of electors on the petition of any candidate he must place his name on the general election ballot. In fine, the proceeding in all essential respects, even to the power to appoint special verification deputies, is the counterpart of the proceeding for placing the name of a candidate for nomination on the primary election ballot.

The direct primary law has no purpose to shut incipient political parties out of taking a chance at popular favor at a general election. Electors of similar minds may come together in number no greater than five, name an entire state ticket, adopt a party name and, by filing a document embracing these facts with the county clerk, together with a statement that they desire to proceed to secure the requisite signatures of electors to nominate their ticket, secure the appointment of one verification deputy to each 500 voters in the field to be covered, and proceed with their work of getting 3 per cent of the voters, who have not helped to nominate other candidates to nominate their own. If it were as easy to make a political party live as to start a new one, we should have as many political parties as religious sects or secret orders.

When the county clerk comes to form the general election ballot he will begin at the left hand and place the ticket of the political party that cast the largest vote at the preceding election and, next to that, in parallel column, the ticket of the party that cast the next largest vote, and so on until all the tickets of all the parties that had tickets in the field at the last election are provided for.

This done, he will place the tickets of such new political parties as may have been created under the system of nominating by petition or, if no full tickets have been placed in the field by petition, then such independent nominations as may have been made by petition, placing the name of the nominee opposite the names of the nominees for the same office on the party tickets. At the head of the independent nominations columns will be placed the party circle so that a voter may vote for all the independent nominees in a lump if he desires to do so.

While government is by party, and political parties must be very large and have an immense constituency in order to hope to assume the control of government, yet it is difficult to see wherein the election laws of California discriminate against the member of a small party or of no party. If a candidate for office cannot get as many as 3 per cent of the total electorate to join in nominating him as many of his friends as wish to do so may write his name in the proper place on their ballots and so elect him, anyhow, if there be enough of them.

The Shuberts announce that they have a new play by George Broadhurst and three by Eugene Walter, one of which, "Boots and Saddles," was put on as "Sergeant James" at the Boston theater several years ago.

W. A. Brady announces that he has added the following players to his list of stars: James K. Hackett, Arnold Daly, Henry E. Dixey, Miss Amelia Bingham, Miss Virginia Harned, Andrew Mack and Guy Bates Post. Mr. Hackett will revive "The Corsican Brothers," it is said, and Arnold Daly is to be offered as Hamlet, among other plays, new and old. Mr. Post will appear in Sheldon's "The Nigger" by arrangement with the New Theater Company. The others will appear in plays along the lines of their past performances.

Mme. Bernhardt has begun an acting tour which will keep her ten months away from Paris. She plays first in the French provinces in "L'Aiglon," "Le Procès de Jeanne d'Arc" and "Dame aux Camélias," the three roles which are the least effort for her. She is to play right through to Brussels, then strike south through Luxembourg, Switzerland, and the south of France, reaching Paris again about July 1. After that she takes a brief respite at Bel Isle before crossing the Atlantic.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary . . . $50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary . . . 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE

Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.
1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Har. Ford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

This Week: "NEEDS OF THE CALIFORNIA INDIAN"

—By Hugh W. Gilchrist

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: JUNE 17: '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH·GOOD COURAGE·GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00. In Advance. No. 30.

Home Again

WHEN JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER RETURNED from Europe members of his family were at the pier to greet him. When Pierpont Morgan returns from abroad his coachman stands by the open door to close it after him, and then he rumbles away. When the late E. H. Harriman returned the newspaper fellows went down the bay to get a story out of him. This was the homage that a nation paid to millions! Tomorrow, when Theodore Roosevelt steps from the Kaiserin Auguste, it will be to be greeted by the mayor of his city, the governor of his state, the President of the nation, the populace of the metropolis of the nation and the nation itself, if not in all cases in person, then by other evidences whose sincerity cannot be questioned. And why? Because he is a human man, like as we are, and yet inspired by a dauntless zeal for the well-being of his race and with a capacity for work hard to do but needful to be done. Search history as one may and a fellow to this home-coming cannot be found. It means that the nation knows the difference between greatness and greed, loftiness of ideals and ability to grab. A wonderful spectacle, wonderfully instructive. It should do much to rectify the aspirations of America's young manhood.

Seven Millions and a Half

CONGRESS IS REPORTED to have said, in effect, that the American city that would have the celebration of the completion of the Panama canal must first pledge itself to raise seven and a half millions of dollars as a guaranty to the nations that, if they are to be represented there, the result will be worth their while. That is not an unreasonable requirement or difficult of fulfillment. Lucky that Congress did not require that San Francisco first put her big rascals in prison and her hoodlums out of municipal office!

Shame's Crown of Shame

WHAT SAN FRANCISCAN READ the fulminations of the city's mayor, telegraphed from Chicago, without blushing to the roots of his hair and to the backs of his ears? And how like him it was! Nothing counterfeit about that! Be it remembered that San Francisco is indebted for this intolerable affliction, for this putting its capacity for feeling ashamed to the final test, to that organized villainism that has assumed to govern San Francisco and all California for more than a generation. The humiliation is galling, but shame's crown of shame is the consciousness that the infliction is well deserved.

The Merchants of San Francisco

THEY ARE A PATIENT and long-suffering brotherhood, these "merchants of San Francisco." When it was sought to hale before justice malefactors of great wealth, and punish them for their crimes, the arm of the law was holden with the admonition: "You must not. It will hurt business. We speak in the name of the 'merchants of San Francisco.'" When it was proposed to turn night into day and spread the tenderloin abroad in the city the authorities were sanctioned in so doing in the name of the "merchants of San Francisco." When, on Wednesday of this week, the Governor of the State took a hand in stopping a much advertised prize fight a prominent hotel-keeper immediately declared: "We must protest. I shall at once call a meeting of the 'merchants of San Francisco.'" Now San Francisco has merchants who know no god but gain, understand no symbol but the sign of the dollar, but they are one in ten of the "merchants of San Francisco." The habit of justifying every iniquity by making appeal in the name of the "merchants of San Francisco" is slanderous. Is it not about time for the "merchants of San Francisco" to make their voices heard in defense of their own honor? In Japan the merchant class has ever swarmed the bottom rung in the social ladder. There are workers in iniquity who, if unhindered, may duplicate that condition here.

Knox and the Arbitral Court

SECRETARY PHILANDER C. KNOX has again announced the practical acceptance on the part of the great nations of the earth of America's proposal that a permanent arbitral court be maintained at The Hague. God grant that the acceptance be not for politeness' sake, but in sincerity and truth! Next to the millstone of vested greed that hangs about the neck of the world there is none other so heavy to bear as the dead weight of ever impending, but seldom occurring, war. That achievement alone, once placed beyond peradventure, will suffice to redeem the Taft administration from ignominy if nothing else does and to make the names of Taft and Knox imperishable.

Pay of Professors

IT HAS SEEMINGLY BEEN the philosophy of the State University management that two hundred-dollar men in the teaching force are to be preferred to one two-hundred-dollar man. If the purpose be to cheapen education and make the university a huge secondary school, that policy persistently adhered to will reach the goal. Without being unmindful of the pressure of numbers upon the resources of university subsistence, let it never be forgotten, by president or regents, that nothing the youth of California can receive at the hands of cheap instructors can make up to them the impoverishment of failing to come into reciprocal relations with first-class minds.

Register

WHAT A CATASTROPHE IT WILL PROVE, if after all the effort being put forth by Hiram Johnson and his associates, and the sterling spirits of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, to redeem California from corporation control, that effort fail merely because thousands of men, real men, throughout the state, men who love liberty and would die for it if the need were, had failed to register and so to qualify themselves to vote! That is the danger to the cause of freedom in this state and the only remaining danger. The enemy is counting on it. Not a son of the slums or male habitue of the tenderloin of the whole state will fail of being registered that he may vote against Johnson and for suzerainty to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, but there will be many thousand men, real men, whose indifference and inertia will put them out of the fighting. Every man who has not registered since January 1, 1910, and does not register on or before July 26, and as a Republican, will be debarred from voting for Johnson and a free commonwealth when the primaries are held, and this year the primary election will be The Election. Pass this along.

It Should Have Been Plain Enough

It should have been plain enough to the Men of San Francisco that this city is in no position further to outrage the moral sense of this nation. That the city has done admirably in the work of its material rehabilitation will but poorly furnish absolution for that moral delinquency that acquitted successful rascality merely because it was committed by successful men. To add to this record of shame at the time that this city is a suppliant of Congress, both for a source of water supply in the Sierras and for governmental recognition as the place to hold an exposition in honor of the completion of the Panama canal, would be as unintelligent as to strike a blow with the expectation of receiving a kiss in return. The moral sense of the nation has revolted against such exhibitions as that proposed to take place in this city between a grizzly and a gorilla in order that a disreputable crowd may be drawn here to spend its money.

It was in vain that decency in San Francisco looked to that organized and all too successful indecency that controls the government of the city, an element in our life, by no means in majority, that regards the half-world of Paris as the acme of urban excellence, that element to whom the word "Paris" connotes nothing of literature or of art, of beauty or of scientific achievement, but only of a "hot time," and a place where champagne and absinthe flow as flows beer in San Francisco, and bedizened females expose their charms in public. It was in vain that the spirit of decency looked to that element to ward off the impending disgrace. It not only refused to use its authority to prevent it, but formally and publicly invited the "contest" as an intellectual diversion, desirable within itself and to be obtained if possible.

When the cause of decency seemed lost, when San Francisco seemed foredoomed to expose its vulnerable side to the resentments of an outraged nation, there came, as lightning from a clear sky, the command of Governor Gillett to the Attorney General to stop the fight.

It were ungenerous to look too searchingly into the gubernatorial reasons for an eleventh-hour interference. Repeatedly the Governor had washed his hands of this affair, as he did of the movement to outlaw the race-track evil. It is well that gubernatorial hands be washed upon occasion with suds, but from Pontius Pilate to James Gillett no man in authority ever escaped moral responsibility by washing of the hands. The taint of moral cowardice will not out.

It were better had executive action been taken weeks ago, but better at the eleventh hour than not at all. The public will forgive the delay. The fight promoters are not so likely to. It can hardly be doubted that the determining factor was the alternative of losing the Panama Exposition to New Orleans or foregoing the fight. The choice made does not rest upon grounds of the highest morality, but upon grounds of reason and judgment that no social upheaval will shake.

What will the courts do? Is it indispensable that the august supreme court of the commonwealth must first define that a fight is a fight? What any "kid" on the street may know to a never-to-be-shaken certainty may cause our highest court to stumble, but to the mind not enmeshed in hoary subtleties the Governor's letter of direction to the Attorney General is unanswerable. San Francisco has had no sparring matches. If there had been no one would have gone across the street and paid a dime to see one. They have been fights one and all, and promoters and participants should have "done time" for felony for "pulling them off."

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News items and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

In justice to executive and judiciary let it be admitted that the statute in such cases made and provided is not as explicit as it should be. Section 7 of article V of the constitution declares that, "The Governor shall see that the laws are faithfully executed," but legislation has not gone as far as it should in giving him power to execute them. Although the opening for executive interference with the threatened desecration of Independence Day is neither as deep as a well nor as broad as a barn door, it may be made to suffice if Attorney General and courts are disposed to defend the name and fame of San Francisco. We have faith to believe that they will prove themselves loyal to the trust reposed in them.

The Indian

It may not be a great misfortune not to be born. Anyhow, it is a misfortune not likely seriously to be felt, and the death of the "Amerindian" race is like enough to be accomplished by that means; but it is a very different thing to be born only to be preyed upon by unscrupulous men, to be ravaged with disease, wasted by poverty, blighted by evil habits too strong to be resisted. That has been the misfortune of the American Indian. He has had little chance to prove his right to survive. Perhaps he cannot. It may be that he has no such right and that the denial of it is written in the warp and woof of his being. Of that we cannot tell and may not determine, but this we do know: the Indian should have his chance. There is a moral obligation resting upon those of us whose progenitors passed through some thousands of years of savagery akin to his, and whose emergence therefrom was not so long ago as to justify exaltation of mind or pride of ancestry, to see to it that he gets that chance. Our "backbone" article this week deals with the case of the California Indian. It is commended to all those whose hearts and pockets can be touched by such an interest. Who knows but this once virile, lithe-limbed, stalwart, courageous race has a right to live and to become a helpful factor in human history?

Statue to Will S. Green

He was no captain of industry or master of men. He was not one whom the unheeding would call great. Every dollar he ever owned came to him as an incident and not as an object. His purpose was to serve. Had he given the thought and time and patient endeavor to the acquisition of Sacramento Valley lands that he gave, without heeding what it was costing him in vitality, in solicitude, in anxiety that the people of that valley should be happy, should have children born to them, have roofs of their own over their heads and well kept farms to leave to posterity,—had he been a grabber, he might have died a great landowner, to parcel out great estates for his children to contend over, but in that case no one would have suggested that a statue be erected in his memory. There is such a movement under way. It has been too long delayed. The sod should not have been permitted to encroach upon the ground broken for his grave ere the men of his county had taken this enterprise in hand. He was an Abraham Lincoln type of man without knowing it. Therefore, let the statue to the memory of Will S. Green be made life size, as unkempt as he was, eye upon the stars, the common good his goal. He was one of the master builders of this commonwealth and, even though he built the best he knew, he built better than he knew. Not too much of honor can be paid to the unselfish career of Will S. Green of Colusa.

The Margin of Safety

It is hard to believe that men will knowingly sell for food that which is unfit to be eaten, but we do know that they will. Without laws to forbid, and heavy penalties for the enforcement of such laws, babies would be furnished a mixture of milk, water and chalk, stale at that; sawdust would be sold as cereals, grease as butter and gelatine and grass seeds as the product of orchard and berry garden. To the certainty of the crime of cupidity must be added the risk of ignorance on the part of those who deal in meat products. It became necessary for the United States government to certify the healthfulness of meats for export in order to prevent the annihilation of the export trade in American meats. As a result of this the only market for diseased animals is the home market, and who doubts that every such animal finds a market? The time will come when no animal will be allowed to be slaughtered for food without inspection. It is so now in Germany and should be so here. The time will come, too, when, the better to protect the consuming public from disease, the slaughtering will all be done in concrete, public abattoirs as easily sterilized as an operating room in a hospital. Meantime, the least that can be done to safeguard the public is to require rigid inspection. The city that does not so protect its citizens cannot be commended as a fit place of residence. Let there be no temporizing. It will cost, but what profit will there be in escaping the meat inspector only to run into the arms of the undertaker?

Enthusiasm of a Young Republican

The attention of the reader is called to a communication, elsewhere in this paper, from Mr. Rolfe Thompson, a young attorney of Santa Rosa. It is a thing to warm the hearts of those whose spirits are not weighed down by the cupidity of the few and the stupid indifference of the many to those things which concern their own social salvation and that of their children.

Optimism is good if it be not the optimism of unconcern, that optimism which owes its cheerful existence neither to faith in God nor man, but to selfish indifference to both God and man. Then it is not good. It is ignoble, brutish, the optimism of the ox oblivious alike to the history of his race and to his own refrigerated, desiccated, canned or barreled destiny. Such optimism is to be met with everywhere, every day. It is cheap and unsatisfying.

But that optimism which comes of having found something to which one may pin his faith in better things for the race, in the establishment of justice, in industrial freedom, in the Rights of Man; that optimism which comes of having found the gospel of glad tidings and disciples ready and willing to carry its banner without material recompense, those solid characters who can be depended on to "swear to their own hurt and change not" if the best interests of humanity require it—that kind of optimism, the kind which young Thompson has found, we cannot have too much of it.

For, be it remembered, there are patient delvers in history searching for the laws of human society. Some of these tell us that only the fittest have survived while the weak and lowly have ever been trampled into the mire that the strong might climb up; that feudalism changes its forms, but not its essential character, and that it dominates the history of mankind; that society resolves itself into ascendant and descendant classes, whether in republics or in monarchies; that the many toil early and late for so much as will suffice to keep soul and body together while the few live in luxurious, licentious ease until they destroy themselves as they have destroyed others, both to be succeeded by red-blooded, barbarian hordes, beastly but brave, who destroy, ravish and burn until upon the wreckage of the past they begin the repetition of a new cycle of effort to reach Utopia, an effort foredoomed to failure. Acceptance of this philosophy of human society takes all the hope, all the nerve, all the fight out of a man.

This we do know: aggression unresisted, access to nature's bounties walled in and made hereditary, laws enacted for the spoiling of the many and for the benefit of the privileged few, these things must and will result in endless repetition of cycles of hopeless endeavor, the very contemplation of which makes the heart sick.

What Rolfe Thompson has found other young men may find if they will take the trouble to look for them.—a body of faith-cherishing men, able as well as willing, men who believe in free government and will fight and work for just laws; men who ask no special privilege for themselves and will grant none to others; men who believe that the history of Asia and of Europe need not be repeated in America and who are determined that, God willing, it shall not. Such men, standing for such measures, are both an inspiration and a prophecy, an inspiration to renewed effort for the common good and a prophecy that such effort shall not have been put forth in vain. The insurgency of the East and Middle West, and the Lincoln-Rooseveltism of California, constitute the most hopeful sign of our times and challenge the enthusiasm and the championship of every young man with an ideal above that made manifest in the propensity to grab.

The Case Summed Up

The charge against Secretary Ballinger was that by reason of his associations and sentiments he was out of accord with the policy of conservation of our nation's resources for the benefit of The People as a whole, and therefore unfit to be Secretary of the Interior.

The purpose of bringing Ballinger to book on those charges was strategic. It was scarcely with the hope or expectation of convicting him before a court constituted by those friendly to him. The purpose was to forestall and prevent the alienation to great syndicates of any more of The People's sources of wealth and livelihood, with the result that The People ever after may be mulcted for the necessities of life to the extreme of what the traffic can bear. The purpose was to put that issue up to The People so hard that its determination cannot be postponed.

Respect for manhood would make it seem certain that the committee before whom these issues were formally tried will bring in a verdict that the American public can accept as without partisanship, upon honor and with an intellectual capability that will not leave room for two opinions.

But the intellectual capability of the committee is the only unchallenged attribute of that committee. It was not a jury of fools or of emotional neurotics to be wheedled out of their sober senses by cunning petifoggery, yet few expect an honest verdict from it. It would not be a dangerous hazard to forestall the committee's action by undertaking to write out the substance of the findings in advance of their being made and to align the members of the committee on their respective sides. The verdict will be rendered not so much on party lines as upon lines of loyalty to the common good or adherence to predatory financial interests, although the disposition to stand by, or to discredit, the existing administration of government will not be wholly absent from the judgment rendered. These very general expectations regarding the findings of this committee discount those findings and render them unimportant. Appeal is taken to the American people and the verdict that will stand will be the one that the people will render.

Nevertheless, a summary of facts proven may not be out of place. If Glavis had held his peace the Guggenheims would have secured the Cunningham claims before this. They may get them yet, but if they do it will damn beyond hope the administration that suffers it.

Ballinger has shown himself malignant, shifty, irresolute and ill-disposed toward the policy of conservation, and his associations and connections were of the spoilers and not of the preservers.

The treatment of Glavis by the President, his Secretary of the Interior and Attorney General, was high-handed, ruthless and unjust, and his treatment by the underlings of those departments was in accord with that meted out by their superiors.

The order of the President which Gifford Pinchot disregarded, when he gave to Senator Dolliver information that Dolliver desired and the public was entitled to receive, was an order not fit to be made and there was more of glory in its being disregarded by Pinchot than in its being vindicated by Taft, and yet, after the first false step had been taken by the President, neither could have done differently from what he did. The loyalty of the President to his subordinates in difficulty is the only feature of it all that reflects credit upon him, or makes claim of sympathy for him; even that is suggestive of the fatuous.

And yet Richard Achilles Ballinger has been proven guilty of no crime, that is, of no statutory offense. The great crimes against humanity are committed in accordance with the statute, not in contravention of it. Those land laws which made it possible for the United States Steel Corporation to possess itself of three-fourths of the iron ore on the continent were crimes, but they were lawful. The Aldrich-Payne tariff bill is a crime, but it is law; the slaughtering of our forests, the massacring of our railroad trainmen, the making of the earth to tremble by the marching of great armies and the booming of great navies—all these things are crimes against the generation that is and generations yet to come, but they are in contravention of no statute. There is a higher law than is written in the books and by that law R. A. Ballinger is guilty of wrong intent, but, thanks to Glavis and Pinchot, Garfield and the other "conspirators," the trap was sprung before he could carry his intention out. For which glory be to God! The consuming mass has another chance for its life.

Hichborn's History

Of the men who are, or are soon to be, up for election, many have made records in the last session of the legislature, records that determine fully their fitness for the trust. These records are arranged in unmistakable clarity in Franklin Hichborn's "Story of the California Legislature of 1909." Every voter should have this book, and base his vote upon it wherever possible.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

We have been hearing a good deal in recent years of probation as applied to those who have transgressed the law. Some believe in it and some do not, but it is coming to be a factor in our civic life. There are those stern, unflinching personalities to whom retribution appeals more strongly than mercy. They are glad when someone, not kin to them, gets roundly come up with for his fault and is given the full limit of the law. They think that it serves him right. Very likely it does.

And we have to admit that nature herself shows small compassion for those who undertake to break one of nature's laws. No one really ever does quite that. Nature's laws are unbreakable. They are always just as sound after a person has done his best to break one as before, but the would-be breaker is not unlikely to come off broken or seriously discomfited. In the physical world we deal with things inexorable. Fire will burn, water drown and tornadoes blow us away.

But if we found probation nowhere in our travels through life our sojourn would be short and not too sweet. Probation is trying-out. Take that factor out of life and there would be precious little left. From morning till night, all the week through, all the year through, and all through life, we are trying ourselves out. If we fall short of our goal the very first thing we do, if we can, is to give ourselves another chance. The writer of this is trying himself out on this week's installment of the "Deeper Significance of Living." If, after the thing is written, and has laid over a day or so to cool off, or to season a bit, so that he can judge of it in some degree impersonally—if, then, it does not seem to have the right ring to it, the writer of it will remedy it here and there if he can and, if he cannot, into the waste basket it will go and he will give himself another chance. As a writer he is a probationer. Every subscriber to The California Weekly takes it on probation and, if enough of them are kind enough and merciful enough to give the staff another chance about fifty-two times a year, the paper may get on.

During early childhood the mother places her progeny on probation anywhere from forty to four hundred times a day owing to the degree of activity of the probationer. During school and college years probationary intervals are not rare. If every delinquency were treated as a finality it would go hard with most students.

While probationary marriage has furnished subject matter for discussion, no good way has been found of bringing a probationary period to a respectable and self-respecting termination, with the result that, in most cases and with good people, probation goes right on through life until terminated by death, but it has been in full operation all the while. Times without number each partner has had to give the other a new chance to be more kind.

Now, in view of the probationary character of life, from cradle to grave, in all the activities and relations of life, is there any very evident reason why probation may not work well, in most cases, when applied to those who transgress the written law? As a matter of fact, it does work well in a great percentage of delinquency and criminality. Probation Officer Ruess, of Alameda county, reports that out of forty-two cases entrusted to him only five failed to live up to the terms of probation. It is probable that the greater part of these probationers felt the grip of the law upon their shoulders for the first time and that first time may easily prove their last.

Without probation in its many forms this world of ours would be a very grim reality. Need we wonder, then, that there are those who would part the curtain suspended betwixt this life and the next to see if, perchance, probation may not be as mercifully and as beneficially extended there as here? Of this we may not surely know, but to entertain the hope must mean to many the difference between fond expectation and dark despair.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Superstition Among the Educated

Professor F. B. Dressler of the University of Alabama has been conducting some experiments relating to the prevalence of superstition among students in higher institutions of learning, selecting for his purpose those who are preparing to be teachers, their average age being nineteen years. The number of students investigated was 875, and to these a list of questions covering about 3,000 superstitions was submitted. The number of answers obtained was 7,176, and of these 3,225, or about 45 per cent, confessed complete or partial belief in some superstition. The character of these superstitions is of interest, and so samples from a typical list prepared by the professor are given: Twenty-three believed (either wholly or in part) that hair cut in the new moon will grow better than hair cut at other times, while seven did not so believe; 27 believed, and 29 did not believe, that seeing the new moon over the left shoulder for the first time brings bad luck; 16 believed, and 11 did not believe, that if a bird flies in the window there will be a death in the family; 23 believed, and 17 did not believe, that a dog's howling is a sign of death in the family; that breaking a looking-glass brings bad luck for seven years was believed, in some degree, by 65 and disbelieved by 48; that dropping a dish-rag indicates that company will come was believed by 61 and disbelieved by 77. These are but typical examples, and the answers were given by those who propose to be educators of the next generation. On the whole, perhaps we are not so far away from the dark ages as we have fondly imagined.

Church Membership Increasing

The Census Bureau's special report concerning church membership in the United States now is in press. Its statistics relate to the year 1906, and its comparisons generally are between that year and 1890. The most striking feature of the report, perhaps, is its announcement that there was an increase of church membership in proportion to population during that time, as there also was between 1900 and 1906. As compared with 1890, there was a gain of 90 to each thousand of population in the principal cities, and of 51 to the thousand outside of those cities. It is not surprising to learn that female members outnumber the male in the principal cities by 23.5 per cent and by 32 per cent outside of those limits. The total number of members of all religious bodies, in 1906, was 32,966,884, or about two-fifths of the total population, and of these 20,287,742 were members of the various Protestant denominations, while 12,679,142 were Roman Catholics. That is, the Protestants outnumbered the Catholics nearly 60 per cent, but the latter are one body, while the former are divided into many sects. Of the Catholics, 27.7 per cent were in cities of the first class, while the Protestant percentage in the same cities was but 7.3 per cent. In the five largest cities the proportion of church membership to population is as follows: Boston, 62.6; St. Louis, 46.6; New York, 44.7; Chicago, 40.7; Philadelphia, 38.8. Only the Protestant Episcopal Church reports a majority of its members as residing in principal cities, its proportion there being 51.2.

Edison on Electricity

Thomas A. Edison, in an article recently contributed to Popular Electricity, advises young men not to hesitate about becoming electricians because of fear that the field will be overworked. It is his expert opinion, not only that the field is not overworked, but that we are just entering upon it. He enumerates many instances in which electrical knowledge and its application are certain to be increased. Such an instance is the use of electricity for lighting, heating and cooking, claiming that the appliances for these purposes are yet very defective and are certain to be vastly improved. Concerning the electric motor, he says: "It will not be perfectly utilized until everything we now make with our hands and every mechanical motion can be effected by throwing a switch"—which is stating the case strong, but it must be admitted that Edison comes as near to knowing whereof he speaks as any one who lives or has lived. Then, too, he looks forward to the day when no horse will be allowed within the limits of a city, as electricity will do its work. His electric store—everything to be distributed to customers by electricity—has been much discussed in newspapers of late. On the whole, Mr. Edison makes out an opportunity still wide open to aspiring electricians.

A Ground-Traveling Aeroplane

It was certain to come sooner or later, and it has arrived; the aeroplane which will travel either in the sky or on land is here. That is, it is not exactly here, but it is on the earth and as close to us as Germany. By means of it a traveler can journey along the ground as long as he pleases, and then he can soar upward and play tag with the merry songsters. The people of Berlin were the first to see this aeroplane, which is known as the Græwert, in action, and they were greatly surprised the other day to see it taking a stroll across the city, being propelled by its own screws. At that time it "walked" to the headquarters of the airship battalions, whence it was billed to fly. Thus science progresses. Now let a swimming attachment be added to the aeroplane, and it would seem that perfection will be pretty nearly attained.

Secrets of the French Duel

For a long time now the French duel has added its appreciable modicum to the hilarity of the nations, but it has remained for a French newspaper to reveal its true inwardness. This it has done by issuing a published description of how fatal results are avoided and the mortality tables left unscathed. Here are some of the methods it describes: Sometimes a bullet that looks like lead, but crumbles when fired from a pistol, is used. Again, the wad may be left out, so that the doughty champions of honor need but lower the muzzles of their pistols and the bullet drops out, making it quite safe to shoot. In yet another instance only a third of the right amount of powder is used. A death-defier is a pistol fitted with a secret valve through which the bullet drops. In more serious cases a bullet smaller than the caliber of the pistol is used, thus rendering severe wounds improbable. By such means is sacred honor vindicated, safety assured, the taste of the coffee made agreeable, and all is sweetly harmonious, and this is as things should be in connection with a French duel.

Casualties on Railroads

The Versicherungs Zeitung, a leading German insurance journal, publishes statistics relating to casualties on railroads which are of interest outside of Germany. Its statistics, which are based on latest reports, show that among every million travelers a year casualties occur as follows in various countries: Germany, 0.08 killed, 0.39 injured; Austria-Hungary, 0.12 killed, 0.96 injured; France, 0.13 killed, 0.18 injured; Great Britain, 0.14 killed, 1.95 injured; Switzerland, 0.15, 1.12; Belgium, 0.22, 3.02; United States, 0.45, 6.58; Russia, 2.24, 11.63. Adding the killed and injured in each instance so as to get the total casualties, and we have the United States 15 to Germany's one, seven to Austria-Hungary's one, 22 to France's one, three and one-half to Great Britain's one, six to Switzerland's one, and two to Belgium's one. Not a very cheering situation to face, but then there is Russia, with her two to our one. It is a great consolation to look upon Russia at such a time. At the same time, it would be yet more consolatory if our railroads would cultivate a habit of killing or maiming a great many less of our citizens annually.

Larger Steamships Being Built

The Lusitania and the Mauretania, each of nearly 35,000 tons burden, now are the largest of steamships. However, they will not long maintain that distinction, as larger now are being constructed. Two of them, the Olympic and the Titanic, are well under way and will be of 45,000 tons each. They are being built for the White Star line, to run between New York and Southampton, and will be slower than either the Lusitania or the Mauretania. A third vessel, of 40,000 tons, will be built in Germany for the Hamburg-American line. It also will be slower than its smaller predecessors.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

IT'S OUR MOVE

TO OUR NEW STORE AT

42 and 44 CALIFORNIA ST

One half block off Market St.

Calendars, Pocket Diaries
Office Diaries for 1910

LE COUNT, CLARK & ORMOND

STATIONERS AND PRINTERS
San Francisco

"We Hold Thee Safe"

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

ROLLA V. WATT
MANAGER

N. W. Corner Pine and Sansome Streets
SAN FRANCISCO

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

CREPUSCULUM

By Frank Norris

These verses were written by Frank Norris, the well known novelist, and have been republished in the collected edition of his works.

I hear them say our little life's "a day"—
That, born with light, at dusk it fades away.
I hear them say that Death is that Life's night—

That we but wax and wane with changing light.

O Blind! The Day's not yet. This Life of ours

It still the night's slow retinue of hours;
Its sorrows, nightmares, phantasms of shade;
Its pleasures, dreams that only form to fade.
Our Life's a night through which we blindly
grope

With outstretched palms, hoping 'gainst failing hope.

Death ushers in the dawn of Life's true day;
Though gray the eve, so is the morning gray.
Be thou uplift, O Heart! Death's visage wan
Is lighted not with twilight but with dawn

"PRIVILEGE AND DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA"

If we are not having a soul-searching time in America, we are having such a searching of economic creeds as such creeds have not been subjected to since the French Revolution. The colossal fortunes that have been garnered by men still living, fortunes that would have stupefied the imaginations of their fathers, the giant combinations of giants for the purpose of getting into a few privileged hands the resources of a continent, these things have tended to give those not wholly indifferent to the welfare of their kind a profound concern for the future of the race.

There are those who have hugged to the heart the hope that this continent might not repeat the wrongs, the follies, the failures, the injustices and hardships that the continent of Europe has written into its history, written in blood and tears, a history twenty centuries in the making and the writing; but there are those, too, who begin to cherish the fear that history here is but repeating the history made there, changed in form, but the same in substance, and as destructive of liberty and equality.

Among those who so think and so fear there is perhaps no modern writer who thinks more clearly, or fears more keenly, or who sees with clearer vision than Mr. Frederic C. Howe, author of "Privilege and Democracy in America."

We are wont to declare that there is in America no such thing as privilege, but Mr. Howe disabuses the mind of that fallacy. He finds our industrial and commercial life surcharged with it and, too, he finds that privilege has been deliberately created by legislation, legislation obtained by and for the advantage of an ascendant, predominating, self-perpetuating, power-holding class which are taking to themselves, and fencing off, through laws enacted at their request, through courts reflecting their points of view, all those resources of the earth that God Almighty made a heritage for all.

As Mr. Howe reads the verdict of history, he finds that "the class that has ruled was the class which owned," and that "man's whole life is molded by his economic environment. And this environment is made by law, not by natural law, or moral law, or wholly by the Common Law, but by laws enacted by Congress and legislatures and councils in our cities," that "more than any statute law determines the well-being of the people. More than anything else it controls the distribution of wealth." If this be true, it stands The People in hand to look more closely than they have been looking to their congresses, legislatures and councils. It has been our national custom to look to the locks on the doors of our barns after the horses have been stolen.

Whether or not one can agree with Mr.

Howe as to the remedy which he proposes to apply to existing mal-conditions, through legislation, inasmuch as it was by legislation that these conditions were brought into existence, no reader can restrain a sentiment of admiration for the masterly way he has marshaled his forces or for the relentlessness with which he has applied the implements of dissection that he may search for, and lay open to view, the source of difficulty. It is an attribute of genius to be able to carry one's idea to its finality, and this Mr. Howe is able to do. He neither asks nor gives quarter.

As Mr. Howe views the economic field, there are but two possible avenues of escape from the fatality of Europe and Asia, where privilege sits enthroned and the mass of mankind are never filled. One path is offered by Socialism, the other by the Single Tax; one possible deliverer is Karl Marx, the other Henry George. Mr. Howe is no Socialist, but he is a reverent and whole-hearted follower of Henry George.

Mr. Howe is possibly less happy as a physician than as a diagnostician. His analysis of the causes which have led to existing conditions is as keen, as searching and as lucid as the literature of our day has produced, but his arguments in support of the single tax idea are no more convincing than those of Henry George.

And yet the line of progress may follow the guide boards he has set up. The tendency to eliminate personal property and improvements from the assessment rolls, and punatively to tax the speculative interest out of resources unoccupied and unused, is world wide and, supplemented by inheritance and income taxes, may so approximate the single tax idea as to ameliorate, if not remedy, existing conditions. (Charles Scribner's Sons, $1.50 net.)

A. E. THOMAS'S NEW PLAY

A. E. Thomas, the author of "Her Husband's Wife," a farce which Henry Miller is appearing in with much success, is a newspaper man as well as a budding playwright, and fully appreciates the value of advertising. So to those who appreciate let it be given. He has been having a lot of fun, as have many other newspaper writers, with the idea of writing a fish play which will rival "Chantecler." His description of his intended magnum opus is worth reading, and follows:

"My next play will be a tank drama. Far from believing that the day of the tank drama is past, I am of the opinion that it is just dawning. The tank drama to which reference is made here, however, will differ in several material points from the one with which a previous generation of theatre-goers has been familiar. A tank drama, however, it must be called, since all its characters will be fish.

"The play will be called 'Piscator.' Naturally, all four of its acts will be laid in Finland. This is a locale which, so far as I am aware, has not been heretofore employed by any American dramatist, playwright or dramaturge. I have got the order of these creatures wrong. I should have said playwright, dramatist and dramaturge. When a man begins to try to learn how to write plays, and finally succeeds in finding a manager sufficiently weak-minded to produce one of his attempts, he is called a playwright. After he has found several such managers in succession, he becomes a dramatist. But not until he gets to the stage where he writes plays of symbolism, filled with deep, dark, hidden meanings—not until then does he get to be a dramaturge—whatever that is.

"But to get back to the tank drama. Of course the leading character will be the bull whale, and if anybody objects that a whale is not a fish, but a mammal, all I've got to say is that a horse is a mammal, and yet he is also a horse. Anyhow, the bull whale is to be the hero. Of course the hen whale is the heroine. At the opening of our story the hen whale has not yet capitulated to the importunities of her lover. Of course, as in all well-regulated plays, the lover has a rival. It sometimes happens so in real life. Every once in a while we are surprised to find that things that happen on the stage also happen in real life. Every now and then—but one wanders from the subject. The bull whale's rival in love is the swordfish, a crafty creature, as the development of the plot will show. The bull whale has an idea that the rise of the tide is caused by his spouting joyously twice a day, and he is convinced that if he should forget to spout the tides would not rise at all. This belief fills him with a sense of his own importance and his mission in the world. But the swordfish catches him asleep, and with his sword plugs up the whale's blowhole, so that he can no longer spout. Upon finding what has happened, the bull whale laments as follows:

"'Alack! Alas! And woe the wretched day when pale misfortune comes my weeping way! Ah, me! That ever—' But one cannot give away the dialog in this manner. Suffice it to say that the whale laments bitterly, for he is convinced that the tide will no more rise, and who knows what may happen then? But the tide goes on rising and falling just the same as ever. And when the bull whale finds out that he is, after all, of small importance in the scheme of the universe, he commits suicide by swallowing a school of young shad raised in the Hudson river, ptomaine poisoning setting in at once. So the swordfish marries the hen whale and they live happily ever after.

"Of course there is a sub-plot involving many other characters. The bull whale is to be played by Tom Wise; the hen whale by Marie Dressler. James K. Hackett will probably be asked to play the swordfish. The dogfish, one of the minor characters, will be in the capable hands of the distinguished English character actor, Grenville Barker. The oyster will be impersonated by George Bernard Shaw. James Lackaye will probably be the porpoise. One of the features of the third act will be the appearance of a school of sharks, impersonated by a group of ticket speculators. There will also be a pony ballet of minnows. The part of the lobster has not yet been assigned, though there are many available candidates. The shad will probably be interpreted by Raymond Hitchcock, since it is most important that this part shall be in the hands of an actor who is capable of looking the part. No actor has yet been chosen for the part of the shad roe. It is a great pleasure to announce that the costumes will be manufactured from designs prepared by the celebrated decorator, James Wall Finn. Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish will occupy a box at the opening performance. The actors will positively not appear behind a net."

A POET IN EXILE

In 1858 John Hay, then twenty years of age, graduated from Brown University and went to study law in a dingy law office in Warsaw, Illinois. This was his poetic period of storm and stress. Remote from the literary friendships that had been a delight and inspiration in college, exile as he felt himself, he poured himself out in some interesting unpublished poems, and particularly in a series of letters to his friend, Miss Nora Perry, the poet of Providence, who was one of the most interesting women of her time. These letters and poems, woven by Miss Caroline Ticknor into an illuminating narrative entitled, "A Poet in Exile," are now published in a Riverside Press edition.

George Meredith's unpublished novel, "Celt and Saxon," will be brought out some time during the summer. This novel, although it was not completed by Mr. Meredith, yet is, as far as it goes (perhaps two-thirds of the entire book), an entirely finished piece of work and one which will stand among the most important and delightful of his books.

INVENTORS AND INVENTIONS

WHY SOME SUCCEED AND OTHERS DO NOT

BERKELEY, June 13.—The energy that has children put to sleep this has been used by J. H. Holland, a small inventor, to make a pump, and the water they play the more water will be pumped into the family tank for household use.

The swing with which the children of the neighborhood find enjoyment has proved so popular that the pumping device had to be removed owing to the lack of storage facilities for the surplus water.

The swing to which the pumping apparatus has been attached operates as a pendulum, and at each oscillation a downward stroke of the piston of the pump is made and water drawn. This continues indefinitely until the children tire of the swing. The backward and forward movements make possible the double stroke with little energy lost through friction.

Holland, who lives at Tenth and Harrison streets, West Berkeley, has to his credit a number of other inventions of household worth, with the pendulum idea as the basis of operation.—San Francisco Call.

Probably this inventor got his name into the paper because he lives near an enterprising newspaperman who was hard up for copy last Monday—Monday is a dull news day for the papers, always—but his story illustrates an almost universal passion of Americans. We doubt if any man lives in the United States who has not, at one time or another, hugged to his imagination the thought that he had given birth to a potentially great invention. The writer recalls off-hand that he once devised a scheme for making fine paper from a new and cheaper source; a brother who invented an improvement to the typewriter; and an uncle whose device for developing power from the slow current of an ordinary river was going to put the Pelton wheel back into the class with the 1902 models of the automobile.

Everybody is an inventor. Everybody has an idea that he can vastly improve some machine in present use or can build a machine for some unfilled need. Everybody also has the idea that a great fortune is in sight when he perfects his machine. And, finally, everybody except those that have tried it has an idea that the idea is half the battle.

As a matter of fact, the number of fortunes that are made out of inventions, in proportion to the number of even patented inventions, is about as one to one million. Furthermore, the inventor is usually the last one to make the fortune out of all those who have anything to do with an invention. And, again finally, the idea of an invention is about the most nearly infinitesimal part of making either the invention or the fortune.

The invention of a new workable device is, primarily, a process of unremitting, patient, sometimes almost interminable, experimentation. This means not merely infinite labor and great lengths of time, but usually vast expense. To cite an example: There is now on the market the first model of a new typewriter of the same grade as the Remington and Underwood machines. A skilled mechanic could probably take in most of its simple construction in ten minutes, and could build a duplicate of it in a week. And yet the writer knows that that first model cost more than $1,000,000 and the labor of scores of men for nearly fifteen years before they could put the machine on the market.

Why? Well, because the machine is so simple. That sounds foolish, but it isn't. A typewriter has to be simple because all kinds of non-mechanical people must use it. It must be able to stand all kinds of hard usage from inexperienced and careless people. It must be easily repaired. And—it must do good work. That all sounds simple. But it must work easily, and not jar the nerves at every stroke. Every letter must make the same quality of an impression. Every line must be even. The uninitiated have no idea of the amazing precision of calculation that goes into the length of the bar that holds each little type, or into the material to be used in the bearing that the joint in this bar works on. This last point alone cost nearly $100,000 in the evolution of the machine described above.

The idea, in this case, was simple enough: invent a new style of typewriter that we can patent. But the execution of the idea was the rub.

Edison had no trouble in getting the idea for the phonograph. In fact, the idea obtruded itself upon him by accident. But when he set about to devise an apparatus that would accurately reproduce sounds as he knew they could be reproduced, that would reproduce them every time without fail, that would not cost so much that nobody would buy it, he set about a process of experimentation that consumed years. He had men searching every corner of the globe for waxes for the records that would not melt at ordinary temperature, that were free from grit, that were cheap, that would not break easily, that could be manufactured in uniform grades. He spent thousands of dollars in this search. He spent months in trying every wax offered. And at last he found what he wanted, and it was not wax at all but a cheap black soap that he had been washing his hands with all the time. That soap, with the addition of hardening ingredients, is the substance of the Edison phonograph records today.

But suppose, for the sake of argument, that you have your invention all worked out. Now comes your patent. A patent is not hard to get, provided you do not too obviously infringe somebody else's ideas. But most people think that when they have their patent the United States Government has thereby taken a contract to protect them in the enjoyment of its use.

Not at all. Everything that a patent does is to give an inventor a standing in court if somebody else contests his patent rights. A patent is simply Uncle Sam's record that, on such a day, So-and-So filed in the Patent Office a legal notice that he claimed a certain device, operated upon certain principles, to be his original invention and that, so far as the Patent Office can discover, his claim is true. But another inventor with the same idea can still go into court and claim that he had that idea before the patentee, that he has used "due diligence" in perfecting the idea for commercial use, and that the patentee simply happened to strike the same solution as the contestant some days or months earlier. The law says that, other things being equal, the man who has the idea first is entitled to the fruits of it. So the patentee may be thrown out by the courts. In brief, a patent is simply the starting point for a series of lawsuits if anybody wants to contest it.

But assume that the invention and the patent are both all right. The next problem is to invent machinery to manufacture the machine you have invented. Back of every new machine is another machine that made it. And it often happens that no machinery exists that can be utilized to manufacture the parts of a newly invented machine. That means more invention.

But after all these difficulties have been removed, there comes the problem of financing the manufacture of your invention. In the case of the typewriter mentioned above, it is obvious that only men of great means, able to wait a long time for the returns from their investment, could possibly handle the financial end of the invention. And, of course, many inventions are not put upon the market upon a scale so great, amounting practically to covering at once the entire field for the sale of typewriters.

An example of a successful invention on a smaller scale occurs to the writer. Some years ago the California Wine Association employed a traveling salesman who sold their goods from Mexico to Seattle. His home was in San Francisco. He was a pretty liberal spender, and saved little or nothing. One day he suggested to his wife that they try to save the beginnings of a bank account by occasionally dropping some money in a "pig" bank on the mantelpiece. He found that it was easy enough, when he felt "flush," to drop in a five or ten-dollar gold piece. One day he thought to break the pig and deposit the money. He found it empty. His wife confessed to having yielded to the allurements of a pretty dress pattern and had used the money to buy it.

The salesman immediately conceived the idea of making a little bank with a good lock and depositing the key with the cashier of a savings bank, so that the money could only be removed by the man who would keep it on a savings account. The invention was easily perfected and a patent obtained. In this case the inventor also had a business head. He evolved the plan of leasing the little banks to savings banks, to be distributed by them to their depositors as an incentive to increase their deposits. He took in a partner and the two scraped up enough money to pay for a trip through Oregon and Washington. They sold several hundred banks in Portland and enough more in Seattle to make expenses. They had no banks to fill the orders—nothing but the sample. The inventor decided that the East offered a better field, and spent his last money to buy a ticket to Chicago. The advance payments on the sales he made in Chicago were sufficient to pay the cost of manufacture of the previous orders. In a few months he was able to start a factory of his own. In four years he had two factories in the United States and one in Germany, and was selling his banks in half the countries of the civilized world, operating from a selling headquarters on Fifth avenue, New York.

This man built from the little to the big, and he had the advantage of being a good business man—something most inventors are not. And his invention was so easy to make with existing machinery that the problem of manufacture was slight.

On the other side of the picture, the example of the turbine engine is a case to stagger the embryo inventor. The English, or Parsons, type of turbine has been in general use since the late '80's. The General Electric Company, at Schenectady, N. Y., undertook to perfect the American, or Curtiss, type for commercial use. One of the principal differences is that in the Parsons type the axis on which the little fans are set is in a horizontal position, its ends being supported on bearings, whereas, in the Curtiss type, the axis is in a vertical position, the lower end only resting on a bearing. The General Electric Company, to the writer's knowledge, spent more than $100,000 in correcting defects in the Curtiss type, and probably spent a great deal more before they could offer it to the commercial world as a perfect invention.

The General Electric Company, like most of the very large manufacturing concerns, retains permanently a staff of inventive geniuses whose whole time is devoted, partly on salary and partly on a royalty basis, to inventing improved types of machinery. These are the inventors who do the bulk of the practical inventive work that is done in the country. They are, so to speak, professional inventors. The occasional, or sporadic inventor, like the salesman noted above, has a much harder road to travel and is usually far less successful, financially.

But, for fear of deadening the really useful inventive ardor of his countryman, the writer will conclude with the story of a successful sporadic inventor, now dead, by the name of Coffin, but for years known in New York and Washington as "The Lone Fisherman of Cape Cod."

Coffin was a very poor bachelor, who made a precarious living as a fisherman off Cape Cod. He lived in a little shack and had very little to do with anybody else. Once he took a trip to New York in his boat and there, when he bought a dozen oranges one day, the dealer gave them to him in a paper bag. He took the bag home. He became interested in the way the paper was cut out and folded to make the bag. Opening it out flat, he tried to figure out a better pattern. He noticed, among other things, that the pattern of the bag he had compelled the manufacturer to waste several square inches of paper on every bag, and he soon devised a pattern that saved this waste. A calculation showed him that this saving, applied to the millions of paper bags used every year, would mean a tremendous saving in the cost of manufacture.

Next he devised a machine to make bags

(Concluded on Page 479)

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Little Willie on the Fourth

My pa, he says we orto have
 A Fourth that's safe an' sane.
 "Our recklessness upon that day,"
 He says, "gives me a pain.
 The hours is filled with danger then,
 An' blood is frequent spilled.
 I knew a man that knew a man
 Heard of a man got killed!"
 "I s'pose you're right," I says to pa.
 "In feelin' some annoy,
 But did you feel the same 'bout it
 When you was jest a boy?"

My pa, he didn't anser that,
 "But, oh," he says, "sech noise!
 It ain't essential for to make
 Good patriots of our boys.
 The snappin' crackers an' the bombs
 An' all that trouble brings,
 They desiccate our Natal Day;
 I depercate sech things."
 "But did you when you was a boy
 Then depercate 'em, pa?"
 I says, but pa, he cleared his throat
 An' only says, "Er—hah!"

Then ma, she says, "Sech dretful noise!"
 An' pa, he says, "Amen!"
 An' so I s'pose we'll never have
 The good old Fourth again,
 But jest a Fourth that's safe an' sane
 An' ladylike till done.
 But what's the use to patriots be
 If we can't have no fun?
 But when I ask if my pa liked
 The Fourths that made things hum,
 I wish he wouldn't clear his throat
 An' anser, "Er—hah—um!"

The Three Editors

It seems that the habits we form in life linger with us after the change called death.
 It chanced that as one editor turned away from the narrow gate another was just approaching it.

"Hello, Bill," said the latter, "I hope you're not going below, with your delinquent subscribers."

"Well, the way Peter acted was discouraging," the other replied, with evident emotion.

"What did he do?"

"He asked me what would be my opinion on a question of right and wrong in which the welfare of the people was involved, and when I told him I wouldn't have any, he told me to press the elevator button marked, 'Going down,' and then called, 'Next!'"

"Well, thank goodness, I always have opinions," the other replied, and advanced to the narrow gate.

"What would be your opinion of a question of right and wrong in which the welfare of the people was involved?" St. Peter at once inquired.

"I—er—on which side would the cash be?"
 the editor eagerly asked.

"Press the button marked, 'Going down,'" said St. Peter.

It happened just then that yet another editor came to the gate, and when he said that he would support the right regardless of the sack they hustled him through and up to a pew in front, and gave him a harp which, being an editor, he couldn't play, and there he met many of his paid-up subscribers, and all was well with him.

But as for the other two editors, it was too bad about the habit they formed while on earth, was it not?

Where I'm Fishin'

Settin' here an' fishin',
 While the sun is sendin' beams
 To set the shadows dancin'
 An' to silver all the streams,
 While the fish are bitin' freely
 An' all nature's actin' kind,
 Oh, there's lots o' fun a-fishin'
 Like I'm fishin'—in my mind.

The Opinions of Rufus

The trouble with folks that take their own time 'bout doin' things is that they generally take other folks' time, too, an' without payin' fer it.

I don't take much stock in prayin' that ain't backed by common sense. The cullud lady that asked the Almighty to send her a large hen that would lay watermelons never got any answer to her prayer.

Don't be too proud of the place you occupy in the world. The lowest layer in the box of apples was the highest after the box was turned over.

If your disposition's sour, try religion on it;
 if that don't work, try liver pills.

I'm like most of the rest of you: My sympathies is fer the oppressed poor, but my glad hand is fer the predatory rich.

Under the law, es I understand it, stealin'
 a loaf of bread is a crime; stealin' a million dollars is a problem in technicality.

Es long es we haven't got X-ray eyes I don't know es the fact that beauty's only skin deep is much of a drawback to it.

I have less rev'rence, but more sympathy, fer parsons sence I've grown up an' found out that they're jest human like the rest of us.

The Scripcher says, "The talk of the lips tendeth only to penury," but I s'pose an exception ought to be made of life insurance agents.

A modern "affinity" by any other name wouldn't smell any worse.

The 'pinion of a married man that the dear girl is the sweetest ever is worth the 'pinions of 'bout 999 unmarried lovers to the same effect.

Did you ever reflect, Ezry, that if we wus es good es we pertend to be there wouldn't be any 'casion fer pertendin' it?

"Don't Forget to Say Your Prayers"

Our old clock upon the wall,
 Ticking solemn-like and slow,
 Just like this to me would call,
 "Time to—bed to—bed to—go."
 Then my mother said "You hear
 What it was the old clock said?
 Guess the clock was right, my dear;
 Time that small boys were in bed."
 Kissed me good-night at the stairs—
 "Don't forget to say your prayers."

Sometimes I had naughty been;
 Didn't want to say my prayers;
 Felt a preference for sin.

And the penalty it bears,
 But my mother knew, I guessed—
 Wonder how our mothers know—
 For she held me to her breast,
 Whisp'ring very soft and low:
 There is One who knows and cares—
 "Don't forget to say your prayers."

Some may think such prayers may bless
 Ne'er a one who goes astray,
 But a mother's love, I guess,
 Helps them on their upward way,
 Helps them o'er the earthly fray,
 For her kisses prayers record,
 Which the angels haste to lay
 At the feet of her dear Lord,
 And He heeds how her love fares—
 "Don't forget to say your prayers."

Mother dear, full oft, I know,
 I've forgotten what you said
 When the old clock, ticking slow,
 Summoned me to go to bed;
 Yet I've not forgotten quite,
 Oft when I had gone astray
 I have turned unto the right,
 Deeming that I heard you say:
 "There is One who knows and cares—
 Don't forget to say your prayers."

She Knew How

"I don't see how Mrs. De Style keeps up with the fashions as she does."
 "Oh, easily enough."
 "Well, how does she do it?"
 "Why, she attends church regularly."

Words as Proofs of Man's Iniquity

"The studyin' of words," said Sister Biggins,
 "is reel improvin' an' helpin' to women folks that reelize 'bout man's innard depravity an' nat'ral cussedness, but hain't known how to prove it."

"I don't see what on airth them two subjicks has to do with each other," Brother Biggins mildly suggested.

"No, I s'pose you don't, but that's cause you ain't studied 'bout words an' don't know what they tell on the subjick. If you did, I don't s'pose you'd ventur' to show your face in sperience meetin' agin."

Brother Biggins wriggled uneasily on his chair, and Sister Biggins continued

"You're actin' some as if you doubted my word, so I reckon I'll prove it to you. What's diction? It's talkin', ain't it? Course it is.
 Then what's bad talkin', cussin', an' sech?
 Why, it's male-diction, an' it's right here in the dictionary; 'tain't female-diction, fur from it. What's a factor? It's somebody that does things. S'posin' they're wicked things, what kind of factor is it then? Why, it's a male-factor, an' 'tain't ever a female-factor. What's volent? It's willin' somethin', an' if it's willin' a wicked thing, it's called male-volent. A malodor is a bad odor, an' a malformation is a bad formation, an' the words used to be male-odor an' male-formation till men got nervous 'bout havin' so much proof against them in the language an' changed the words. An' they's more sech cases, all pintin' to man's disg— Got to go an' milk the cow, hey? Sh'd think you would! If I had sech a record
 'ginst me as this here dict—"

But Brother Biggins was gone, and Sister
 Biggins cast one last glance at the lexicon and then prepared to get supper.

Such an Ungovernable Temper

When you were a small boy, Hobart, your father and mother—and they were nice people, too—used to say, "Hobart is a dear little fellow, but he has such an ungovernable temper!" They would not have said, "Hobart is a dear little fellow, but he has an ungovernable disposition to steal anything he can lay his hands on!" No, they would have taken that "ungovernable" disposition out of you if it used up every strap in the house.

But the other thing they said, and it didn't take you long to discover that it served very well as an excuse for almost any display of ugliness. Can you not, in your mind's eye, see your small self lying on the floor, kicking and bellowing, while your parents are regretfully commenting on what an "ungovernable temper" Hobart has? It was their fault then that they tolerated such a display, but now that you are a grown man, it is both your fault and your disgrace that you still are whining about your "ungovernable temper."

For there is no such thing as an ungovernable temper more than there is any other human fault or frailty which is absolutely ungovernable and uncontrollable. We may and will yield to such frailties sometimes, but that they must own and drive us is such rank heresy as should be disowned by any man who proudly believes that "the mind is its own place." I have known many a man and woman who conquered the "ungovernable temper" of childhood, and he is a poor specimen who claims that he cannot. Quit whining about your "ungovernable temper." It is as much to your dishonor as would be an ungovernable disposition to invade your neighbor's hennery. You ought to be big enough to own yourself.

* * *

Why Methuselah Died

"Say, father," said Lamech, "you remember that suit you began when you were 43 years old?"

"I do," said Methuselah, with a weary sigh.
 "The Supreme Court has just ordered it back for a new trial."

So the old man, realizing that it was in vain to endeavor to hang on till the end, closed his eyes and was no more.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

William F. Herrin Speaks at Corvallis

It requires nothing extraordinary in the powers of imagination to make a mental picture of William F. Herrin as, thirty-seven years ago, he received from the hands of the president of the little college up in Oregon his well-earned diploma and, with the fire of enthusiasm in his veins, hope in his heart and determination in his cold, gray eye, went forth to do a man's part in life. He was a smart boy then, as he is a smart man now, and there is no question that he went from that college with a purpose to live a blameless life as well fixed in his mind as ever any convict went forth from prison. Unfortunately for the convict, his purpose is not unlikely to forsake him at the door of the first saloon and, unfortunately for Mr. Herrin, his purpose forsook him at the door of opportunity. Seldom has man intended better or done worse. It was then no part of his purpose to make himself the most heartily hated man in a great commonwealth, but he has achieved that distinction. He did not get the thing he did not earn. His address is notable and able. There is little in it to which exception may be taken. It is only when what Mr. Herrin has said is compared with what Mr. Herrin has done that criticism is in order. The address was splendid and splendidly able and, were it not neutralized by twenty years of open and notorious nullification of it, it would work nothing but good in California as well as in Oregon.

The Philosophy of Our Political Institutions

Mr. Herrin's exposition of the philosophy of our political institutions was correct and convincing. It is true that our national Constitution was a well worded expression of the innate conservatism of the makers of that document; that it provided checks and balances with the purpose of forestalling and preventing the precipitate action of the clamorous mob; that elections at stated times with stated tenures in office were wise provisions; that pure democracy is little suited to a vast population and that our scheme of government contemplated the representative, and not the direct, form of government. It is perfectly clear, too, that the initiative, the referendum and the recall are inconsistent with and antagonistic to the representative idea in government. All that Mr. Herrin said to the youths and maidens who listened to him at Corvallis was true and profitable for them to hear.

But Mr. Herrin neglected to tell the people of Oregon that, but for himself and the cheap but convenient tools he is able to employ to do his will, California would not have cared two straws for the direct primary, would not be interested in any campaign for the initiative and the referendum and would have as little use for the recall as for consulting the Delphic oracles. The reason why California "clamored" for the direct primary was that Mr. W. F. Herrin and his hired handy men so manipulated the conventions of political parties that they misrepresented, deliberately and purposely misrepresented, that public sentiment which those conventions were constituted to carry out. The reason why there is a growing sentiment in California in favor of direct legislation is that, for twenty-nine years if not longer, the legislatures the people have elected have, by Mr. Herrin and his predecessors and their hired tricksters, been manipulated, fenced in, corked up and prevented doing what public sentiment required of them. When through the pernicious activities of such hirelings as these the men of a commonwealth find that representative government fails to represent they have two courses open to them: to submit to absolutism or substitute direct methods, so far as they may, for those indirect methods that have failed of their purpose. All that Mr. Herrin said in relation to the recall is true. No such device ought to be necessary, but if the people elect a man to office only to find that he is representing Mr. Herrin and not themselves, what better thing can the people do than to recall that man from office? In line, Mr. Herrin, there is not an evil of which you complain in your address, or of which the people of California are now complaining, of which you and your associates here, and men like unto you and your associates elsewhere, are not the authors, the proximate if not the ultimate cause. It would have been more to the purpose, Mr. Herrin, had you, out of the fullness of your experience, spoken of practical politics under, rather than of the philosophy of, our institutions.

The Superlative Need of Our Time

Mr. Herrin was right in declaring, at Corvallis, that "never in the history of our country has there been greater need for intelligent public leadership than now," but he should have gone farther and declared that that leadership should be as moral as intelligent, as patriotic as wise. Satan has not been charged with lack of intelligence, and neither has William F. Herrin.

Mr. Herrin rightly says that government should be by public opinion, by the deliberate and reasoned judgment of the community, and so it should, but, once more, whose fault is it that it is not right here in California, now? The reasoned judgment of California is that California should be governed by the people of California rather than by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, but so splendidly have Mr. Herrin and his associates organized all the forces of political evil in this State that, except public opinion clamor and threaten, its will is frustrated at every point again and again.

Mr. Herrin regrets the effervescent and insincere quality of journalism here and elsewhere and ventures the suggestion that journalism might properly be endowed. Here he speaks advisedly and out of the fullness of a ripe experience. Did not the company for which he works endow the Sacramento Record-Union for thirty years, the San Francisco Post for a considerable time, the San Francisco Chronicle and Examiner upon occasion, and is not the Post-Globe, that unspeakable gutter-snipe of the under-world, endowed beyond the reach of present want by Patrick Calhoun? Are these journals fit leaders or reliable exponents of public opinion?

But Mr. Herrin's address to the students of the Agricultural College of Oregon is not without its undertone of sadness. Reading between the lines, one is prompted to feel for him what the right-minded must always feel toward the transgressor who has found his way hard and his life disappointing. The note of melancholy was not unlike the one dropped by the able but unscrupulous owner of the Los Angeles Times, who complained to a fellow-citizen that he had made a million dollars in Los Angeles, but not one friend. So with Mr. Herrin. Speaking from a full heart and thirty-seven years of what the world calls a successful career, he said: "It seems to me that the rewards of the scholar are more fruitful of real happiness, and make more for permanent satisfaction, than the rewards gained in business or professional pursuits, for the scholar deals with that learning which is the finer essence of our intellectual life, which has been purified and sifted in quiet rooms to which the passing fashions of thought do not penetrate." The pursuit of truth for truth's sake brings us to know the human spirit in its unchanged and unchanging nature, to know the things which abide with us and to reject that which is ephemeral and of only passing interest.

Splendidly said, and yet there is a better thing and a greater happiness than that which may be found in "pursuing truth for truth's sake." It may be found in upholding righteousness for the sake of one's kind. Would that William F. Herrin, thirty-seven years ago, had devoted his splendid powers to that ideal. And yet he might undo much were he to so devote them now.

Senate Candidates In San Francisco

In the Eighteenth Senatorial District, which comprises the Thirty-first and Thirty-sixth Assembly District, two candidates for the Republican nomination were announced, J. D. Toomey and Henry N. Beatty. Early this week Beatty decided that he could be more useful by returning to his present place as the Assemblyman from the Thirty-sixth, and announced his withdrawal from the senatorial race. Beatty was sent to the Legislature last time by the "organization," but soon showed that his sympathies were elsewhere, by making one of the best records made by any San Francisco Assemblyman. He will be supported by the Independent Republicans in his campaign for re-election. His withdrawal from the senatorial race leaves Toomey the field alone until the Independent Republicans can find a proper man to contest the district. Toomey is a Royal Arch candidate, a saloonkeeper, and was an Assemblyman in the Legislature of 1907, in which he made a bad record.

Twentieth Senatorial

John W. Sweeney was endorsed last Thursday night by the Independent Republican Clubs of the Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth Assembly Districts for the Republican nomination for Senator from the Twentieth District, which comprises these two districts. Sweeney is the right sort of man for the place and the right man for it this time. His principal opponent will be Tom Kennedy, the Democratic incumbent and Democratic candidate, who will be backed by the Republican "machine" bosses, Burke and Lynch, at the November election. Kennedy's record in politics and in the Legislature is bad. Sweeney's Republican opponents at the primary are Louis F. Compton, who was put up by the bosses to be bowled over; Edward F. Bryant, who once trained with the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, but who switched to John Lynch's camp at the election; J. B. Newson, who was a delegate last year to the Democratic convention at Stockton as supporter of Harry Flannery for presidential elector and who is now a Republican candidate under the tutelage of Cleveland Dam and Harry Flannery; and Fred Severance, who seems to be running because he is running.

Twenty-Second

This district comprises the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Assembly Districts. The Thirty-ninth is the heaviest Republican district in California and usually goes for reform. It was represented in the last Legislature by E. J. Callan, who made the best record of any San Francisco Assemblyman, and as good as that of any Assemblyman in the State. In Hichborn's record, Callan's is perfect. He also made one of the very best records from the point of view of organized labor. Callan is now candidate for the Republican nomination for the Senate in the Twenty-second Senatorial District. He ought to be elected, by all means. His only opponent so far is Edgar C. Levey, formerly an attache of the district-attorney's office when Langdon was in charge. Levey "double-crossed" Heney at the eleventh hour at the last election. He should be defeated. The only Democrat out for the nomination is Edwin E. Grant, who is clean but who has no influence nor vote-getting qualifications. This is a hopelessly Republican district, anyway, so the Democrat does not matter.

Twenty-Fourth

The incumbent, Marc Anthony, is out for the Republican nomination to succeed himself. Anthony was sent to the Senate by the "machine," but disappointed his sponsors by making the best record of any Senator from San Francisco in the last Legislature. That is not a perfect record—Hichborn's test votes show him for reform seven times and against it eight—but it is worth considering by those who hope he may still further improve it. Personally, Anthony is erratic but honest. His opponents for the nomination are D. J. Beban, George M. Perine, James W. Boyce and Howard Herron. Beban was Assemblyman from the Forty-third District to the last Legislature and to the session of 1907. In 1909 he scored ten votes against reform, none for it, and was absent once, sharing with Macauley and McManus the distinction of having the worst record in the whole Assembly. Perine is an ex-contractor, a peripatetic banker, a politician whose support comes mainly from the tenderloin, and a man who is proud of his championship of wrong. Boyce is a saloonkeeper whose political ideals are those of the "push," but who is somewhat—not enough—redeemed by a degree of personal independence. Herron is a young attorney who has said that "Uncle Joe" Cannon is a greater man than Roosevelt.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

Johnson's Itinerary Hiram Johnson will resume his tour of Northern California next week. He will address evening meetings as follows: Monday, June 20th, Martinez; Tuesday, the 21st, Richmond; Wednesday, the 22d, Petaluma; Thursday, the 23d, Healdsburg; and, on the evening of Friday, the 24th, at three places, Burlingame, San Mateo and Redwood City. On Saturday, the 25th, he will make an all-day tour through a part of Santa Clara County, ending with evening meetings at Santa Clara and East San Jose. On Monday, the 27th, he will complete his tour of Santa Clara County, concluding with an evening meeting at Los Gatos.

Johnson's Effect On Registration Johnson's great meeting in San Francisco at Dreamland Rink is still the sensation of the campaign. Of the 5,000 in the audience at that meeting, fully 4,000 were voters, and of the best class of citizenship in the city. The meeting was of itself a tremendous success, but its effects were far-reaching beyond the wildest hopes of its promoters. These effects were most strikingly evidenced by the huge registration of voters during the two days following, when the special registration booths were open throughout the city. Prior to the Johnson meeting, the total registration since January 1st was 30,000. Former Registrar Zemansky estimated that the total primary registration this year would amount to 50,000, or, at the outside, 55,000. In the two days following Johnson's speech, the registration was 22,000, or 11,000 a day, bringing the total registration up to 52,000, or within 3,000 of Zemansky's highest estimate of the total for the year. And it is still five weeks to the close of the registration. And a very large majority of this latest registration is Johnson supporters, as was shown in the Twenty-ninth District, one of the hardest points of attack for the Johnson forces. In this district, 67 voters, registered in one of the two days, were approached by a Johnson leader, to whom six announced their support of Curry, while the remaining 61 signed Johnson club membership cards.

Otis Fails to See the Light The Good Government Republican Club of Alameda gave Frank Otis an opportunity to declare himself in sympathy with the reform movement, and Otis failed at his opportunity. He sought the club's endorsement of his candidacy for the State Senate. The club asked him to declare that, in a showdown, he would vote with the reform members upon the question of organization of the Legislature, and he refused to so declare himself. That is the crucial test of the "organization" or anti-organization sympathies of a legislator. Such a promise would not have bound Otis to any legislative program nor put him under any obligation to any faction. It would simply have pledged him to help free the legislature of machine control of the two houses. It is fair to say that Mr. Otis has usually voted right on bills, but the question of house organization was found, at the last session, to be the crux of the issue of reform advance. Mr. Otis has failed to see its importance and the support of the Good Government Club will go to John Ralph Wilson, whom the club endorsed June 1st, after satisfactory answers to the same questions as those propounded to Otis. Mr. Wilson's first political prominence was as chairman of that minority of the Republican convention in San Francisco which refused to support Daniel A. Ryan for mayor and threw its support to Mayor Taylor. Mr. Wilson's record in that campaign earned him high praise for ability, energy and right principles. He was endorsed on June 11th by the Melrose Good Government Club. His opponents will be Otis and Hans. He should be elected over them.

Frank J. Browne for Roncovieri's Place One of the last legacies of the Ruef-Schmitz regime is Alfred Roncovieri, superintendent of schools of San Francisco and perpetual politician. During his incumbency of the office the school department has been continually in turmoil and, if the common reports are true, a great deal more politics in the selection and dismissal of teachers than there should be. One of the teachers ousted was Frank J. Browne, whose reduction from the high school department to night school work was certainly not based upon any deficiency of ability or character. It seems now, however, to be Mr. Browne's turn. He is a candidate for the Republican nomination against Roncovieri, and his candidacy seems to be making good headway. This is as it should be, for Mr. Browne has always been a sturdy supporter of good government in San Francisco. His record is good, and his candidacy is commended to his party by The Watchman.

WHICH?

Indifferent Landlordism That Was Different In her "Autobiographical Notes," appearing serially in the American Magazine, the splendid life of a splendid woman, Miss Jane Adams relates this incident in her Hull House experience. She says: "A young man owned a large block in the neighborhood occupied by small tenements and stables unconnected with a street sewer. One of the Hull House residents (it was Miss Addams herself), in a public address on housing reform used this conspicuous block as an example of indifferent landlordism, sparing neither a minute description of the property nor the name of the owner. The young man was justly indignant at this public method of attack and, that we might realize the difficulties of supplying south Italian peasants with modern sanitary improvements, he rashly put the entire tract at the disposal of the Hull House with the statement that if we should choose to use the income from the rents for such improvements we should be throwing the money away. Even when we decided that the houses were so bad that we could not undertake the task of improving them he was game and stuck to the proposition that we should have a free lease.

We finally submitted a plan that the houses should be torn down and the entire tract turned into a playground. The public-spirited owner consented to the plan and the space was cleared and a public playground established. Hull House became responsible for its management for ten years, at the end of which time it was turned over to the city playgrounds commission."

The foregoing becomes especially interesting to Californians when connected with this "different indifferent landlord" in person. A Californian, sojourning in Chicago, sends The Watchman a page from the Chicago Evening Post of June 10th, which goes into the incident more fully. This paper tells that the young man bought the block through an agent without having seen it, in the expectation that it would sometime be wanted for a factory, and had no idea of its condition. That owner was William Kent, Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican candidate for the Republican nomination for congress, in the second district, and his action in making a playground of it was characteristic of the man. It will also be characteristic of him to be hot at The California Weekly for making the incident public, but we venture to do it, not in his interest, but in the interest of sending the right sort of man to Washington, a man whose actions have ever spoken louder for Right Things than his words, although his voice has been heard, too.

A Mean Advantage Of Chas. F. Curry The friends of Charles F. Curry feel outraged at the onslaughts being made on his candidacy in those hallowed precincts, such as the tenderloin, the saloon and the following of Mayor McCarthy, which, by a long sustained political fraternity of feeling, Mr. Curry has felt he had a right to claim as his peculiar preserves. It has been noticed of late that in the saloons of San Francisco the poster pictures of Curry have been disappearing and, in their places, have been placed the likeable likeness of Alden Anderson, the putative candidate of that "organization" that is largely composed of wheels. As Mr. Anderson himself has said, if there be one thing that he likes more than another, it is to see wheels go round. It is even being declared that the efforts making by the Governor of California to stop the fight of the grizzly and the gorilla are being made more to hurt Curry than in defense of the fair name of San Francisco. No doubt the stopping of that fight will hurt more of the friends of Charley Curry than of any other candidate, but that probably is not the reason for gubernatorial action. It will give a pain also to most of the political subordinates of Mr. Herrin. The making of these incursions into Mr. Curry's special preserves at this juncture seems to be taking a mean advantage of an untoward situation, and yet it becomes the duty of The Watchman to make an incursion into his last remaining preserve, the race track fraternity.

It will be remembered that, in Mr. Curry's platform published in the Call, he took strong ground in favor of resurrecting the district fair system and extending State aid thereto. A few facts to refresh the public mind in relation to those fairs may not come amiss. There are forty-five such districts still existing, but in a comatose condition for want of State aid. When they were at their height they were racing propositions in the main, and attracted to them whole circuits of gamblers and confidence men. The last "pull-down" they got was for the year 1894, when they depleted the State treasury to the tune of $100,131. They got that under the Markham administration. Since then neither Governors Budd nor Gage, Pardee nor Gillett, have been willing to turn that rabble loose upon the State or the State treasury. Mr. Curry evidently thinks that by now all except the racing men have forgotten what that carnival of criminality was like. As for the racing interests improving the breeds of horses, that is and always was a myth. The

SOMETHING TO WARM MEN'S HEARTS

Editors California Weekly

Gentlemen: This is truly a great campaign. My past experience in politics rather disgusted me. I gloried in the great principles of the Republican party from the splendid light of that great American and Republican, Abraham Lincoln, who gave "Liberty not only to a class, but who gave hope to all the world, for all future time," who helped to "lift the burden from the shoulders of all men, and give to every man an equal chance," down to the brilliant administration of that dauntless American and Republican who gave us an administration of "even handed justice—the square deal"; the man who hunted the lion of oppressive greed from its lair; who drove the skulking hyena of commercial graft from its prey; who tamed the lumbering elephant of prosperity; the man who dared—and who still dares—to hunt "big game" without fear, and without favor; that man of whom every honest citizen of our beloved nation is proud, Theodore Roosevelt.

But aside from this prime hero of ours, together with a few stalwart, honest and unselfish men, who are fighting in national politics against such tremendous odds, my experience had brought me in contact with so many politicians who were working either for personal, selfish motives, or in behalf of some special interest for which they were liberally rewarded at the hands of the master that bribed their conscience with a few paltry dollars, or with a petty office, that I became discouraged. I came to feel that the great heroes of our nation, for the most part, were confined to the pages of history, or were peacefully resting beneath grassy mounds.

May I be permitted to say, my faith has been restored. My association with the Central Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League; the quality of character I have discovered in the unselfish and honest men composing that committee; their tireless energy and devotion to the interests of the people with no desire to benefit themselves; the exceptionally high standard of men, from a point of honesty and efficiency, who were selected for the endorsement of that League, as candidates for state office; the paramount object of purifying the social and political atmosphere of our glorious State of California; and its practical, effective and honorable effort to free our state from the intolerable and mercenary grasp of the Southern Pacific Political Bureau, have led me to become once more a zealous Republican.

I want to lend a hand in this splendid fight. I want to help purify our party, and redeem our state. I wish every plain citizen who minds his own business more than he ought to for the public good; or rather who fails to recognize political affairs as really a part of his own business, might understand the importance of this great light to the welfare of our party; to the purity and the decency of our homes; to the success of our business, and to our own personal advantage and the perpetuity of our government.

This is the people's fight. This is our opportunity. Every man who respects himself and his neighbor; who loves fairness and decency, who seeks happiness and hopes for the future prosperity of our nation, ought to desert his counter or his desk; drop his tools of industry; leave his plow resting in the furrow of the fields, and go out and take a hand in this battle. Let him "hew to the line, and let the chips fall where they may."

The League has done much, and no small credit is due to The California Weekly, toward awakening the conscience of the people. But too much lethargy exists among the average citizens. Our farmers and our plain business men are not fully aroused. They have not registered. They refuse to give their party affiliations. These things are fatal to a fair choice of the people. Under the direct primary we are playing a new game of politics in which every man has a chance to participate. Our men must register on or before July 26th; they must declare their party affiliations, or they will be disfranchised in this election. The election in this most important campaign in recent days in California is to be held at the primaries, August 16th, not in November. The man who fails to qualify for the August primaries will discover to his regret and chagrin that the battle is all over before he wakes up to the situation. Let us "get busy." It's worth while.

Any California citizen ought to be proud of the opportunity to vote for such men as these:

Hiram W. Johnson for Governor.
A. J. Wallace for Lieutenant Governor.
John D. Works, for United States Senator.
M. C. Sloss and Curtis Wilbur for Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.
Thomas J. Lennon for Justice of the Appellate Bench, First District.
Florence J. O'Brien for Secretary of State.
A. B. Nye for State Controller.
William R. Williams for State Treasurer.
U. S. Webb for Attorney General.
W. S. Kingsbury for Surveyor General.
B. G. Taylor for Clerk of Supreme Court.
Allison Ware for Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Friend W. Richardson for State Printer.
Alex Gordon and John M. Eshleman for Railroad Commissioners.

Each of these men was sought and endorsed by the League for his personal fitness and integrity. All were endorsed without their own personal solicitation for such endorsements at the hands of the League. They ought to be nominated and elected, one and all. If elected, they will give California such a fair and capable administration of public affairs as we have not enjoyed for many a long day.

May I add that this campaign seems to have brought to the surface brave and honest and efficient men of the Lincoln and Roosevelt order, who dare to stand square and above-board for the principles in which we believe. They dare to tell the public what they stand for, and who stands for them. They are telling the people "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." Isn't that refreshing for a political campaign?

Many of these men are sacrificing their time, their business and their money, not for personal gain, not for political preferment, but for principle. I have learned to love and admire many of these men, as all who know them do.

Mr. Johnson is a big, broad-minded, honest, practical, unselfish, energetic American man. He is making a gallant and a winning fight. Mr. William Kent, who has finally consented to sacrifice his time, his business and his comfort, not to beat a petty, spying politician for Congress, but to help advance the just and decent principles of government for which he has so hard and faithfully and successfully fought in Chicago, and National politics in the past, is another big and broad-minded and refined and cultured, honest and true friend of the people. In Congress, where he will go from this Second District, he will be a pride to our State and to our Nation, and he will be a better friend of our President, by far than many of those in whom he is now reposing faith, and who are betraying the President for the sake of the special interests they represent. Mr. Kent will be a true friend to the President.

And the President certainly needs friends in this time of strife, when "big business" threatens to devour the government. If only our men could know what an unselfish and able fellow this man Kent is; how very valuable he would be to our Nation and our State and our District. I feel assured his election would be unanimous. But I am sorry to say it won't be quite unanimous. Mr. Kent says himself he don't expect it to be unanimous. Why, in a little tour through a portion of this district a few days past, we found a man in every town where there was a postoffice, who was not for Kent. There seems to be one man in every postoffice town, holding a Federal job, who seems to think his loyalty to the Government depends upon his loyalty to the Congressman who made that man think he holds his job by grace of the "stand-pat orator of Cannonism;" the sometime Chautauquan lecturer; the conservator of Alaskan coal mines (for personal profit); the congratulator, by telegram, of the reversal of the Schmitz case; the child of the Southern Pacific Political Bureau; the friend of machine politics. No, Mr. Kent's election won't be quite unanimous. But if the growing sentiment in his favor up our way is any indication, he will have plenty of votes to carry him to Congress, and to spare.

Prospects for the election of our ticket are excellent. In Sonoma County alone we have five active clubs with large membership. No other ticket or candidate has a vestige of a club. This spells victory.

Sincerely yours,

R. L. THOMPSON.

Santa Rosa, June 5, 1910.

There was an interesting happening in Pittsburg recently, when a mysterious man, at the risk of his life, saved an oil-spattered chauffeur from burning to death. The Carnegie hero fund commission promptly sought the name of this hero, who had escaped the reporters, and so ran down Albert J. Barr, proprietor of two newspapers, himself a member of the commission. No medal will be voted. Mr. Barr's afternoon paper, not knowing the name of the rescuer, printed a glowing account of his heroic behavior.

When J. R. Conley, whose death at the age of 90 years has just occurred at Surfleet, Lincolnshire, Eng., was 10 years old, his mother presented him with a silk hat and told him to wear it always. He wore the hat indoors and out of doors until the day of his death.

JULIUS GALMANN
NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

The Complete Text of the

REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

NEEDS OF THE CALIFORNIA INDIAN

A PLAN TO SAVE THE VANISHING NATIVE TRIBES

By HUGH W. GILCHRIST

In the early "Thirties" of the past century 200,000 Indians lived in peace and plenty within California. Food was abundant for them and well distributed over the vast area. The remains of their villages show their wide tribal distribution and their peace among themselves.

Dr. C. Hart Merriam, of "The National Biological Survey," spent ten years of exhaustive study of Indian conditions in this state. He says:

"California at the time of its discovery was more densely populated than any other area of equal size in North America. Not only was this the case, but the number of tribes and of distinctive linguistic stocks within its boundaries nearly equaled those of all the rest of the continent north of Mexico."

There were more than 200,000 Indians then—there are 18,000 now. Two periods in particular mark the great decrease. In 1834 the Mission lands were "secularized," and the lands were occupied principally by Spanish-Mexican ranchers. From 1834 to 1849 over 100,000 Indians perished. Then came the gold seekers of '49, and with them came the second swath of death to the Indians. Seventy-seven thousand immigrants came over the mountains in that year. Some of them were men of the noblest type, but more of them were lawless, to whom the Indians were an easy prey.

"The tremendous decrease that has taken place during the last century, a decrease amounting to the complete annihilation of scores of tribes and the reduction to scattered remnants of scores of others, is due wholly to the coming of the white man. It began in the early days of the Mission Padres and has continued to the present time."

"The two destroying armies, Spanish-Mexican ranchers, and American gold seekers, covered practically the whole of California, leaving only the deserts on the east, and these were not wholly exempt."

"Villages were broken up, and the inhabitants massacred or scattered, men and women debauched with whiskey, men were ruthlessly killed, women appropriated, and seeds of disease sown which undermined the constitution of succeeding generations."

Three causes have been the chief contributors to the decimation of the Indians: "Whisky," disease and eviction.

Whisky

The one word the Indians use for all intoxicating drinks is "whisky." Wm. Benson (Indian) said to Capt. Tack, "In the old days our people were kind to each other. They did not quarrel and fight and kill, but since whisky come they fight each other and kill. Captain, we must cut out whisky."

A large number of inquiries were sent out to the Indians themselves about the effect of whisky among them. The following selections are examples of many replies:

"Dear Sir: As you have told me to find out from these Indians here whether it was satisfactory to them to quit drinking intoxicating liquor, and I am evident that they have no contradiction to my request.

"Since I have returned I have only seen one person under the influence of liquor in this Tule River Reservation. I am positive that they will quit using strong drink from this time forth.

"I couldn't answer your letter right away. I had to see the boys one at a time, they are all out at work.

"They are all willing to quit drinking and gambling here.

"SAM GARFIELD, Porterville."

"Most of all the Indians from here do not want whisky, they say it's bad.

"For my part I do wish there would be more people to help to fight this liquor business. Many times I have often thought the government would find a stop to it. Some of the Indians are glad that some help is coming, and hope that it will work for good of my Indian people. Hoping and trusting God, that the work will be pushed along. From your brother in Christ.

"JOSEPH MIGUEL, Morongo"

"When the half-bloods get the whisky, they bring it to the camp and give it to the old people and young ones in camp and this is the way they get it.

"The Indian people have lived here for many years before the white people came here and did not know what whisky was, we get along well without whisky, so let us see what Uncle Sam can do for us Indian people.

"I have talk with my tribe and they are glad if the whisky can be kept from the tribe.

"I know myself if we can't get a law to keep the half-bloods from buying whisky for the Indian people in this county and from my tribe, I am doing all can to keep it from my tribe.

"CAPT. SHERWOOD, Sherwood, Cal."

"Dear Friend:

"In answer to the letters that you wrote to Capt. I. Bucknell, John Dennison and George Vincent, we say:

"We are very glad when we received that good news, that you are trying to help us in the wiskey matter. Not all of us are wiskey drinker: some of us do not drink wiskey, some that have turned in the good Christ way.

"We that have stop from wiskey knows from experience, what wiskey does to us. And this is the fact that is submit to you.

"Wiskey is ruining our homes. Wiskey takes away our hard earned dollars. Wiskey don't makes us keep friends to each others. When wiskey gets into anybody, there is sure to be trouble. Somebody window or door is sure to be smashed. Somebody is sure to be cut or shot. More money that should be spent for food and clothing goes for wiskey. All is the work of wiskey. We do not make wiskey ourself. We do not go in the saloon, and buy wiskey.

"It is the White people, around here that buy wiskey for indian: the road to our camp seem to be free to white people. The way they bring liquor in there and do whatever they please, there is nothing to stop them from doing so, and we will say that ought to be stop.

"We would be glad if you could help us out of this, in some way. And we are willing to help ourself out of this trouble-some wiskey.

"We been thinking this from day to day how we could stop this wiskey from our young boy's, because we know what wiskey is, and what it does to us.

"We do not have much more to say, but we want to have good homes, free from wiskey."

This letter was written and signed by Vicente for himself and thirty-five additional Indians, including the names of the three men as given above and twenty-two other men, and ten women, of Upper Lake, Cal.

A large number of inquiries were sent to Judges and District Attorneys in the thirty-six counties of Northern California in which the Indians chiefly dwell, asking about the Indians as they appear in the court-room and on what charges they are usually arraigned. The almost uniform answer to these inquiries was that they appear as defendants in cases for deeds of violence done while drunk.

Disease

The coming of the white man brought to the Indians diseases which they had not known before. Smallpox and other contagious diseases, tuberculosis and diseases of immorality. The Indians met the worst class of whites principally and have suffered from Anglo-Saxon depravity.

Eviction

Dr. Merriam, whom we quoted above, concludes his address, delivered in San Francisco, in the following strong words:

"The principal cause of the appallingly great and rapid decrease in the Indians of California is not, in my judgment, the number directly slain by the whites, or the number directly killed by whisky or disease, but a much more subtle and dreadful thing: it is the gradual but progressive and relentless confiscation of their lands and homes, in consequence of which they are forced to seek refuge in remote and barren localities, often far from water, usually with an impoverished supply of food, and not infrequently in places where the winter climate is too severe for their enfeebled constitutions. Victims of the aggressive selfishness of the whites, outcasts in the land of their fathers, outraged in their most sacred institutions, weakened in body, broken in spirit, and fully conscious of the hopelessness of their condition, must we wonder that the wail for the dead is often heard in their camps and that the survivors are passing swiftly away?"

The causes given above are responsible in the highest degree for the destruction of the Indian people, reducing their number from 200,000 in the middle of the last century to 18,000 now.

Land

The Federal Government has appropriated $150,000 for the purchase of land for homeless Indians. Mr. C. E. Kelsey, special representative of the government, has almost completed the purchase of these lands. The amount of money allows but a small tract per person, little more than enough for a place of residence and a garden. The title to these tracts will pass to the Indians after twenty-five years. Much is yet to be done in adjusting the Indians in the national forests and upon the reservations for better home conditions. We who have had our settled homes from childhood can hardly appreciate the Indian's sufferings because of his homeless state. On the land where their fathers lived in peace, they sometimes have no other place left to them but the public roads—shut out from wood and water and from the oak groves where, today, the white man's hogs eat the red man's bread.

Three years ago Capt. Tack said at the Indian conference, "I fifty-two, fifty-three year old. Never had home. When I little kid, 500 my people. Now 110 my people. I see them all go away." This past year Captain was again at the Indian conference at Mount Hermon. In the meantime land had been secured for him and his people. He tried to tell his feelings when at last he had a home. He said, I go on land. I say, 'Tack, this your land. You got home now.' Then I say, 'No, Tack, you got no home. This just beautiful dream.' When I get that land no sleep four nights. Feel just like bird, have wings, fly."

Common Schools

The laws of California make special reference to the Indians in only two regards. It is forbidden to sell intoxicating drinks to the Indian people, and supervisors are granted the privilege of establishing special schools for them, as for Japanese and other foreigners. It is worthy of note that they are counted in the school census, for the appropriation for school purposes is measured by the number of children, and in this an Indian counts. But the same Indian children are usually forbidden or prevented from attending the school. This is sometimes the fault of the Indian parents, sometimes through the ugliness of the white children, sometimes it is the fault of the supervisors. There is need for a thorough consideration of this subject by our legislators and public men, in order to develop a proper public sentiment upon the subject, provide more sufficient laws, if that is necessary, and insure a reasonable justice to the Indian people.

Of the 14,000 Indians in Northern California over 10,000 are outside of educational privileges. There are in Northern California four government boarding schools and seven government day schools, but the entire provision for their education reaches a comparatively small number of them.

Religious Privileges

The Missions of California, remaining from Spanish days, are now doing almost nothing for the Indian people. In a few places the Catholic Church is giving them attention. Beside the Catholic Church the Presbyterian denomination has five missions, the Methodist Church four, the Episcopal three stations, the Baptist one and the California Indian Association one. Most of these missions were begun by the Indian Association and, when established, passed over to some one of the denominations.

There are in Northern California ten field

HONOLULU and back first class from San Francisco

The splendid steamship SIERRA (own screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, July 9, July 20th and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sails from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING
CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits..... 435,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco) 526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital.....$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash..... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909.....38,610,731.93
Total Assets41,261,682.21
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President, Emil Rohte; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, George Tourny; Assistant Secretary, A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohte, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Hoyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Hoyer, Manager.

matrons under government employ, who give a considerable amount of religious instruction, but all of these agencies reach only about 4,000 Indians.

The Indian Industrial School

There is need in Northern California, situated within easy reach of as many bands of Indians as possible, of an Indian Industrial School, in which the students should learn to raise grain, fruit, vegetables and stock, and be taught carpentry and blacksmithing, sewing and housekeeping, house and home-making, sanitation and hygiene and the care of person and property, the value of pure air and a pure heart, and the likeness to Christ, while at the same time learning to speak, write and use the English language, and pursue other lines of education necessary to the industrial citizenship and home life of the Indian people.

The course of training must be adapted to develop the native Indian abilities and fit the students severally to lift up their home tribes. Therefore, the Indian student during his training should not have his eye on the white man's town, but on the Indian's rancheria, and when he is qualified in character and education to fill a place among his people now filled by a white worker, the Indian should have the place.

It is but a reasonable justice that 1,000 acres of land, more or less, should be provided for such a school and that a permanent fund of about $100,000 should be secured to provide for its operation. There are in Northern California in thirty-six counties, 13,991 Indians, scattered in 218 bands. There is no way to reach these Indians so widely scattered without the help of the Indians themselves. It is necessary to select young Indians of ambition and ability and train them for their own people. We must appreciate that the racial law still prevails with the Indians as with other races. It is necessary to cultivate in the Indian people the spirit of self-help. The help that really helps. The Indian race must climb for itself. Only the self-raised stay up. No amount of lifting power by the white race can put the Indian on a civilized plane and retain him there, unless the Indian has struggled hard for himself and for his people.

Will the Indians Make Good?

This, after all, is the fundamental question. There is good reason to believe that they will make good. Men who have employed them on their ranches and elsewhere almost uniformly pronounce them faithful and competent. There have been four Indian conferences at Mount Hermon. In each of these conferences they have shown marked interest for themselves, individually, for their bands and for the Indians as a whole. The men and women who have been there have also made good progress in the ability to understand and deal with the Indian situation. In the first council they showed but little initiative, in the second they displayed more, in the third they helped their own sessions and continued sometimes far into the night discussing questions of land tenure, and how to transmit the land from father to sons, and kindred questions. There are leaders developing among the Indian people and if these are properly trained they will develop good ability and willingness to help solve the Indian problem of California. Shall they have this help?

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

race-horse bears a similar relation to his reputable equine brother that the coyote bears to a well bred collie or St. Bernard. As Caspar Whitney says of the race-horse, "He is a craven at 2, a rogue at 3 and a wreck at 4." He is only good to split the wind with, that does not need splitting, for a mile or two and then he is all in. It was thought that fairs could not exist without racing, but it was the racing and attendant evils that killed the fairs all over the United States. Fairs are being resurrected now, but on different lines. It is not to the advocates of the new order that Mr. Curry is making appeal, but to the old and that order is in bad odor.

Rubber Stamps

10 CENTS PER LINE

AT Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES, AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do. To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper	James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper	Mark L. Requa
Thomas Jennings	J. H. Skinner
James K. Lynch	Rudolph Spreckels
Walter S. Martin	John W. Van Bergen
J. K. Moffitt	Rolla V. Watt
S. G. Murphy	Clinton E. Worden
George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

MONDAY came. Jess was at her desk hours before it was time to open school; and Archer, too, was there in ample season; but although he delayed ringing the bell until past nine o'clock no other child appeared. "Perhaps they will come at recess," he said to himself, consolingly, "or in the afternoon"; and he continued to pace impatiently up and down the aisles looking out of the doors and windows, but not another child came near the schoolhouse all day long.

The teacher was despondent. It had not occurred to him that any people would build and furnish a schoolhouse so expensively and yet not send a single child to school; for Jess had come because she would come and not at all for being sent. Josiah Bartlett had not exacted a promise from the people of Wilkerson's Flats that, having provided house and teacher, they would also send their children to school; and the omission seemed likely to prove fatal to his plans.

Jess was dismissed early that night, and Archer set off upon a tour of personal solicitation through the settlement. "Jess," he called, at parting, "do you suppose that any of the people can be induced to send their children to school?"

"I reckon the 'em won't keer much erbout it," was the reply; and, seeing the mists gathering in the child's eyes, he bade her good-night and rode away upon his errand.

The teacher was received civilly enough wherever he went; but all his invitations to the children to come to school or to their parents to send them were answered in the selfsame words: "I reckon we don't keer much erbout it." Jess had given him the key to the situation. It was in vain that Archer enlarged upon the advantages which education conferred, the broadened existence, power obtained, beauties of poetry, enchantments of romance, one's duty to the State—in short, when his powers of persuasion were finally exhausted and he stood helpless before them, his only reward was a drawling repetition of the stolid refrain: "I reckon we don't keer much erbout it."

Royal Archer went to his boarding place with a heavy heart that night, and his spirits were not elevated by the inevitable bacon, hot biscuits and black coffee which were set before him; but he was desperately hungry, ate heartily, and went to bed with a stomach as heavy as his heart.

"Feed my sheep." But what if they will not come and eat? "Feed Jess." What, spend the whole year feeding one little lamb? Was his mission to be so very humble? What wonder that Matilda had thought him unworthy of the better-paying charges! How she would laugh were she to know of his teaching one little, ill-clad child of poverty away off up there in the jack-oak hills! A hen with one chicken, truly! "Feed my sheep! Feed Jess"; and Archer slept.

Morning came, and with it came a breakfast of hot biscuits, fried bacon swimming in fat and a big cup of black coffee. The young man's soul began to abhor this fare as the souls of Israel abhorred the manna of old; but Archer felt quite sure this food came not down from heaven. He rode away to the schoolhouse at the appointed hour oppressed by a sense of dread and a heavier sense of humiliation at his inability to lead and feed this soul-famishing people.

Jess was at the schoolhouse before him. "I reckon they don't keer much erbout our school, Jess," he called, with a feeble attempt at humor as he passed to the shed.

"I reckon," the child replied, and Archer noticed that her eyes were red and eyelids swollen; but she went at once to her desk and appeared to be absorbed in her books.

It was a heavy day for Archer. The morning hours were passed in mentally reviewing the experiences of the previous day to see if by some chance he might not hit upon some avenue which would lead him to the hearts of the settlers of Wilkerson's Flats; but in whichever way he directed his thoughts the prospect appeared equally trackless. Bending forward upon his desk and burying his face in his arms he gave himself up to unqualified despondency, for, after all, was he not himself a failure?

How long he had remained in that position he did not know, for in the depth of his dejection he had been oblivious of all things;

THE REGENERATION OF WILKERSON'S FLATS

BY

ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY

but by and by there was a pressure of a hand upon his arm and, looking up, he found Jess standing before him, her long lashes wet with tears and a look of anguish upon her face unspeakably pathetic.

"Be yer goin' ter quit?" she asked, her lip quivering and her bosom swelling; "I allow as maybe I kin fetch some of 'em ef you'll let me try."

"Feed my sheep. Feed Jess!" A sudden determination possessed Archer, and, taking both her hands in his, "No, Jess," he declared, "I shall not give up the school. If it please God I will stay the whole year through to teach you, only you, if you will come to me. This house shall not have been built wholly in vain, and this people shall not be given up to senseless ignorance forever"; and he fell to teaching Jess, and never did teacher have pupil more apt or pupil have teacher more deeply in earnest.

As soon as her lessons were over that afternoon Jess galloped away to Scruggins's place to try what she might do toward increasing the attendance at Archer's school.

"Howdy, Mis' Scruggins," Jess called, as she drew rein at the door of a little double cabin of logs with weather-worn slabs to cover the cracks.

"Howdy, Jess, won't yer light? How's that ar school gittin' on we've been so pestered erbout?"

"Right peert, mum, only thar ain't nobody thar 'cep'n but me; but I gits erlong right smart."

"Much good may yer edication do yer when yer done got it, Jess; but as fer our chillun, I reckon they won't keer much erbout it. Peers like er body ain't so contented like when they's edicated. These hyer hills hain't nowhar near good enough for Mis' Borden 'nd never has been."

"Yer eats peaches 'nd sech like when ye kin git 'em, don't yer, Mis' Scruggins?—Howdy, Nance," Jess called to a tall, barefooted girl who came lumbering across the teetering puncheons with which the narrow portico was floored.

"In cose I eats 'em when I kin git 'em," the mother replied, making room for her visitor beside her on the stoop; "but sech like ain't no ways common hyerabouts, I'm tellin' ye."

"Yer eats 'em 'cause ye likes 'em, don't yer?" Jess asked, dropping a partially opened book by her side with apparent unconcern.

"Speets I does; fer ef I didn't like 'em I wouldn't eat 'em, that's shore."

"Well, that's like me erbout school. I goes 'cause I likes ter powerful bad, 'nd I wouldn't ef I didn't."

"Nance, yer ought ter come over some day, it's the mostest fun."

"What's this yer got hyer, Jess?" the girl asked, looking at the open book.

"Oh! that's a book the teacher giv' me ter tek home. He's got heaps er pertier books than that ar, 'nd with pertier picters in 'em, too."

"Lem-me see it," the girl demanded; and Jess pushed the book toward her as though it were a matter of no concern, but not without taking care to have it opened at an illustration of startling interest.

"What's that ar?"

"Monkeys."

"Well, I reckon I kin 'spicion as much, but what on arth be the critters er doin'?" asked the girl, looking at the picture intently. Mrs. Scruggins, too, became sufficiently interested to pull the book from the daughter's hand and gaze at the picture with a half-interested stare; but Jess made no haste to satisfy their slowly quickening curiosity.

Hello, Burt!" Jess called, as she caught sight of a half-grown youth, leading his broncho out of the horse lot, preparatory to going after the cows. "Hain't yer got time ter drap roun' 'nd say howdy? The notion might tek me ter give that plug o' yours a chance ter try his legs keep'n up with me while I runs in our critters."

"'Twouldn't be perlite fer me ter leave yer else you mightn't be able ter find yer critters, fer the dust I'd be kick'n up ahead of ye," the youth retorted good-naturedly, as he came shuffling up leading his raw-boned but agile broncho. "What's that ar ye got?" he asked, catching sight of the book and picture.

"What's all this 'stravergance erbout anyway, Jess?" Mrs. Scruggins demanded.

"Them? Oh, them ar's monkeys erslingin' cocoanuts down at the natives. That's the way the natives picks the crap, fer the trees are too tall and straight ter climb handy like; so they runs the monkeys up the trees and slings sticks at 'em, and the monkeys slings the cocoanuts back, kinder lightin' like—jes what the natives was a-projeckin' fer all the time."

"Them ain't no natives, them's niggers. I reckon I knows niggers when I sees 'em ef I don't know nothing else out'n a book," the mother declared. "But they be dretful cunnin', the little varmints!" And mother and children gazed with absorbing interest upon the old, old picture.

"The teacher's got a power of books with a heap funnier pictures than this hyer," Jess remarked, as she turned the leaves, stopping at each illustration that all might see, commenting as she went along; then, raising her eyes suddenly to the mother's, "How's Mis' Borden?" she asked.

A shadow passed over the woman's countenance, but cleared away in a moment, and she replied: "Peert enough. I reckon. I hear how she was powerful set agin the school till the teacher axed to board thar. 'Peers like she'd want it to go on ef she 'lowed edication's sech a a blessin' as she's been lettin' on these twenty years."

"Wonder what Mis' Borden would say ef Nance 'nd me 'ud spurt up suddn't like 'nd read better out'n the Bible than she kin some Sunday mawnin'," Jess remarked, half musingly, as she slowly turned the leaves of her book. This had been Mrs. Borden's not unwelcome task for many years; for it was seldom that even an itinerant minister came into the settlement, and the people were quite religious after their manner.

"I reckon she'd die afore meetin' was out," was the startling prediction of Mrs. Scruggins. "The way that woman's lorded over the settlement 'cause she kin read er bit 'nd we-all cayn't is plumb scan'lous. But I reckon Nance won't keer much erbout it," she added, dubiously, raising her eyes to her daughter's with a look not so expressive of desire for her child's enlightenment as of satisfaction at the possible taking down of Mrs. Borden. Mrs. Scruggins was not without decision of character, and but for what she regarded as the too officious forwardness of Mrs. Borden, she might easily have been the first lady in the settlement.

"Mis' Borden cayn't read nothin' like teacher kin," Jess declared at length. "He don't read this a-way: 'And I saw and h-e-a-r—heard, an e-a-g—eagle, flyin' in mid h-e-a-v—heavens, sayin' with a great v-o-i—voice, wo, wo, wo.' He reads same as talkin' and 'lows he kin teach me ter read better'n Mis' Borden agin spring; and Nance kin learn as quick as I kin."

Mrs. Borden's Scripture lessons were always taken from Genesis or Revelations, and were so little varied that Jess knew most of them by heart. The worthy lady had not ventured far from either cover, doubtless through fear of losing her place irretrievably.

"Nance kin go ef she wants ter," Mrs. Scruggins at length declared, heaving a sigh of such pronounced indifference that her daughter hastened to capitulate upon the best terms she could. The prospect of a Scruggins outdoing Mrs. Borden in her chosen field was not to be lightly thrust aside.

"I'll go ef Burt will," Nance announced, with

(Continued on Next Page.)

Why not have the Best Newspaper

The Weekly Edition

OF THE

Springfield Republican

MASSACHUSETTS

Sixteen Broad Pages for
Only $1 a Year

THE LEADING NEW ENGLAND JOURNAL

A college professor writes to The Republican: "In the three months during which I have been receiving The Weekly Republican I have been so impressed with its vigor, fairness and worth that it seems to me folly not to keep it coming."

A reader in Illinois writes: "The Weekly Republican certainly is different from all newspapers I have ever taken, and I think far superior."

These tributes, selected from hundreds of letters received during the past year, are suggestive of the satisfaction which subscribers to The Weekly Republican derive from their favorite newspaper.

This famous independent New England journal, established in 1824 by Samuel Bowles, appeals strongly to a thoughtful, intelligent class of readers. Its able, vigorous editorials are quoted all over the country, and cover every range of human interest.

The complete news service, local and general, of The Daily and Sunday Republican is drawn on for the Weekly's record of the world's events, while special departments in charge of experts treat of literature, art, music and the drama, science and invention, education, the interests of women, recreation and out-door sports, progressive agriculture and forestry. Travel sketches, handsomely illustrated, and original stories add to the interest and charm of this high-class home paper.

The subscription rates are, for The Weekly $1 a year. Daily $8. Sunday $2.

Specimen Copies of either Edition sent free on application. The Weekly Republican will be sent free for one month to any one who wishes to try it.

All subscriptions are payable in advance. Address

THE REPUBLICAN,
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

("Wilkerson's Flats"—Continued.)

a boldness born of the conviction that Burt would not and could not be made to go.

"Oh! you'll go won't you, Burt? You'll go ter please me, 'nd thar ort er be one man in the settlement as kin read and not leave it all ter the women. Come, Burt, let's go after the cows. Burt'll go, Nance. I'll drap by fer ye in the mawnin';" and away the youngsters went at a breakneck pace on their iron-willed though surefooted California horses.

With only Burt to win over, Jess knew that she was mistress of the situation. She had laid her plans thoughtfully, and having conquered unequivocally, knew no better way of celebrating her victory than by distancing bantering Burt in a half-mile dash.

Jess took affairs into her own hands in school the next day, sparing no pains to keep the Scruggins contingent thoroughly interested; and Archer, perceiving the policy of it, gave her the fullest liberty, with the result that Nancy and Burt went home that night as nearly enthusiastic over their school as was consistent with the prevailing apathy of Wilkerson's Flats.

Other visits were paid by Jess on successive nights to other neighbors, but her successes were achieved in small measure and by slow degrees; for at the end of a fortnight the roll contained the names of only six new pupils. Still the child's zeal knew no flagging, and her little head was busy devising plans for bringing recruits into the school.

II.

"Kin ye sing?" Jess asked Archer one evening, as they were riding toward his boarding place.

"Yes, a little. Why?"

"Ef you'd start a singin' school?"

"Would they 'keer much erbout it,' do you reckon?" he asked, quizzically.

"I reckon they would, and a heap. They'd come from mos' everywhere. Ye fiddles, too, don't yer? I hear how Mis' Borden said ye had a fiddle but didn't fiddle none; but I 'lowed ef ye had a fiddle ye'd fiddle sometimes when ye felt like it."

"Why, yes, I have a violin; but the truth is I haven't felt so very much like playing since coming to Wilkerson's Flats."

"Kin ye fiddle real good? Kin ye beat Bud Larkin, do ye reckon? Bud's a power at fiddlin'. Grandpap says thar ain't no man in the Flats kin hold a candle to him, and Grandpap ain't called no bad fiddler hisself."

"Why, Jess, I do not know whether I can beat your crack performer or not, I am sure; but my friends have said that I play very well. But," he added, a little suspicious as to what might be coming, "I never play for dances. Most of my music is religious or classical."

"'Ligious fiddlin'!" exclaimed Jess. "I never hearn tell of that afore; but it'll be right peert. We-uns be powerful 'ligious. Ef you'd give out thar'd be singin' school Saturday evenin', and then, kinder keerless like, pick up your fiddle 'nd drap 'em a chune beatin' Bud Larkin scan'lous, everybody'd sen' thar chillun ter school and come themselves ef you axed 'em. But ef ye cayn't beat Bud Larkin 'tain't no use ter say fiddle ter nobody. Cayn't ye fetch yer fiddle over this evenin' so Grandpap kin hear ye oncet?" Archer assented readily enough, and Jess cantered off home, greatly solicitous as to the quality of her teacher's "fiddlin'."

Archer kept his appointment and arrived at Old Ben Ware's just as the sun went down. "I came by invitation of Jess," he said apologetically, accepting a stool she had brought into the dooryard and beginning at once to tighten his bow and put his instrument in tune. Little attention was paid to his coming, and if he had waited for an invitation to play he had waited until doomsday.

"What can I play that will reach these people?" he mused, as he improvised a strain of one and then another quality. "Anything classical will certainly be lost, and as for sacred music, I am sure I haven't an idea what they are familiar with. How stupid that I did not inquire of Jess! Let me see, though, Old Ben and Grandmother there came originally from Tennessee, not so very far from the border, I think he told me. Wonder if they will remember this"—and he struck boldly off into "Old Kentucky Home."

Not many measures had floated out between the oaks toward the brown, grassy hills before pipes came out of listening mouths, if mouths which are distended rapturously may properly be said to listen, and lank forms gathered near and squatted upon the ground. Even the hounds forsook their vigils at the gate and, sprawling at the player's feet, wagged their tails and blinked their eyes in conscious approval.

Archer had made a hit and knew it; but without waiting for a breath to be drawn switched suddenly off upon the "Mocking Bird," a tune that every one who fiddles fiddles as soon and as often as ever he can, and which the young man shrewdly conjectured would be Bud Larkin's strong suit; and he played with all the skill he could command. He did not greatly care for the piece except for the opportunity it gave for a display of skill in execution, and it served its purpose.

"I reckon Bud Larkin will have to put another kink in that ar bow of his'n afore he kin ekill that ar," one of the young men drawled, as the concluding strains died away.

"'Ekil that ar!" exclaimed Old Ben Ware, rising from his seat and reaching his clenched hand high above his head—"ekill that ar!" Bud Larkin ain't nowhar! Stranger, give me yer han'. Thar ain't no man what kin fiddle like that ar what Old Ben won't be a friend to ary day in the week. I'm proud ter know ye."

The vehemence of the old man's coming over nearly took Archer's breath away; but when each man, woman and child in that numerous household formed in solemn procession and, filing by, shook him by the hand with a fervor little short of devotional, the ludicrousness of it became irresistible, and the hero broke the spell with a peal of laughter such as had not awakened the sleepy echoes at the Flats for many a day; but the verdict was in and the victory won.

The fame of the teacher's playing went out through all the Flats the very next day. Some were incredulous, and some, relying upon the vehement proclamations of Old Ben Ware, did what they could to belittle the performances of Bud Larkin and extol the musical prowess of the teacher whose playing they had not heard. Others stood by their local hero and professed to having repeatedly noticed that Old Ben liked best the thing he heard last; but upon one point all were agreed, and if the teacher was really going to start a singing school and would "drap a chune er two," at the beginning, they would be there to hear him.

The appointed day came, and the people began to arrive before it was yet dark. How they came or where they came from was a mystery; but, for the first time in its history, the schoolhouse became filled almost to bursting.

Archer opened the school with a familiar talk on music. He spoke of it as one of the chief blessings which God had given, and how precious it is to those who love it. He thought, too, that people who loved music could learn to love other of God's blessings not less sweet—finally closing his remarks by saying that there were musicians in the world the latches of whose shoes he would be unworthy to loosen, and they must not expect too much from him; but he would gladly teach them all he knew.

He took up his violin. It was an old instrument, an heirloom in the family, and its tones were sweet and clear and strong. He thrummed the strings, turned one a hair, tightened his bow and swung grandly out into the full current of "Sweet By and By." It had always been a favorite, but he had never rendered it better than then; and yet he was not without misgivings as to its effect upon the audience. His ear had detected sounds of half-smothered turbulence in the back part of the house, and there were faces bearing expressions which he did not like to see; but with the first clear notes all was hushed and the performer had his audience at command. Perceiving this, he did not stop at the conclusion of the piece to permit a verdict to be formed, but glided softly into "Hush, My Babe, Lie Still and Slumber."

They were a simple people, these "Wilkerson

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Attorney General

Those who have followed this course in citizenship will remember that we dropped the state officers in order carefully to analyze the new direct primary law. This done we return to the form of government of the State of California and the functions of the state officers who constitute the executive department of that government. One of the most important of these is the Attorney General.

As suggested a number of times in the course of these lessons, and will be suggested at intervals hereafter, the framers of our state constitution would have done better to follow more closely the general form of the national government. For instance, our state constitution declares that the governor, "Shall see that the laws are faithfully executed," yet the constitution and the laws give him small power and responsibility in executing the laws. The Attorney General, the chief law officer upon whom he must rely for legal advice, is not of his own selection and therefore not entirely responsible to him either for how he conducts his office or for how he aids the chief executive in seeing that the laws are executed. The Attorney General of the state is elected by the people of the state and derives his authority from and is responsible to the same source of power that the governor himself does. He is a co-ordinate but independent official. He should be appointed by the governor, be made responsible to him and hold office at his pleasure. When the "short ballot" comes this will be so.

The duties of the Attorney General are, in part, to attend the supreme court and prosecute or defend, as the interests of the state may require, all causes to which any state officer is a party, and all causes to which any county may be a party, see to it that the decrees of the court in the state's interest are carried into effect, keep a proper docket of all the cases in which he is employed, exercise supervisory powers over district attorneys and require reports from them relating to public business; to give his written opinion on any question of law to the legislature, or to any of the executive officers or institutions of the state, or to the district attorneys when called upon for it, and, when given, such opinion has the force of law in the absence of a judicial decision to the contrary.

When, in the opinion of the Attorney General, it is necessary to institute suit to collect judgments due the state, he may institute such suits and, when required by the public service or directed by the governor, he must repair to any county in the state to assist the District Attorney of such county in the discharge of his duties; he is ex-officio member of the State Board of Examiners and of the State Lunacy Commission, and he must make biennial reports to the governor of the business of his office.

There are certain boards that have power to employ attorneys of their own, such as the Board of Regents of the State University and the State Board of Harbor Commissioners. In such cases the Attorney General is exempt from service on behalf of such boards.

Now it is manifest that no one lawyer, however able, can do all the work required of this office. Therefore, the legislature has authorized the Attorney General to engage the services of one assistant, one chief deputy and three other deputies. In addition to these he may appoint attorneys to discover and recover property anywhere found that should escheat to the state through want of heirs, but these can be paid no more than 10 per cent of the value of such estate, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of it.

In addition to the above force the Attorney General may employ two clerks, one phonographic reporter, two stenographers, finally a porter. Aside from the Attorney General, his office comprises eleven persons, including the porter, and there is probably enough for them all to do.

For many years the main office of the Attorney General has been maintained at San Francisco, while at the state capitol there is maintained one deputy and one clerk. The Attorney General himself divides his time between the two offices as pressure of business requires. The code provides that the Attorney General, in common with other state officers, shall reside in Sacramento, but he does not, and some others do not, and the legislature recognizes that they need not by authorizing them to rent offices in San Francisco and pay the rent for the same out of the state treasury.

There are certain specific duties imposed upon the Attorney General from time to time by the legislature, not necessary to be set forth here, but enough has been said to show the general and very essential functions the office performs for the state.

HICHBORN'S BOOK

Here and there, scattered throughout the State, are men who were members of the last Legislature and who would like to be re-elected. These men have made records by which they may, and should, be either approved or condemned, and at this critical time in California's history there is no intelligent and honest voter who can afford to neglect or overlook these records. Fortunately, for the first time in our history, they are written down in readable black and white, and are accessible to all men, in Franklin Hichborn's "Story of the Legislature of 1909." That it is a book which no man who loves his commonwealth, and desires to vote intelligently in its interest, can afford to be without, is a fact which cannot be too much emphasized. Its arguments are unanswerable, its facts undebatable. The California Weekly can supply it for $1.25, and you cannot afford to be without it.

Theodore Roosevelt's favorite heroes are Timoleon, the Corinthian who overthrew the Tyrants of Sicily in the fourth century B. C.; Hampden, the English patriot, and Washington and Lincoln.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE

Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.

1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Ha. Ford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tele. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary $50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

This Week: "STATE INSTITUTION FOR HABIT VICTIMS"

—By I. R. E. Bering

THE CALIFORNIA- WEEKLY: JUNE 24 : '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH-GOOD COURAGE-GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance No. 31.

The Man With Charm

IT IS IN "WHAT EVERY WOMAN KNOWS," that rueful Maggie says, "Charm is that which if a woman has it matters little what she has not, and if she have it not it matters little what she has." So with a man. Ray Stannard Baker, in the July American Magazine, gives a pen portrait of the President that everyone should read. The President has been more adequately limned by Baker than by anyone else. Our President is a man of matchless personal charm, a splendidly capable lieutenant, but an indifferent captain, and for the reason that his environment has been such all his life that he never had to stand alone. Now he can't.

The Amended Rules

THE VICTORY OF INSURGENCY in the House of Representatives was made complete when the majority was empowered, without consent of the speaker or of the rules committee, to call any bill from any committee and discharge the committee from further consideration of it to the end that the house itself consider it. It was, more than anything else, the abuse of the power of the speaker to put measures distasteful to him in cold storage that goaded the insurgent spirit to exasperation. With that power gone "Uncle Joe" will more resemble a rooster whose tail feathers have been left in pawn with a coyote than the dreaded Czar of the House.

Pinchot To Lend a Hand

IT IS GOOD TO KNOW that Gifford Pinchot is coming to lend a hand in the Kent campaign, and it is to be hoped that former Secretary Garfield may come also. Why not? The President will do all in his power to secure the renomination of McKinlay, for the reason that he has proven himself useful as a spellbinding apologist for the Payne-Aldrich tariff. By the way, a special verification deputy, circulating Mr. Kent's petition in Napa county, out of fifty-five Republicans interviewed, found two who expressed the intent to vote for McKinlay, five or six others who were undecided, while forty-seven not only signed Mr. Kent's petition, but "rose to it like a trout to a fly," albeit with consequences less serious to the trout.

Mr. Justice Moody

JUSTICE MOODY OF THE SUPREME COURT of the United States is an invalid. Congress has passed a special bill enabling him to retire from the bench on full pay that a place may be made for a man capable of performing his judicial duties. Congress should go farther and offer a bounty to those who, having reached the age of superannuation, neglect to avail themselves of its privileges. That court should be constituted of men in their prime that they keep step with the march of national progress.

Their Differing Ways

MR. CURRY CARRIES FORWARD his campaign chiefly by "passing the word down the line"; Mr. Anderson's sponsors post bills and issue orders; Mr. Stanton keeps the public guessing what he is likely to do next; Mr. Ellery keeps up a constant sound of sizzling of hot iron in cold water; Mr. Johnson wages his way to victory by going to the Men of California and meeting them face to face, answering all their questions and opening his heart to them man to man. Johnson, better than any of the others, will know the People of California at first hand, and they will know him to love him. He plays no game and acts no part. He is the part he stands for. He lives it, feels it, believes it and, when elected, will fulfil it to the letter. Johnson's way is the best.

Making a Fool of the Law

IN THE CASE OF THE PEOPLE of Illinois against Browne, charged with bribing legislators to vote for Lorimer for United States Senator, the court held evidence showing that the legislative "jackpot" was opened in St. Louis inadmissible for the reason that St. Louis is beyond the jurisdiction of the court—just across the river. That is probably the law, but what a fool it makes of the law! And what business opportunities that precedent affords those who would influence legislation in California by the old-time use of cash! All that the bribers will have to do to ply their trade without harm will be to establish their cashier's office at Reno. If the law were less to be trifled with it would be more to be obeyed.

To Fight Local Option

THE ROYAL ARCH has thrown down the gauntlet in opposition to that local option which seeks to drive saloons out of residential districts. The challenge should be met with acceptance as often as tendered. If there be any right that should never be questioned it is the right of a residential neighborhood to shut out of that neighborhood tanyards, boiler factories, houses of ill repute and saloons. The home is the social unit. Without its protection civilization is not to be hoped for. Good citizenship should fight the issue out on that line if it takes forty years in the wilderness of McCarthyism to reach the promised land.

Nevada and the Fight

PUBLIC CENSURE should be lenient with Nevada. For many years it has been a pocket borough of the Southern Pacific Company and therefore has had small opportunity to develop a moral sense. We should think leniently also of the governor of Nevada. Our governor stopped the fight because it was manifestly going to be a fight, but he could not have lawfully done so had it been evident that it was to be only a fake. But the governor of Nevada is powerless to stop the fight because it is to be a fight, though he might stop it if he could prove that it is going to be a fake. It will be both of 'em.

How Very Mum!

THE LEAST THAT WAS ANTICIPATED from Mayor McCarthy when he came home to find that Governor Gillett had deprived him of the great intellectual treat of the year, the Jeffries-Johnson "contest," was that he would roar so loud as to drown the rush of the wind and the pounding of the breakers upon the beach. Timid folk anticipated that the Mayor and San Francisco would undertake to lick the governor and his state. To the contrary the Mayor contented himself with a calm and dignified protest and then went away back and sat down and kept still. When a stern front is presented to the low quality lawless element how quickly it wilts! The whole fighting fraternity has slunk out of sight.

To Governor Gillett, Greeting

Your action in regard to prize fighting in California was splendidly, albeit a little tardily taken, but there is another iniquity more demoralizing than prize fighting. The constitution which you have sworn to uphold declares that you "shall see that the laws are faithfully executed." You cannot be unmindful of the fact that there has been graft in San Francisco; that a board of supervisors was debauched entire; that a former mayor was convicted of felony and released on technicality; that one Abe Ruef is under conviction, yet out on bail and leisurely taking appeal; that known grafters have been so emboldened by their success as to venture to show their faces at all kinds of public functions, not excluding doing the honors of the city of San Francisco to the chief executive of the nation; that the guilt of these persons is as certainly known as that the prize fights you have placed under ban were fights and not sparring matches; that the District Attorney of San Francisco is averse to prosecuting these malefactors of great wealth and social position; that, in the seclusion of the woods across the boundary line to the north, there basks an important witness in these cases who is evidently being paid to keep outside the jurisdiction of the court; that nevertheless the deposition of this witness, taken to preserve his testimony in the event of his assassination or purchase by higher-ups, is extant. Why not, therefore, order your Attorney General to take charge of these cases in San Francisco as you ordered him to act in the prize fight cases? Why not order him to sift these cases to the bottom and report to you and the public what chance there is for securing convictions in instances where guilt is not even candidly denied? Can you be true to your constitutional obligations and refrain from this action? If you are now acting under the impulse of an awakened moral enthusiasm, as your friends and admirers claim that you are, why not extend that enthusiasm toward vindicating the law in these cases where failure to convict has done the state and its metropolis infinitely more injury in the eyes of the world than holding a dozen prize fights could inflict? If your moral enthusiasms are quickened this call to duty must roar in your ears like the breaking of seas upon the shores of the state that has honored you with the highest office within its power to give. The time is short. The crucial issue is to be heard on habeas corpus by the Superior Court on Tuesday next. Unless you act with that intrepidity for which you are noted irreparable injury may be done. Guilty men may be placed beyond reach of human justice, fortunately not of divine. If this happens you cannot be held guiltless, and neither can your Attorney General.

Give the Governor Power

Let the blunt truth be told. On the 9th of June, to a Call reporter at the Fairmont Hotel, over which the Governor's pennant was flying, Governor Gillett said: "I have made up my mind not to discuss the matter (the Jeffries-Johnson fight) at all. It is not of sufficient importance to pay any attention to." Exactly one week later that same uninterested Governor delivered a solar plexus to the whole fighting fraternity and put them out of commission. What it was that came over the spirit of the Governor's dreams during that week this paper does not know, but it was a mighty good thing. Criticism has been indulged in because the Governor spoke of calling out the National Guard to enforce his order. Perhaps that may have been farther than was necessary for him to go, but when local authorities fail of their duty the Governor has no instrument to use other than the

THE STAFF
A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager
 Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 1014.
 Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.
 Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.
 Sample copies sent free on request.
 News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.
 Advertising rates submitted on application.
 Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.
 Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.
 The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moor, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

National Guard, and it must be remembered that District Attorney Fickert had publicly refused to interfere, that Mayor McCarthy had publicly aligned himself with the fight promoters and that Chief of Police Martin had expressed his sympathy with both his superiors. The Governor had reason to believe that the peace-preserving forces of San Francisco would be exerted on behalf of the fighters and not in opposition to them. The Governor of every state should have a state marshal and a trained state constabulary to enable him to discharge his constitutional obligation to "see that the laws are faithfully executed." The Governor's action will probably put an end to the prize fighting fraud and iniquity in California. All honor to him for it! If Nevada has an ambition to succeed to the status of the Gehenna of America, let it. California has passed out of that class.

Will Support the Ticket

While it was an impertinence on the part of the State Central Committee of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau to presume to apply a test of loyalty to candidates for Republican nomination for state offices, and an act which candidates may properly disregard so far as that committee is concerned, it will be proper for all candidates frankly to tell the public, through the press and on the rostrum, that, in the absence of fraud, they will loyally abide by the decision of Republican voters at the polls. The issue is put up to the voters themselves and from their decision, so rendered as to make it clear that it is their decision, no appeal will be taken. They are the ones to decide. Of course there is no knowing what election frauds may be committed in certain wards in all our cities where the "organization" will have the selection of all the election officers, and fraud vitiates all obligations, but, apart from fraud, a plurality expression of public opinion must rule under the law as it is. The law should be changed in accordance with the Berkeley plan, by making a clear majority over all elective on the first ballot and only the two highest of all votes cast go to the people on the second, but until so amended a plurality vote must suffice to nominate. So much regarding candidates. Voters will vote as they please at the general election. Nothing can or should stop them. And the press should be as independent as the voters.

An Unjustifiable Reason Why

The physical-valuation-of-railroads measure was dropped out of the new national railroad law almost by mutual consent. The railroad forces did not want it, nor did the insurgent forces care to press the matter. Neither side could foretell just what the result would be. That the capitalization of the railroads was nearly drowned out with water at the beginning no one denies, but it is not certain that this water has not all been soaked up by the general appreciation of values since the capitalizing was done. From the Springfield Republican we take some figures that would seem to show such to be the case and, it may be remembered, Theodore Roosevelt, while president, expressed the opinion that the railroad properties then equalled in value the sum total of stock and bonds. In 1907 Minnesota made a physical valuation of its railroads and found them actually worth $54,201 per mile against a total capitalization of $44,206. Wisconsin found her railroads worth $34,630 against a capitalization of $33,424. Washington found the Great Northern actually worth $73,900 against a capitalization of $44,678, and the Northern Pacific worth $106,500 against a capitalization of $70,278. Value the strips of right-of-way at the same per acre as abutting farms, and the terminal grounds at the same front-foot as abutting city lots, and the total counts up enormously. If a fair profit on a fair valuation is to be the measure of service it is hard to see why sound principles of justice should not require the valuation to be made. The only ground for public complaint is that some of the elements of value cost the railroads little or nothing, being that unearned increment which the whole public created and upon which the creator ought not to be required everlastingly to pay interest. But that is another issue.

Those Pork Barrels

Retrenchment was the shibboleth of the Taft administration. It was hinted from executive quarters that while Theodore Roosevelt had done much to force the square deal upon unwilling special interests, he had lost sight of economy in administration. Aldrich declared that he could help his friend William to save $300,000,000 a year without hurting the service, and the order for retrenchment was passed down through all the departments of government, with the net result that the present congress has appropriated $1,080,000,000, or about $36,000,000 more than had been appropriated at any previous session. Some $30,000,000 was pared from the estimates of the different governmental departments, only to be salted down, with more than as much again added, in the two pork barrels, government buildings and rivers and harbors. The government needs buildings as it needs rivers and harbors, but these needs are met in congress by the same policy of logrolling that is employed in making a tariff schedule, and that policy is as much out of place in one instance as the other. The tapering end of economy has proven the bigger of the two. But if there were no "pork barrels" how would the "interests" be able to recompense their stand-patters for standing pat? Here is a demand for at least two more expert commissions to advise congress, not congressmen, as to what is needful.

An Ocean-Bound Republic

Peanut politics at Washington has done its best for half a century to drive Canada and the United States apart, but Goldwin Smith died in the belief that time, and the exigencies of oriental competition on the greatest ocean of the earth, will drive Our Lady of the Snows into the protecting arms of Uncle Sam. It is to be hoped that the prophecy will be fulfilled. The concept of an ocean-bound republic is one to warm the heart of patriotism as nothing else can. If the ideal of republican government be true, then its extension to embrace the North American continent is worth living for and dying for. It will come to pass, not by conquest or by failure of Canada to govern herself, but by a common necessity and propinquity productive of an abiding affection and sympathetic mutuality of sentiment, the foundation of all happy unions. With Mexico it will be different. The rumble of discontent, the menace of the revolutionary spirit, now threateningly heard along our southern border, affords an indication of what the coming years have in store. The time will come, probably with the demise of Diaz, when that volcano that has been smoldering so long under a dictatorship so galling, and yet so indispensable to stable government among the American Latins, will raise a condition intolerable to be endured. Public sentiment at home and in Europe, and the cry of the distressed in Mexico, will force upon this nation, first a suzerainty and finally an amalgamation and assimilation. The prophecy regarding Mexico was foretold in the history of California, Arizona and New Mexico.

The New States

Congress will not adjourn without opening the way for two more states in the American Union. Neither Arizona nor New Mexico is fully fitted to be a state, but they are as well fitted as Nevada, ambitious to become the Gehenna of America; as well fitted as California was when it was admitted to the Union, as fit as Utah was and is, and so no great harm is likely to result from taking them in. Unless, in the fulness of time, Texas shall be carved and California divided, with the coming in of these states state-making is likely to come to an end, at least until the boundaries of the Great Republic are moved to the north and to the south, embracing all from the pole to the big ditch. Eight and forty commonwealths bound into one indissoluble Union! It is big and it is rich and it is our business to make it great, great in the maintenance of equal justice and in equality of opportunity to the sons and daughters of rich and poor, black and white. It can be done. We shall probably have some very raw material sent up to the United States senate from these two commonwealths. The "interests" are likely to commission their attorneys to represent themselves rather than the new states, but that is to be endured until it can be cured by growth of grace in the states themselves. Discretion will doubtless come with added years and, anyhow, California has no call to gird at them. Howbeit they are coming into the Union under a censorship of congress as to what their constitutions may contain, a doubtful limitation upon the right of free government, no doubt imposed by presidential influence because of Mr. Taft's dislike for the constitution which the citizens of Oklahoma saw fit to frame. We trust that if these new commonwealths see fit to incorporate in their scheme of local self-government the initiative, the referendum and the recall they will have the nerve to do it, the probable reluctance of congress to approve to the contrary notwithstanding. The menace to free government in Arizona and New Mexico will not be these things, but the predominance of great Eastern, mining, ranching and railroad interests. Let congress make this issue national if it dare.

Reckoning Up

As stated in these columns many months ago, the success or failure of the Taft policy must be judged by the work of this session of Congress. That session will probably close Saturday. A definite summing up cannot be made for another week, but the next few days may be discounted at least in part. A tentative account of stock may be taken now.

If we start at the beginning the tariff was to be revised downward. It was equalized somewhat, but revised upward or on a level according to the point of view of the onlooker.

There was to be a commission to revise the procedure of the United States courts. It has been forgotten.

Legislation restraining the abuse of the power of injunction. Likely to go over as unfinished business.

A ship subsidy bill. No nearer materialization than it was twenty years ago.

The wiping out of the postal deficiency. Not wiped.

Issuance of bonds in aid of the Reclamation Service. Ordered issued, but cut from $30,000,000 to $20,000,000.

Statutory power to withdraw from entry public lands for reservation purposes, a power never before in dispute. Granted.

Admission of Arizona and New Mexico as states. Admitted, with a lasso attached to guard against eventualities.

A national incorporation law. Not yet.

National control of water power privileges on government lands. In statu quo.

The establishment of a Commerce Court. The President got it, although he was the only man in the United States who really wanted it.

A new railroad regulation law. Got it, and, thanks to months of resolute fighting by the insurgent members of the senate especially, the new law marks a distinct advance on the old.

Government savings banks. Got them.

Out of thirteen measures he got six through in some shape or other and, if we include the tariff, he got seven. Not a bad record for President and Congress. In short, the nation got what the nation itself would have, except as to the tariff, and on this the nation is likely to be heard from this fall in the form of a demand that schedules shall be revised, as they need it, upon the advice of expert information and not political log-rolling.

On the issue of retrenchment, as explained elsewhere, the tapering end is the bigger.

Yes, and there is the Federal corporation tax. He got that, but it is doubtful if he will have it after the supreme court shall have had its chance at it.

On the whole the administration has gone far toward making good.

Why the Postal Savings Banks?

For many years there has been a demand for postal savings banks. They come at last. The demand has not arisen because of a grinding monopoly. Our state-chartered savings banks have been neither oppressive nor derelict. No injurious influence in legislation or administration of government has been chargeable to our savings institutions, and they have been as conservatively managed as other banks, if not more so. The only excuse for Postal Savings banks is that there exists a need that private enterprise has not filled. That need appears to justify the adventure. The efforts of Bristow, La Follette and Cummins to chain money to the locality was unwise. Money must be fluid that it may go where it is wanted most. If the Wall Street gamblers can bid highest for it go after the gamblers, don't chain up the money. Now for the Parcels Post. For that there is a bigger, broader, better justification.

Infant Poor

Of 2054 infants, under two years of age, that fell into the hands of public charity in Massachusetts last year only 204 died during the year, barely ten per cent. Time was when of bottle babies that fell into the hands of charity, barely ten per cent were saved alive, even in Massachusetts, and at Tewksbury almshouse the mortality once reached ninety-eight per cent. There is nothing else so hard to rear as a bottle baby, and when babies are herded together like sheep they die like sheep. Records made by certain institutions here in San Francisco suggest a slaughtering of the innocents, records culpable only because of an unintelligent conformity with old-time methods.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

We have all of us heard much said in recent years, and many of us have said much, about sending the whole child to school. The idea is excellent, in fact, to employ a feminism, "perfectly splendid," but how are we to do it? Will there ever be a school big enough and broad enough to take in the whole child? Was there ever an environment big enough or broad enough to take in the whole man or the whole woman? Why, the earth and the fulness thereof is so cramped and insufficient in its dimensions that men must needs search the heavens, weigh the planets, resolve the farthest suns into their constituent parts and, out of fragments of thoughts ventured by the good and great through successive generations, seek to construct and visualize that world unseen but hoped for.

But it is right that we should send more of the child to school than we have been sending. That fraction of the child that is content with reading, writing and arithmetic is pitifully meagre. The child needs to know how to use his hands, his eyes, his hearing, how to use his brain, his understanding, his nervous energy. The boy needs to know how to hammer and saw, the girl how to cook and sew, and they both need to know how to throw up the windows of their beings that they may see out, how to arrange objects in life in a true perspective, how to compare values, how to order their lives harmoniously.

Yet not even this would be sending the whole child to school. There would still be more left out of school than sent to school. The intellectual life is a splendid factor in life, but that life that is wholly intellectual is dwarfed and half dead. Of what avail is a beautiful body without a spirit? It is food for worms. So a beautiful intellectuality is unprofitable if that be all there is to it. There are still the affections, the humanities, behavior, the religious faculties, for man is a worshiping animal and must reach up to that source from whence cometh his help. We are not sending the whole child to school as long as it finds little in its school work and life appealing to these, the highest and most important attributes of its nature.

And just here comes the crucial difficulty of our generation. We can agree as to what kind of arithmetic, geography, grammar, even history and physiology, shall be taught in school, but not at all as to what kind of religion. There are some six hundred religions or phases of religion to choose from. Which shall it be? Not mine if you can help it, not yours if I can help it, and help it we will if we have to fight over it as the world has fought through blood to the bridle bits. What, then, shall we do, give up trying to send the whole child to school?

Yes, if any part of the nature of a child requires instruction in dogmatic theology we must keep so much of the child out of school for the reason that there can be no agreement, and if we undertake to separate our educational system into as many factors as we have phases of religion we destroy the system and shall have few schools worth mentioning. We must then leave something to be done for the child outside of school, through the church and the home.

After all, that part of the child that is formed at home is the greater part, and that part that is formed through the church is not insignificant. We shall never be able to send the whole child to any school, nor will the whole man ever find this world adequate to his needs. He must reach up into the unseen farther than the longest telescope can reach. The best music he will ever hear must ever fall short of his imaginings. After the prima donna shall have touched her highest note the listening ear must go on hearing whole octaves above her, and after the dearest bass of the organ has thundered the mind must descend to depths the organ cannot voice. Nothing that we shall ever see or hear or do will be wholly satisfying. The whole man is a bigger thing than the world can hold.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Food Prices Then and Now

According to various poets comparisons are not edifying and colorful. Nevertheless, they frequently are interesting, and again they are useful. They are the former, at any rate, in the instance here recorded. As long ago as 1823—when our old men and women were young—one Moses Guest visited Cincinnati and recorded his impressions of the incipient city in a little book. With all the rest, he gave the prices of food there at that time. Here they are, and if they do not sound easy to the weary head of a family today we shall miss our guess. Beef, mutton and veal sold for 2 to 4 cents a pound; pork 1½ to 2½ cents; butter, 12½ to 18¾ cents; cheese, 6 to 8 cents; eggs, 4 to 10 cents a dozen; wheat flour, $1.25 to $1.75 per hundred weight, and buckwheat flour the same; cornmeal, 18¾ to 25 cents a bushel; wheat, 45 to 50 cents; corn, 18¾ to 25 cents; oats, 12½ to 18¾ cents; chickens, 10 to 25 cents a pair; turkeys, 3 to 4 cents a pound; potatoes, 25 to 37 cents a bushel; turnips, 18¾ to 25 cents a bushel. How smoothly, how delightfully, it all does read in a comparative way, but unfortunately we are on the wrong end of the comparison. Beef two to four cents a pound! Turkeys three to four cents a pound! It is impossible to avoid a feeling that our grandfathers should have been good, easy-going, unworried men—and perhaps they were.

Paris To Be Vastly Improved

The most tremendous scheme of municipal improvement devised by any city since the history of cities began to be written has been decided upon by the officials of Paris. The scheme calls for the expenditure of $180,000,000, for which enormous sum municipal loan stock will be issued. The following amounts will be devoted to various improvements: For new school buildings and improvement of the old, $18,000,000; for new waterworks and increase of the water supply, $25,000,000; for public hospitals, $7,000,000; for reconstruction of abattoirs, $8,000,000; for improvement of roads and pavements, etc., $9,000,000; for the prevention of consumption $6,000,000; for various other improvements, including that of promenades and parks, $21,000,000; for improvements in the plans of the city and suburban changes, all involving the beautification of the city, $86,000,000. All of this vast expenditure is to be made within the next fifteen years, and it is expected that at the end of that time Paris will be the most beautiful city in the world. The expenditure of $6,000,000 for fighting the "white plague" is particularly notable, as Paris is the first city to devote a large, definite sum to this purpose.

Dead or Injured in Coal Mines

The United States Geological Survey has issued a bulletin treating of accidents and casualties in the coal mines of this country. It is a disheartening story that the cold figures tell, as the reader may judge. For purposes of comparison take the four years beginning with 1896. In that year there were 1,103 deaths due to coal mine disasters; in 1897, 934; in 1898, 1,032; in 1899, 1,217. Now take the four years just a decade later. The deaths in 1906 numbered 2,092; in 1907, 3,125; in 1908, 2,450; in 1909, 2,412. The total of the latter four years was 10,079, of the former four, 4,286. That is, in a brief decade the casualties increased by 135 per cent. Between these two four-year periods intervened six years in which the total of deaths was 10,765, or little more than in the four following years, the annual average being 40 per cent less than that of the immediately succeeding four years and 67 per cent greater than that of the four preceding years. So stands the record when it is reduced to coldest black and white. It is not encouraging; it leads to a reasonable supposition that an increasing criminal carelessness is involved in the ghastly facts and woven into the indifferent statistics.

Pauperism in England and Wales

Writing of statistics, here are some more from an official source, but they apply on the other side of the oceans. There are in England and Wales 35,750,000 inhabitants, and of this number 789,000 are paupers; which means that this number receive public assistance, the number not including those who need it but are too proud to ask for it. There are, then, more than 22 paupers to each 1,000 citizens, or, to state the case in another way, of every one hundred average residents whom one may there meet some two or three would be acknowledged paupers. It is small wonder that England is looking with a serious eye upon its method of taxation, for the system that produces that kind of a crop appears to need attention. There is too much chaff in proportion to the wheat.

Favors a Nationalized Roulette

Sir Hiram Maxim, who has added no small amount to the gentle art of making war terrible, is the latest notable apostle of the doctrine that, inasmuch as people will sin, it is well to license their iniquity and make money out of it, the doctrine under whose blessed tenets some peoples have devoted most of their earnings to running a national lottery. It is but justice to Sir Hiram to give him the benefit of his own language in advocating his theory, for if he cannot make it convincing, who can? He says: "I would have national roulette substituted for betting on races. Betting on races should be penalized so that ultimately racing would cease except between genuine horsemen. By organizing roulette, with minimum odds against the players, which would mean that about $10 out of every $500 passing over the tables would go to the state, the latter could pay off the national debt in a few years." At the expense of a foolish and self-improverished people, of course. That is evil commercialized with a vengeance again. It is well to say, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer shows no signs of grasping at Sir Hiram's suggestion.

A Tremendous Corporation

As compared with some other corporations, little is heard of the Singer Manufacturing Company, yet its plants and agencies encircle the globe and it does an almost inconceivably immense business, with financial returns in proportion. In 1900 its capitalization was $10,000,000, but that year it declared a stock dividend of 200 per cent, increasing its capitalization to $30,000,000. Again, some two or three weeks ago it declared a stock dividend of 100 per cent, thus increasing the capitalization to $60,000,000. That these increases have been justifiable is indicated by the fact that the company now has on hand a cash surplus of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. More than that, the company has distributed to its stockholders since 1898, $65,550,000 in cash dividends. Before the latest stock dividend the cash dividend rate was 40 per cent, but it is understood that this now will be reduced to 20 per cent, so that the actual disbursement will not be changed. Clearly the man who bought a few shares of Singer stock some forty and odd years ago, when it still was below par, did a good thing for his family, if he managed to hang to it.

A Cheap Substitute For Cotton

Now that the price of cotton, with that of a considerable number of other things, gives indications of wrenching and warping the ordinary pocket-book, a company has been formed for the manufacture of near-cotton; that is almost-cotton which has no cotton in it. For this purpose marine fiber and wood pulp will be used. Experiments with yarn manufactured of this combination already have been made, and the results have given so much satisfaction that the organizers of the company are convinced that they can turn out a commercially acceptable article. It is expected that the product will be used for dress materials, sail cloth, bags, sacks, towels, stair carpets, etc. It will be much cheaper than cotton.

The Number of Stars We See

According to astronomers, 7,000 stars are within the range of vision of a person of average eyesight. This seems like a reasonably large number, but when we compare it with the number within telescopic vision it shrinks tremendously in importance. It is estimated that the number of stars seen through a good telescope is between 75,000,000 and 80,000,000, or, say, 11,000 times as many as the unassisted eye sees.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

IT'S OUR MOVE

TO OUR NEW STORE AT

42 and 44 CALIFORNIA ST

One half block off Market St.

Calendars, Pocket Diaries
Office Diaries for 1910

LE COUNT, CLARK & ORMOND

STATIONERS AND PRINTERS
San Francisco

"We Hold Thee Safe"

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE

ROLLA V. WATT
MANAGER

N. W. Corner Pine and Sansome Streets
SAN FRANCISCO

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

COSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

LOS ANGELES

"Nuestra Senora Reina de los Angeles"

By Frances L. Mace

She sits amid her orange trees,

Our Lady of Los Angeles,

The smiling city of the sun,
And counts the seasons as they flee,
Like beads from off a rosary

That slip and sparkle one by one.

Upon the outer solitudes

The demon of the desert broods,

The ocean chafes and murmurs near;

But safe within her garden wall

She hears these ancient foemen call,

With tranquil, inattentive ear.

At close of day from yonder height

I saw her robed in evening light,

One white star like an opal showing;

Her roses drooped in slumber sweet,

But oh, the lilies at her feet

Upheld their censers overflowing.

"Tell me," I said, "O city fair,

What dreams pervade this sunset air,

What memories stir this purple splendor?"

For surely magic worketh here,

And in the stillness I can hear

Reverberations wild yet tender."

Mrs. Frances L. Mace came to California after she had established a reputation as a writer, but some of her best work was done here, where her death took place several years since.

TOLSTOY'S LIFE CRISIS

Many years ago Count Tolstoy was asked to act as counsel for the defense in the case of a soldier named Shibunin, who was court-martialed for having assaulted his superior officer. Tolstoy defended the soldier, but the soldier was convicted and executed. In a recent letter to M. Biryukov, Tolstoy's biographer, the Count describes the incident and the effect it had upon his entire life. The letter, as translated for the New York Times, by Herman Bernstein, is as follows:

I am very glad to fulfill your wish and to inform you in greater detail what I thought and felt in connection with my defense of the soldier of whom you write. That incident exerted a greater influence upon my whole life than all the seemingly important events of my life—such as the loss or recovery of my health, my successes or failures in literature, or even the loss of some of my nearest people.

I do not remember with what I occupied myself and what attracted me particularly at that time; I simply know that I led then a calm, self-contented, and entirely egotistical life.

One summer day Stasulevich came to our house and told us about the soldier who struck the Captain a blow on the face. He spoke with particular anxiety about the fate that was awaiting the soldier—capital punishment—and he asked me to appear for the defense of the soldier before the military court.

I must say that death sentences pronounced by some people over others, and orders to still other people to carry out the executions, always not only filled me with revolt, but even seemed to me as something impossible, invented as one of those acts in which you refuse to believe, notwithstanding that you know that these acts have been and are committed by people.

I understand that under the impulse of a moment's excitement, anger, revenge, loss of consciousness of one's humanity, a man may kill, defending another man who is near to him, or even himself, he may, under the influence of patriotic, mob enthusiasm, risking his own life, participate in wholesale murder on the battlefield. But that people could calmly and deliberately, in the full possession of their human qualities, recognize the necessity of murdering a human being like themselves, and could compel other human beings to carry out this deed which is repugnant to human nature—this I never understood. I did not understand it in 1866, when I lived my organic, egotistic life, and, therefore, however strange that may seem, I undertook the case with hope for success.

After certain formalities, which I cannot remember, I read my speech, which I am simply ashamed to read now. The judges, concealing their tediousness out of politeness, listened to all the commonplaces which I said, referring to certain articles of certain volumes, and after I had finished they went out to decide the case. * * * And then they read the death sentence—execution by shooting.

Immediately after that I wrote a letter to Alexandra Andreyevna Tolstoy, who was near to the imperial court, and asked her to speak to the Emperor, Alexander II., about pardoning Shibunin. I wrote the letter to her, but forgot to mention the name of the regiment in which the episode occurred.

Alexandra Tolstoy communicated with the Minister of War Milyutin, but he said that he could not ask the Emperor without indicating the regiment to which the condemned man belonged. She wrote me about it. I hastened to answer, but the authorities of the regiment also made haste, and when there were no longer any obstacles in the way of pardoning the Emperor the soldier was executed.

Yes; I am ashamed now to read the wretched, stupid speech I made in his defense. If a man understands what people are contemplating to do when they sit down in their uniforms at the three sides of the table; imagining that because they seated themselves in this order, and because they wear uniforms, and because certain words are printed in certain books and certain words are written on certain sheets of paper—that because of all this they can break the eternal, general law which is written not in books, but in all human hearts, the only thing he can and should say to such people is to implore them to recall who they are and what they want to do; but not to prove to them by all sorts of tricks, based upon the false and stupid words which are called laws, that a human being should not be killed. For to prove that the life of every human being is sacred, that no man can have the right to deprive another man of life; everybody knows this and therefore it is unnecessary to prove this.

At that time I did not yet understand all this. I merely felt vaguely that something had happened which should not have happened, and that this case was not accidental, but was deeply tied with all other errors and miseries of mankind, and that this indeed lay at the very foundation of all errors and miseries of mankind.

I felt vaguely even then that the justification of murder by the Church and by science, instead of attaining its aim—the justification of violence—on the contrary showed the fallacy of the Church and the fallacy of science. I experienced this vague feeling for the first time in Paris when I witnessed from afar an execution; now I felt it more clearly, much more clearly, now that I participated in this case; but I was still afraid to believe myself and to differ with the judgment of the whole world.

Only later I was led to the necessity of believing myself and of renouncing the two dreadful deceptions which hold the people of our time in their power and which cause all the miseries from which mankind is suffering—the deception of the Church and the deception of science.

In the scientific works of two kinds, in works on what is called jurisprudence, with its criminal laws, and in works which are called purely scientific, the justification of violence is proved more definitely and boldly. As to criminal law, it goes without saying it is a series of the most obvious sophisms, whose purpose it is to justify every violence of man over man, and even murder. In scientific works, beginning with Darwin, who placed the law of the struggle for existence at the foundation of the progress of life, this justification is self-understood. Some of the infants terribles of this doctrine, such as the famous Prof. Ernst Haeckel, say so openly.

And people read it, study it, calling it science, and it enters nobody's mind to ask the natural question that if it is useful to destroy the bad people who shall decide who is harmful? I, for instance, believe that I know nobody worse or more harmful than Mr. Haeckel. Must I, therefore, and the people of the same opinion as mine, condemn? The graver the blunders of Mr. Haeckel the more I would wish him to come to his senses, and I would not want to deprive him of this opportunity under any circumstances.

These falsehoods of the Church and of science have brought us now to the position in which we find ourselves. It is no longer months but years that pass in which there is not a day without executions and murders, and some people are glad when government murders outnumber the revolutionary murders; while others are glad when more Generals, estate owners, merchants and policemen are killed. On the one hand, rewards of ten to twenty-five rubles are distributed for the murders; on the other hand, the revolutionists honor murderers, ex-proprietors, and sing their praises as though they were heroes.

I understood all this much later, but I had felt it vaguely even at that time, when I defended that unfortunate soldier so stupidly and so disgracefully. That is why I said that this case exerted the most powerful and most serious influence upon my life.

STORIES OF WHISTLER

Whistler enjoyed his controversies with the critics. Thanking some one who had given him the name "Nocturnes" for his moonlight pictures, he said: "You have no idea what an irritation the name is to the critics, and what a consequent pleasure to me." Of his own method of painting flesh he said that people thought he painted it lower in tone than it really is, because nobody ever really looked at flesh with an eye to its pictorial effect. They merely knew how it was conventionally treated in painting, and in looking at a picture mentally referred it to other pictures rather than to nature. He also condemned the notion of painters that they must make their picture stand out from its frame. He held that the frame was the window through which and beyond which the artist sees his picture and the painting must therefore lie behind the frame at the distance at which the painter looks at his model.

A characteristic note has been preserved written by Whistler to an art commissioner who was coming to Paris to arrange an exhibition. He notified Whistler that he might come to see him at 4:30 precisely. Whistler was annoyed at the business-like nature of the letter and wrote back: "Dear Sir—I have received your letter announcing that you will arrive in Paris on the —th. I congratulate you. I have never been able and never shall be able to be anywhere at 4:30 precisely. Yours most faithfully, J. McN. Whistler."

The manager of a rural opera house had booked "Camille." When the company arrived in town the leading woman, who was also the wife of the manager of the show, proved to be a healthy blonde of some 200 pounds. The house manager got worried. He called the woman's husband off to one side and expostulated. "Do you mean to say that lady can play she's dying of consumption?" he asked. "Well," said the husband, "in the common version of 'Camille' she does die of consumption, but our show is the revised version. In our performance Armand hits 'er over the head with a table leg, and she dies natural."

O. Henry left the manuscript of an unfinished play named "The World and Dorr." Before his death he had sold the dramatic rights of all his short stories to Lieber & Co.

J. E. WHITE

AN EXAMPLE OF MORAL ENERGY IN PRACTICAL POLITICS

J. E. White is the candidate of the Independent Republican Club of the Thirty-ninth Assembly District for assemblyman to represent that district in the legislature next year. The Thirty-ninth is, with the possible exception of one Los Angeles county district, the strongest Republican district in California. The Independent Republican Club is the strongest Republican organization in the Thirty-ninth district. This club has a membership of nearly 1,100, and it usually swings the Republican nominations in the Thirty-ninth. Its members are "progressive," "insurgents," red-hot believers in the "Roosevelt policies." The Thirty-ninth is known everywhere as the "fighting district." The regulars and the Independents fight every year, with unrestrained ardor. But after the primaries it is always the "solid Thirty-ninth." The hatchet is buried and the whole party unites for a solid attack on the enemy that lands Republican candidates in victory to the tune of about 4,000 majority.

It is from this district and from its progressive element that Mr. White comes. He has been for years active in the Independent Republican Club out there; he knows everybody and everybody knows and respects him. He is not followed by everybody; he will have his fight at the primary; but when he is nominated—as he probably will be—they will all get behind him.

Mr. White belongs naturally with the clean and the progressive element in the Republican party. He was born and reared in Iowa, and how Iowa stands toward Republicanism is known of all men, and especially how Iowa stands toward insurgency was lately exemplified by the remarkable success of the insurgent tickets at the recent primary there.

Mr. White was born on an Iowa farm in 1870. His common school education was received in the public schools of the nearest town, Rockford, from whose high school he graduated in 1889. For a year after he completed his high school course he worked in the shops of the Rock Island railroad, at Rockford. But he wanted a college education and was willing to work for it. He therefore worked his way through Cornell (Methodist) College, at Mt. Vernon, Iowa, graduating in 1895. In college he took the classical course, which gives the student an all-round education in mathematics, the sciences, and the literatures of the world. He was known as a clever college debater.

Even in boyhood Mr. White took an intense interest in politics. "Many a licking I got," he says, "because I insisted on hanging around election day, waiting for the last returns from the count." The year he was twenty-one he entered actively into political life in Rockford. Politics there meant Republican politics. The only Democrat in town was an old man who ran every year for city clerk, and whom the boys finally elected, partly as a joke and partly as a reward for persistence.

But inside Republican politics in the county was the same struggle that now engages the attention of the whole country—the struggle between a corrupt "machine" and a reform wing of the party. Mr. White's first political achievement was to lead the reform movement that overthrew this machine and placed the reformers in power—an achievement that revolutionized the politics of the county and whose effect is felt there to this day.

Mr. White came to California in 1896, settling at Riverside. Here he taught as a private tutor, besides running a private school for three years. Here also he met the lady who, some years later, when he was established in San Francisco, became his wife.

Mr. White moved to San Francisco in 1899, and at once entered the Hastings Law School, taking the full three year's course and graduating in 1902. He immediately entered upon the practice of the law, with an office on California street until the fire and, since that time, in the Monadnock Building. His practice has grown steadily, built up by conscientious work and by the widening circle of appreciation of his integrity and force of character.

In 1904 Mr. White married, and immediately after the fire he bought residence property in the Sunset Heights district, where he has lived ever since.

Mr. White early entered into public life in San Francisco in behalf of civic improvement. The first subject to engage his assistance was the fight to compel the saloons of the city to pay their fair share of the burden of taxation by compelling them to pay an adequate license. The additional police protection made necessary by the presence of saloons justified this demand. And the moral sense of the community made desirable the other result likely to follow from the increase in license, viz., the reduction in the number of saloons.

MR. J. E. WHITE

The sentiment in favor of higher license was embodied in the $500 License League. The license thitherto paid by the saloons was $84 a year. The proposition to increase this amount to $500 met with fierce resistance, which was successful for a time, because this was the time of highest power for Ruef and Schmitz. Beginning in 1903, Mr. White prepared a referendum petition calling for a municipal vote on the question of high license. The Schmitz administration refused to entertain the petition, declaring that the signatures were defective. The next year, however, Mr. White forestalled this plea by preserving duplicate copies of the petition, and the administration, seeing that there was no escape, permitted the question to come to a vote in November, 1905. The high license ordinance was defeated by only 2,000 votes. This result so frightened the Schmitz crowd that, during the period following the fire in 1906, when the saloons were closed by proclamation, the board of supervisors passed the $500 ordinance. They were especially impelled to do this by Mr. White's threat that he would force another referendum and that he would set the license at $1,000 instead of $500.

Mr. White is probably the only man who ever held a public debate with Abraham Ruef during that boss's term of power. The debate was held in Scottish Hall, on Larkin street, on the night of March 17, 1904, under the auspices of a young men's club and before an audience that packed the hall beyond its proper capacity. In his opening sentence, Mr. White, who opened the debate, charged that the Ruef-Schmitz administration, with the possible exception of the school department, was corrupt in every department and reeking with graft. Ruef, in his reply, evaded the issue and devoted his speech to an ex-coriolation of the Evening Bulletin.

Mr. White's speech was the first gun fired in the campaign that ended in the downfall of Ruef and Schmitz. In the following November, Francis J. Heney made his epochal speech in which he declared that he had in his possession and would use the evidence necessary to send Abraham Ruef to state's prison.

In 1906, Mr. White went to Vallejo and organized the campaign for a reduction in the number of saloons in that town. At his instance, Secretary of the Navy Bonaparte issued an ultimatum that the number of saloons near the Navy Yard must be cut in half as a matter of the preservation of discipline. Mr. White used this ultimatum and the organized power of the Municipal League of Vallejo to force a referendum election, which resulted in an ordinance reducing the number of saloons in Vallejo from 106 to 50, and in raising the annual saloon license from $21 to $400.

Mr. White has been active in other municipal movements for progress. He is chairman of the Civics Department of the Church Federation of San Francisco. This federation is composed of representatives of every Protestant church in the city. As chairman of the Civics Department, Mr. White has for some years led the fight against the spread of the tenderloin district, and in the campaign to stop prize-fighting. He also worked for the Anti-Racetrack Gambling Bill and for the Direct Primary Bill when these two laws were up before the state legislature. The Civics Department sent committees, led by Mr. White, to appear before the appropriate legislative committee to urge the passage of these laws.

Governor Gillett's published explanation of his action in stopping prize-fighting refers to a notice received by him on June 9th, that District Attorney Fickert, of San Francisco, had refused to enforce the law. This letter was written by Mr. White, after a formal demand for action made by him upon Fickert. This action by Mr. White was the culmination of a long campaign, assuming national scope, to bring the pressure of all Christian bodies in America to bear upon Governor Gillett to persuade him to stop the fight. Probably as much as any one man, Mr. White deserves the credit for that result.

Mr. White is a member of the San Francisco Charter Amendment Convention, which is composed of 100 men who are working out plans to have the charter amended for four particular purposes: 1, the elimination of party designations from the ballot in municipal elections; 2, the elimination, by the primary, of all but two candidates for every office; 3, the simplification, in the interest of greater efficiency, of the provisions for the initiative, referendum and recall; and 4, a method for better dealings with public service corporations.

Mr. White was, until last April, vice-president of the Independent Republican Club of the Thirty-ninth District. When his candidacy for the assembly was announced, his only opponent for the club's endorsement was Mr. A. Kennedy. After Mr. White received the endorsement, Mr. Kennedy moved to make it unanimous, and he is today perhaps Mr. White's most ardent supporter in the campaign for the Republican nomination.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Family Called Her Blossom

Family called her Blossom
Never exactly knew
What was the reason for it;
S'pose that they thought 'twould do.
Do for her baby graces,
Do for her pink and white—
Guess that they called her Blossom
'Cause no other name seemed right.

Family called her Blossom,
And, oh, as the Blossom grew
Seemed that she made the daylight
Brighter for all she knew;
Seemed that the skies were bluer
Whenever her laughter trilled,
Seemed that the cup ran over
That Nature with joy had filled.

Family called her Blossom,
But never a blossom white
Drinking the dew of heaven
Was ever so fair a sight.
Ah, but her feet went tripping
Straight to the heart of you,
Till she was your Queen of Loving,
And you were her subject true.

Family called her Blossom—
Out where the white hearse leads
A wee, little headstone glimmers,
And, "Blossom" is how it reads.
We whisper, "Perhaps it is better,"
But skies are a sadder blue
Since He took her into His keeping,
For He loves the Blossoms, too.

The Meadow Lark's "Plaintive Song"

Referring to renewed attacks upon the meadow lark by certain estimable citizens who apparently feel that this bird's continued existence ultimately must annihilate agriculture and horticulture in California, the Sacramento Bee, in an editorial caption, says: "The lark's sole refuge is its plaintive song."

Plaintive! If it were not for the present prices of provisions and other family supplies, I would bet a dollar that when the editor of the Bee reaches Heaven (and I cannot conceive of him as going to any other place) he will mistake the songs of the angel choir for funeral odes, and I would bet another dollar that always when he has heard a band playing "A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight" he has supposed that it was rendering the Dead March from Saul.

Plaintive! Why, take all the happiness that man knows or conceives, add to it the ecstasy of dreams wherein his soul reaches out unto some mist-hid Arcady, let some mightiest musician express the sum of all in terms of melody, and the outcome will be the rapturous song of the meadow lark, neither more nor less. I do not know that the lark's song was composed in Heaven, but if it was not, I have faith to believe that listening angels have carried it above, so that it is not unknown there now. Why not? Is not man's happiness heeded in the Unseen Country, and what else can so write peace in the troubled souls of men as does the perfect, if brief, melody of this yellow-breasted warbler?

Plaintive! Editorially, I look upon the Bee as the brightest thing that wanders down the Californian pike, but as a judge of the quality of melody I am going to move that it go 'way back and sit down.

Mr. Prowdpop—I dreamed that Gabriel blew his horn.

Mr. Goodlisner—Yes?

"It's mighty reverberations shook both land and sea."

"Yes?"

"In response to that dread summons all the dead of all times came flocking from their graves."

"Yes?"

"But the blast didn't wake me."

"Why not?"

"I thought it was the baby."

The Opinions of Rufus

Better not drive any man too hard. Even the sorriest cur may bite if you corner him.

I reckon 'bout the only man that deserves much credit in this world is him that makes himself better an' more decent than Nacher 'parently started him out to be.

It saves consider'ble mental wear an' tear for us to b'lieve our pas an' mas knew the only true reelegion that ever blossomed in this world, but the idee's too flatterin' to apply to sech pas an' mas es I've met.

Middlin' often Fame's a monument men set up in lovin' token of the fact that they neglected to feed the late departed while he was livin'.

Love in a cottage alwuz was a tender subject with young folks, but with cottages sellin' at $3,000 "and up" it's gettin' even tenderer.

Josh Bings says he b'lieves the invention of the aeroplane was providenshal;—says he reckons 'twas sent so's to give man a chance to ketch up with prices.

The more I meet folks that has jined the Smart Set, the more I can't help reelizin' how the feller that give 'em the name must have laughed.

'Fore you raise a family, Ezry, kind o' consider how many children are handicapped by the pa an' ma they s'lect.

I don't b'lieve any reel boy-boy ever lived that would love his country more'n half es well without any firecrackers on the Fourth.

Many a man has found out that the best thing to do with a failure is to make it a steppin'-stone to somethin' better.

We're all part of the orchestra of life, an' it's kind o' consolatin' to me to reflect that the Leader won't expect es much of the one He give a jewsharp es he will of the one he give a cornet.

A Prize Fight and Some Other Things

A prize fight was impending in San Francisco. Now, a prize fight is not a good thing, not a commendable thing, not a pretty thing. It is a call to the brute-worshippers of all mankind to assemble and look upon their sinewy god in action; it is a laudation of the animal to forgetfulness of the mental. Therefore it was that a protest went up, and California will not mother the fight.

But,

There is a saloon on every corner and between most corners, and there is more injury to mankind in saloons than in a multiplied multitude of Jeffries-Johnson fights.

Have you noticed that many who protested loudest against the fight have little or nothing to say anent the saloons?

White slavery exists, and because of its unspeakable iniquity young girls are dragged down to mankind's unforgivable estate.

None justify this basest slavery, but I have heard no such clamor of declamation against it as I heard against the prize fight. Have you?

For the first time in three decades the Men of California show a readiness to remember that heritage of freedom which their fathers bought for them with their blood; for the first time in all those long years they are preparing to say, "We are free men. We will walk in no corporation's chains." There is no duty in life higher than this; there is none which so directly appeals to every man who loves his country and is determined to do no less for his children than his forefathers did for him.

Yet among those voices which were lifted in prize-fight protest were not a few which are mute anent California's 40-year vassalage, and I am sure that some of these very good people have not even registered for this battle royal between right and wrong, freedom and serfdom.

Verily, we are prone to "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel."

A Tragedy of Doomed Pompeii

The black, flame-distorted cloud which long had hung its threatening mantle over Vesuvius had reached out until it overspread the whole heavens like some vast upas tree of magnified evil. Already the affrighted male Pompeians were in full flight—that is, the ungallant and cowardly males were; the rest were waiting for their wives to get ready.

In the marble outer hall of his palace a man paced restlessly to and fro, occasionally pausing to kick a few larses and penates out of his way. He was all alone, even the family cat having started for Naples. Blacker and blacker grew the mantle of darkness until it was quite black, the atmosphere was laden with an impalpable, suffocating dust, the—

The man would not wait for the description to be completed. Suddenly he strode to an open doorway.

"Laura!" he shouted, "For great Jupiter's sake, when are you coming down?"

A silvery voice responded, "In just a minute, Cassius."

Time dragged on, as male readers are aware that it does on such occasions. It could not have dragged slower if it had been an automobile out of commission. The suffocating dust grew denser, the hadesian blackness was illuminated only by the play of sulphurous lightnings, the—

"Laura, Laura! In the name of all the offended gods I implore you to get a move on."

"In just a minute, Cassius."

Among the awful relics of dead Pompeii are the scoria-encrusted forms of a man and a woman. That of the man was found at the foot of a stairway, the lips opened as if he were imploring someone to hurry. That of the woman was found in a chamber at the head of the stairway, and before an ancient mirror, and it is evident that she was almost dressed.

Thus near to escaping did the doomed two come.

Song of the Smith

I am the blacksmith. Beat it out,

Iron to iron and steel to steel!

Let the anvil ring, let the anvil shout,

Salvo on salvo and peal on peal!

Ho, but the toiler buys the right to live,

But the pale-faced dreamer hath naught to give.

Iron to iron and steel to steel!

White-hot the metal that hisses or rings

As I to its soul (that is lost) reveal

Its place in the Country of Useful Things.

This, this is my gift to our whirling ball,
But the pale-faced dreamer gives naught at all.

Mighty my sinews for blow on blow.

Ho, for the sparks as they outward fly!

And red is my blood as my red fire's glow.

For Toil is a king, and its liege am I

By my arm of might is the world's good wrought.

But the pale-faced dreamer gives naught, gives naught.

* * *

A Thoroughly Modern Popular Joke

"There is no doubt," the Office Philosopher contemplatively remarked, "that there is no such thing as a popular joke which is of modern origin; all are ancient. Legend relates that Noah whipped Japhet for telling him the mother-in-law joke again, and it is recorded on a stone tablet taken from the pyramids that one of the Pharaohs ordered the execution of a humorist who sprung the plumber joke on him. No, there is no popular joke which has not grown old with the creeping aeons."

"Aw, you've gone woozy again," the Office Chump declared.

"Do you mean to suggest," the Philosopher gravely inquired, "that there is such a thing as a popular joke that is new?"

"You bet I do."

"Well, name it—if you can."

"Willie Hearst's political aspirations are record."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Republican Convention Called For September 6

It is not true, as many have supposed, that the new direct primary law did away with holding party conventions. The law still requires conventions for the purpose, first, of formulating and adopting a party platform, to which not the slightest attention will be paid inasmuch as all candidates will have been nominated three weeks before on platforms of their own making. A platform made several months after the opening of a campaign, and three weeks after it has closed, won't even catch flies.

The second and more important function of the state convention, which in this instance is to consist of 428 delegates, will be the selection of the new governing body of the party. This will be extremely important. Not since the Estee campaign, at any rate, have the Republicans of California had anything to say about the control of their own party. That function has been performed for them by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, through the naming of the executive committee of the state committee. The only function the state committee has performed is that of calling the next convention. Even that function was programmed for it by the executive committee, cut and dried and made ready to serve. Monday's session afforded no exception to the rule. The whole thing was framed up in advance. Now whoever controls the government of the political party in power controls the government. The fact that the present Southern Pacific committee of the Republican party will organize the convention September 6th will give it great advantage in controlling that convention and, in making Federal appointments in this state, possession of the governing body of the party will be a most important if not a paramount influence with the administration at Washington.

The September state convention will be composed of delegates elected by county conventions held within two weeks after the August primary election is held. At that primary electors will vote, at the bottom of their ticket, by writing in or pasting on, the names of persons they wish to send to the county convention. As the county convention will have nothing to do but select a county committee it will be a perfunctory task that no one not having an ax to grind will wish to attend to. Right here look out for Herrin's handy men. They will lay their wires to capture the county conventions in order that they may capture the state convention and so continue their control of the governing body of the Republican party. Send only your best men to the county and state conventions. Suffer no political odd-jobs man to go. He will sell you out and your party, too.

The Division Line Now Clearly Drawn

While the only legitimate function of the State Central Committee of the Republican party was to call the next state convention and apportion the delegates thereto, the Southern Pacific's executive committee was good enough to go out of its way clearly to define the issue between the "organization" and anti-organization forces within the Republican party. There has been fear that the "push" would side-step the issue, but they met it fairly. They laid down the dividing line. Let us see where it leads and where the ways part.

The resolutions adopted endorse President Taft. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Leaguers also endorse the President for his good intentions and sincerity of purpose. They are unquestioned. So far both factions travel the same road.

The Central Committee "commends with unstinted praise the President's method." That method consisted in going to the enemies of the Roosevelt policies for the enactment of laws designed to put those policies into operation, and the President did it because the enemies to whom he went chanced to be in the nation, as they are in California, in possession of the governmental machinery of the Republican party. In this the Lincoln-Roosevelt League wing of the Republican party believe that the President made a mistake, as he made a mistake when he surrounded himself with such machine politicians as Ballinger, Wickersham, Hitchcock and Cannon, Aldrich and Elkins as cabinet members and advisers. Here a line of cleavage begins to appear.

But the committees goes on to "deplore and denounce that form of insurgency which, under the cloak of Republicanism, refuses to aid our President in his great work." There has been no such insurgency. The insurgents in congress have fought the concessions which the President, under pressure from his advisers, weakly made to the railroad presidents and, despite President and railroad influence, forced into the railroad bill remedial features of the first importance. They whipped the representatives of the "interests" to a standstill, and snatched victory from defeat. There the dividing line is clearly drawn.

The insurgency against which Mr. Herrin's committee inveighs is one that stands for the Roosevelt policies without injurious compromise. The insurgents have stood by the President when their so standing meant not only the salvation of the Roosevelt policies, but the salvation of the President himself and in spite of himself. Not a law of them all will be written into the statute books, that is fit to be there, that was not made fit through insurgent influence in congress, backed by an overwhelming insurgent public sentiment outside of congress. Here the committee made the issue plain.

It Refused To Be Free

The domination of the governing body of the Republican party by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific has been open and notorious ever since the Estee campaign, if not before. Out of the goodness of his heart, Chester H. Rowell, President of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, gave the committee a chance to emancipate itself. The opportunity was spurned. Mr. Rowell's resolution read as follows:

"Resolved, That this Republican State Central Committee hereby repudiates the influence heretofore exercised by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company in the councils of the party and in the government of the state, and calls upon all candidates for Republican nominations to declare unequivocally their opposition to this influence and their purpose, if elected, by all means in their power, to remove it from further influence in the politics and government of California." The resolution was promptly laid on the table by vote of the committee.

Why laid on the table? Because it implies the truth of what everybody knows to be true? Or was it because the committee has no notion of affronting that very puissant corporation from whence comes its help? Here the line of division between the two wings of the Republican party becomes a chasm.

But what would have been Mr. Rowell's predicament if the committee had had the sagacity to adopt that resolution? Would it have spiked the League's guns? He must have relied on the well-known inability of Bourbonism to seize an opportunity when offered on a silver platter. The adoption of the resolution would have meant nothing to the "organization," but would have confused the main issue seriously.

The Advisory Vote To Be Made a Farce

If there be one thing more than another that the People of California want, politically, it is a direct voice in the election of United States Senators. They feel that if they have this they may be able now and again to elect a United States Senator who will represent the State of California rather than the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky. This demand forced the hands of the "organization" legislators last session to give the people at least the semblance of a chance to advise the legislators as to their preferences, but hardly more than that. Still, if carried out in good faith, it would be possible, under the grotesque substitute for a state-wide expression of preference, for the people to express a real preference when they have one to express.

Knowing that it would be useless for any candidate tarred with the Southern Pacific stick to go before the people for endorsement, and not having any candidate not so tarred, the "organization" has preferred to offer no candidate at all in opposition to the eminent jurist whom the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has named for senatorial honors.

It has been suspected that the policy of the Political Bureau would be to ignore the expressed preference of the people, whatever it might be, and throw the issue into the legislature as though there had been no such expression of preference. At Monday's meeting of the Republican state committee Mr. Rowell developed this tendency by offering a resolution setting forth the truth that the advisory vote should be held to be morally binding upon members of the legislature. His motion was laid on the table by action of the committee.

Which makes it necessary for Republican voters to look well to their candidates for the legislature. The legislative candidate who will not pledge himself to abide by the result of the advisory vote should neither be nominated nor elected. Furthermore, it would be well to exact a pledge from candidates for legislative honors to work and vote to make that advisory vote state wide and as unequivocal as possible.

All things considered, Monday's meeting of the Republican State Central Committee was interesting and illuminating. We now know where the "organization" faction stands on the crucial issues of the day.

We Got What We Want. What Kick Have We?

It is clear from the action taken by the Southern Pacific's State Executive Committee, and concurred in by the "organization" State Central Committee, that the Bourbon line of battle is to be formed on the Payne-Aldrich tariff. The precise issue is, "California got what it wanted in that deal, what care we for the rest of the country?" That line of defense is advantageous. It makes appeal to every beneficiary of protection. We, less than two millions of people here in California, got what we want. What care we for the eighty-odd millions elsewhere in our common country who did not get what they need? What care we that cotton and shoddy must take the place of wool; that the door to competition with the iron ores of the world shall be closed for the benefit of the United States Steel Corporation which owns three-fourths of the iron ore of this country? What care we that behind the Chinese wall of excessive protection the feudal lords of industry grow more and more opulent and powerful, while an increasing proportion of the toilers in the factories are reduced to the condition of the Hunkies of Pittsburg, the industrial hell of the continent? It is humiliating to confess it, but a strong, and perhaps a winning, fight may be made on that line of battle. The Watchman cannot speak for the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League but, as for himself, he would have rejoiced to see the President veto the Payne-Aldrich atrocity and go to the American people on the issue that there shall be "All the protection that is needed, but not one dollar for monopoly," and that tariff schedules shall be formed upon information ascertained by an expert tariff commission and not by a system of log-rolling and bargain-counter huckstering based on the proposition that, "if you will stand in for my stealings I will stand in with your graft." The mistake of Cleveland's life was his side-stepping the Wilson bill, and nothing that Taft will ever do will quite atone for his weak surrendering to the interests on the tariff issue. The issue is between the "get something" idea and the moral sense. Over and over again it is, "Damn the moralities, what we want is prosperity," and that conception of statesmanship is not without able advocates. It has sometimes triumphed in San Francisco and has not always been defeated in California. Right minded men may well take notice that there is a fight on hand and a fight for principle against pelf.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

Not Democratic Enough To Hurt This paper has been taken to task, on its loyalty to Republicanism, for having said a good word for the candidacy of Walter Macarthur for Congress in place of Julius Kahn. The writer of this has been a Republican from childhood. He has voted the Republican ticket straight,—after the Starr Jordan method of scratching the crooked Republicans off it, and putting straight Democrats in their places,—and if he were in the Fourth Congressional district would vote for Walter Macarthur in pursuance of the policy of making the Republican ticket straight. Whoever serves the Herrin machine with the purpose of keeping it in the Republican saddle instead of unhorsing it and casting it out of the ranks, is no good Republican. Walter Macarthur is a better. Besides, Walter Macarthur is a near-Republican anyhow. He is a Democrat more out of protest to the gross materialism of the Republican control than from any other cause. On tariff, expansion, finance, conservation he will be found acting and voting in accord with the best Republican sentiment of our time. The great, splendid Taft program for legislation makes stronger appeal to him than to Kahn. It would not be with reluctance that he would vote and work for postal savings banks, conservation of forests, waters and power. He would stand for them more uncompromisingly than the President himself. If it be Republican to be loyal to the common good, to the highest and best ideals of our time, then Walter Macarthur is a good-enough Republican to justify anybody in supporting him, while a Republican who works for and with a railroad political machine is scarcely Republican at all.

The Galling Handicap Of A Good Conscience

There are occasions when the possession of a good conscience, one of those New England appurtenances which forever is wanting to know: "Is it right?" becomes an impediment, if not a downright handicap. To illustrate: Two weeks after the primaries shall have been held, and all party candidates for office have been nominated, a convention will be called to adopt a party platform. It is now proposed to be made a test of loyalty to party to agree to adopt and stand on that platform nearly two months before it is written. To the man of easy political conscience, the man who goes around fairly bulging with mental reservations in mitigation of the insincere promises he has made, nothing can be easier, but with the candidate who has principles and has espoused policies that he regards as vital to the well-being of state and nation, well, it is not so easy for him. The Watchman fully expects the Republican State convention to adopt a party platform that he can endorse, but he is not now endorsing that platform-to-be. Any candidate who makes oath in advance to such a platform writes himself down as of easy conscience. The Herrin organization of the Republican party will organize that convention. If possible, it will constitute the committee on resolutions. If it can accomplish it, it will strive to make that platform disqualify every progressive Republican nominated, and it were the part of prudence to repudiate the platform in advance rather than endorse it aforesaid. All the platforms that are going to count in this campaign are being made now by the candidates themselves and those who are championing their candidates. All others will be superfluous.

Johnson's Itinerary Hiram Johnson will speak next week: at Los Gatos next Monday evening, June 27th, and at Santa Cruz Tuesday evening, the 28th. On Wednesday, the 29th, he will speak at Soquel at 12:45 p. m., at Pajaro at 2:30 p. m., and at Watsonville at 8 p. m. On Thursday, the 30th, at Castroville at 12:45 p. m., at Pacific Grove at 3 p. m., and at Monterey at 8 p. m. On Friday, July 1st, at San Juan at 12:45 p. m., at Hollister at 2:30 p. m., at Spreckels at 5:30 p. m., and at Salinas at 8 p. m. On Saturday, July 2nd, at Paso Robles at 1:30 p. m., and at San Luis Obispo at 8 p. m.

Attorney Meserve Held In Reserve Months ago it was bruited about that at the psychological moment, in default of another candidate for senatorial honors, E. A. Meserve, a noted corporation lawyer of Los Angeles, would be brought out as the "organization" candidate. He has ventured into the open. In an interview in the Los Angeles Times of recent date he took high ground against Southern Pacific influence in California politics and pledged himself to take the people's side whenever an issue is squarely drawn between people and railroad. Doubtless Tom Dozier could purge himself with similar facility, solemnity of unction and like effect, but the fact is that for many years

A HARD ONE TO TAKE

Edwin A. Meserve has been a first lieutenant of Judge McKinley, a known Southern Pacific war horse. On the floor of conventions Meserve has been an effective ally of the Southern Pacific Bureau and he will not get forty rods from home on his campaigning of the state before the tar from the S. P. stick will begin to show on him. It may have begun to show already, for rumor has it that he has thought better of his candidacy and that one Perry H. Weidner is to be "it." The trouble the "organization" has been having in getting its campaign shaped up is almost pathetic. Nobody stays put.

Perry H. Weidner A Little Removed If it be true, as reported, that Meserve is really out of the running for the United States senate before he had fairly begun to run at all, then it is because his candidacy, notwithstanding it was launched by Mr. Herrin himself, was thought, upon reconsideration, to be too raw to have any health in it, and Weidner has been turned to as less objectionable on that score, while sufficiently allied to the "organization" to be reliable in case of his election. He is a banker and has been prominent in Chamber of Commerce work, and whoever has done effective work for Los Angeles in the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce is not a stranger to the hearts of Los Angeles property owners and real estate dealers. Flint, Gillett, Garland, Gage, Booth, Meserve, Weidner, verily many have been called but few chosen. The prospect of trying conclusions with Judge Works does not, on mature deliberation, look good to any of them. And then, besides these, there is talk of Phil Stanton stepping out of the gubernatorial race and into the senatorial, or, in other words, out of the frying pan and into the fire. It must be hard for one as kindly disposed as Mr. Herrin to know that to be caught lending a hand to a friend is to be made guilty of his political assassination, but so it is.

A Bad Half Hour With the Big Boss It may safely be inferred that the Southern Pacific's steering committee had a bad half hour with the Big Boss after the session of the Republican State Committee had come to an end, and yet Mr. Herrin probably knows by this time that, with the exception of a very few adepts, trained under his eye, he has not a political hanger-on who can be trusted beyond where specified orders terminate and personal initiative begins. But why should he grumble? In the nature of things it must be so. The man who will surrender his manhood into another's keeping usually has little to give up and nothing to retain by way of surplus. The Big Boss has been able to develop no more capable bell wethers than he can count on the fingers of one hand. The rest are mere muttoms, and there wasn't a Southern Pacific bell-wether at the meeting.

Political Significance Of Stopping the Fight Politicians have racked their brains to little purpose in trying to figure out the political significance of Governor Gillett's having stopped the big fight. When they ask, "Why did he do it?", "In whose interest was it done?" echo answers with a hollow sound repeating the words. It is fairly easy to see that, on the one hand, it has solidified Curry's forces as nothing else could have done and, on the other, that if Gillett should come out for Alden Anderson, his action regarding the fight might draw some good men's votes away from Johnson, but the idea that either of those effects was pre-arranged does injustice to the Governor. Governor Gillett acts first and thinks afterward. He had been annoyed by the criticism of his non-action. When, on the 9th, he told a Call reporter that the matter was not of sufficient importance to pay attention to that was the way he felt about it then, but so many thousands of good people paid attention to him that, two or three days later, he sent to the state law library for books and went through them. He found that he had better warrant for interfering than he had supposed. The notion struck him to act. Now when the Governor gets in a mind to act he acts. He isn't afraid. He goes at it hammer and tongs. He acted. The first his own secretaries knew of his action was when he had "done acted." As for meditation and consideration, the Governor being in the prime of virile manhood, there is time enough for that hereafter. Those who presume premeditation are presumptuous.

E. J. Callan Should Be The Nominee

The candidacy of E. J. Callan for the state senate from the Twenty-second district offers to San Francisco a brilliant opportunity to help redeem itself in the eyes of the state, a thing San Francisco has especial need to do at this time. Mr. Callan was the representative of the Thirty-ninth Assembly district in the last legislature and made one of the most admirable records made in that body. He showed himself to be possessed of character, courage, good sense and sound judgment. He is clean and progressive. He deserves the promotion. And the Twenty-second District deserves the promotion of having such a man as Callan represent it. Its representative last year was Gus Hartman, who, according to Hichborn's record, voted wrong on every one of the sixteen test votes, making the worst record of the whole forty members of the senate—the one flawlessly wrong record in the lot. That this kind of a man does not really represent the Twenty-second District is indicated by the fact that Hartman has not ventured to try for re-election. The Twenty-second is normally a decent district, standing for better things, and in Callan it will find the man of its own type. Callan will be opposed at the primary, but The Watchman has more faith in the spirit of the district than to believe that he can be defeated.

Thos. M. Robinson To Beat Jack Cook Thomas M. Robinson is the candidate of all factions of the Republican party in Alameda County, except the "push," for County Clerk to beat Jack Cook. The brains and the guiding hand of the "court-house ring" of Alameda County—one of the most vicious of its type—Jack Cook, is facetiously known as "the sixth member of the board of supervisors." The humor of the phrase is grim rather than light. What he has told them to do the supervisors have done, and these things have not added to the lustre of the good name of Alameda County.

JULIUS GALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office, 30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491
Residence, 1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590
SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY The Complete Text of the REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

Thomas M. Robinson is a man of a very different type. He has always stood for clean politics, and has always had the opposition of Cook and the machine. He has been for fifteen years the chief deputy in the county assessor's office. It is worth noting that the general belief in Alameda County today is that he will put Cook down and out of the political game. May that good hope come true!

News of the Democrats A contest is on for the Democratic nomination for State Railroad Commissioner from the Northern California district. Richard F. Rammers of Vacaville was for a time the only candidate, but lately Dr. C. L. Browning of Chico has decided to go up against him. Beyond this new development, however, little seems to be doing in Democratic politics beyond the candidacies announced by The Watchman a few weeks ago. Candidates for the State Board of Equalization are yet to be found. The central organization of the party will soon, however, be advised as to candidacies for the Legislature. It has just now got around to that phase of the political situation.

Is the President's Way Justified By Results?

It is being affirmed with zeal that the President's way of accomplishing results has been fully justified by the results obtained. Is that true? His method consisted in two things: In presenting the measures he wished congress to enact, in the shape of bills carefully drawn; in appealing to his party to make his measures party measures and procure their enactment through party machinery for the reason that such measures chanced to have been endorsed in general terms by the Republican national convention.

The first part of this method has been justified. It was an innovation likely to prove memorable and to be accorded long continuance. There was, in congress, a good deal of chafing under it and many anathemas were hurled against it, but it is a way of doing things that has come to stay. It is calculated greatly to increase the efficiency of congress and to give power to executive influence speaking in the name of the whole people.

In seeking to make his measures party measures, and force their enactment because they were party measures, the President exalted party organization above congress itself. This was logical enough but not wise, and was not submitted to. It was through resistance to it that bad legislation was transformed into good legislation.

Whoever, from President down to member of a state assembly, opposes what he believes to be a good measure, or supports what he believes to be a bad measure, because the one comes from the political party in opposition or the other is espoused by the party to which he belongs, is less than a good citizen or conscientious public official. In this particular the President has shown himself more of a party man than states' man. That part of his method failed in its application. His measures were whipped into proper form in despite of party leaders, party management and party lash.

The Railroad Bill In Its Final Form

The President's intentions regarding railroad control, as announced in his keynote address at Des Moines, while on his great swing around the circle, were admirable. As those intentions took form in the bill drafted in New York in August, 1909, they were good. As the bill, after being revised to conform to the views of the railroad presidents who were heard by the President and his Attorney General, was finally submitted to congress, it was abominable, a hundred times worse than no legislation at all on that subject would have been. As the measure was then framed it bore the finger prints of a malign and cunning rascality, which, however, was not that of the President. As it is after twelve weeks of successful warfare against the worse of its provisions, and unsuccessful struggle on behalf of some of the best things that should have gone into it, it marks a good, long, hopeful stride in advance. It was only by defeating, again and again, those forces upon which the President relied for securing the legislation he wanted, the "regular" "organization," that the measure was preserved from perversion and the country from disaster. To the embattled insurgents must be given the greater glory.

OF WOMEN IN BOOKS

The lives of women lend themselves less readily to the purposes of the novelist than the lives of men. Perhaps it is—probably it is—that the lives of women are more circumscribed, more sheltered, more conventional, negative rather than positive, following the course of events rather than shaping them. Thus they rarely enter actively into those scenes of stress that are the basis of dramatic action.

It is easy to write interestingly of conflict, difficult to write interestingly of peace. The storm stirs the imagination, the calm soothes it; fiction is devised to stir it. A man may be great and admirable and pure in the midst of tremendous conflicts of which he is an active participant. A man of great soul is admired and loved if he fights his way up from sin to righteousness. But a woman may not, according to the canons of civilization, sin at all and be at all admirable. This is wrong. Woman should have the same chance of redemption as man. But the world has decreed otherwise, woman herself the most rigorously of all. So, our heroines must be spotless or they may not be heroines. And the life of angels is, by human standards, dull. Hence the rarity of a loveable woman in fiction who is not also uninteresting.

For confirmation of the idea, follow our English literature of the imagination, from Shakespeare down, and see how vastly the heroes outnumber the heroines. In Shakespeare himself, how quickly the great roll of admirable male figures springs to memory—Brutus, Coriolanus, Horatio, Lear, Antony, the Banished Duke, Orlando; Adam, Othello—the list is too long to copy—men for all their sins and shortcomings. Of the commanding female figures in Shakespeare, Cleopatra is a siren, Lady Macbeth an ambitious murderess. Shakespeare has, however, to his credit more loveable women who also interest than, we are tempted to say, can be found in the whole body of English literature beside—Juliet, Portia, the lovely Rosalind, Celia, Cordelia, Brutus's Portia—as winsome as they are pure.

But even in Shakespeare the men far outnumber the women and, generally, outrank them in interest. And in subsequent English fiction and drama, the proportion dwindles to a thin stream. The women of the early novels are silly nothings. Goldsmith painted one interesting portrait, Kate Hardcastle, amongst a half dozen interesting men. Sheridan's women are gossips and shrews. Thackeray's best female portrait is Becky Sharp, an adventuress: the rest are nobodies. Dickens' women are preposterous caricatures or wax figures. Sir Walter Scott's are unreal. George Meredith's Diana is loveable but, at the end, unbelievable as a type of anything human.

We cannot, at the moment, recall one character in fiction that could conceivably suggest to any man an adequate portrait sketch of his own mother. Shakespeare drew several that appeal to men as their sweethearts do. Perhaps it is the highest, because unconscious, compliment to womankind, that genius, even, has found in her few resources for dramatic art. It may be that this fact signifies most strikingly of all things the superior virtue and self-control of the sex.

From another point of view it may suggest that most women's lives are so devoted to a projection of their own personality upon the character of those men who are nearest to them, husbands and sons, that they exhaust their possibilities of action inside the limits of their thresholds, leaving no time nor place for outward show of character in the world. This is probably true, that women do play their part in the world mainly as Maggie Wyllie does in "What Every Woman Knows," by shaping the lives and characters of the John Shands who go forth to fight and win renown. In this view, the story of every hero is the story of himself and The Woman.

A STATE INSTITUTION FOR HABIT VICTIMS

• CHRONIC ALCOHOLISM AND DRUG HABITS ARE CURABLE DISEASES

By DR. R. E. BERING

During an experience covering eight years I have received many pitiful letters from men and women who were addicted to the alcohol, morphine and cocaine habits, who had an honest desire to be freed from its terrible slavery, but unfortunately had no means wherewith to pay even a portion of the necessary expense. I have investigated a number of these cases and found them of much merit. Many I treated and sent home happy and useful citizens.

The appeal has been from husbands using the drug without the knowledge of the wife; from a wife using it as a result of some previous illness who has tried but was unable to throw off the yoke of bondage; from a mother appealing for the restoration of her son; and from sisters looking after the welfare of some errant brother.

It is in behalf of this class of sufferers that I present this article in the hope of some action to the end that legislation may be had meeting the requirements of these ever increasing evils, so that many people now considered useless may be restored to their proper position in life, thus bringing happiness and comfort to blighted homes; and that a practical economic measure may be started that will result in saving to the state large sums of money through the lessening of crime.

Habits Lead to Crime and Insanity

According to the biennial report of the State Board of Prison Directors there were confined in the penitentiary at San Quentin prisoners with the following habits:

Addicted to liquor.....	39
Addicted to tobacco.....	389
Addicted to liquor and tobacco..	876
No habits	487
Habits not stated.....	348

thus showing a large percentage of the prisoners are addicted to some noxious drug, which upon a close investigation would show many of the offenses against the law were committed while under the influence of one or more of the various drugs mentioned.

Hoisholt says: "There were received in this department at the State Hospital at Stockton, between July 1st, '03 and July 1st, '08, 734 patients, out of which number 138 cases, or 18.10 per cent of the total number admitted, were caused by alcohol. The 138 alcoholists included 48 cases of delirium tremens. The proper place for the cure and treatment of this form of alcoholism is in a home for inebriates.

"Applying the above percentage to the total number of male patients admitted at the five California State institutions during the past five years—that is, 4505—the number of cases of delirium tremens committed during this period may be estimated at about 350, or 70 cases yearly.

"The cost of transporting and committing this number of patients an average distance must have been more than $3000 judging from the bill, a copy of which is in my possession, presented to the State for a patient sent from Oakland to Stockton. This sum, and perhaps considerable more, is annually expended in this manner and does no real good to the patient. It only serves to increase the income of the sheriff's office."

Huge Importations of Drugs

During a period of four years 2,436,771 pounds of crude opium containing 9 per cent or more of morphine, 783,259 pounds of smoking opium and 59,000 pounds of morphine were imported. Out of this amount, 50 to 90 per cent was used illicitly. When we consider the use of such an enormous amount of a drug which reduces the user to the lowest depths of depravity, then it is no wonder that so large a percentage of crime is attributed to this class of citizens.

There is no poisoning so widespread and so rapidly increasing as is the poisoning by whisky, morphine and cocaine, and there is nothing else in life that will cause the same amount of want, distress, unhappiness, heartache and crime as the above mentioned drugs.

According to reliable information 84 per cent of crime, 85 per cent of pauperism, 70 per cent of insanity, 70 per cent of feeble-mindedness and 60 per cent of dependent childhood are caused by alcohol.

Warden Hoyle of San Quentin prison says: "There is little doubt in my mind but that such an institution as it is proposed to establish, if conducted on sane and practical lines, would prove of considerable benefit to humanity in general and in consequence become more or less a factor in lessening crime."

Degenerating Effects Upon Humanity

There are no other kinds of poisoning that so degrade brain structure and disturb mental function while physically degenerating bodily texture and undermining vital organs or which are so far reaching in their evil as to literally follow the Biblical teaching "that the sins of the father shall be visited upon the children even unto the third and fourth generations."

With regards the effect of alcoholic abuse upon the progeny of the individual, Hoisholt says: "There can be no doubt that such children are more apt to become insane or develop criminal instincts than children of healthy parents. They are more apt to develop symptoms of other nervous diseases, or apt to be feeble-minded, epileptic, show physical deformities or have marked drinking habits. Aside from neuropathic tendencies the children in a drunkard's home usually receive a poor education surrounded by untidiness and misery and are influenced by the bad example before them."

Bourneville, who studied 2,554 children admitted to the Bicetre and Fondation Vallee—2,072 boys and 482 girls—all of them suffering from idiocy, epilepsy, imbecility or hysteria, found that 1,053 of them were the offspring of drunken parents, 973 having drunken fathers and 80 drunken mothers.

If this dreaded curse is not eradicated or held in abeyance it is with sadness we may picture the coming ages. There will be retrogression and, instead of having stalwart men and women expressing the highest possible mental, moral and physical faculties and exercising them for good, we will have a deteriorated race living for their own selfish aims.

Drunkenness a Curable Disease

Although it has been several years since Benj. Rush declared that habitual drunkards were diseased persons, there are even yet many men and women to-day who do not agree with him and consider it a waste of time to help them throw off this terrible burden under which they labor. It has been considered almost useless to undertake to cure any one addicted to these habits, that all users were out of the pale of society and could never be restored to good manhood or womanhood, but from an experience of several hundred cases covering every phase of the situation, I am sure that these habits are as positively and certainly curable as are any of the curable diseases. This is a bold and broad statement and one not yet accepted by the general medical profession in all of its detail, but it can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of any one.

As to the ability of science to cure these habits I mention some opinions from men who have devoted a lifetime to this work.

Dr. Day, for many years head of the Washingtonian Home, Boston, an institution now in the fifty-second year of its existence, made a study of 8,000 cases that had formerly been under treatment and found over 30 per cent sober and temperate. He says that "twenty-two years' experience in this work has taught me that the task is neither hopeless nor thankless, nor would it be if the measure of success had been lessened one-half from the known rate of percentage of cures."

Dr. Mason, formerly of the King's County Home, New York, examined the records of 2,000 cases that had been away from the asylum for ten years and found 36 per cent of all cases cured.

Dr. T. D. Crothers, of Hartford, Conn., editor of The Journal of Inebriety, an author of much note, says: "The best authorities unite in considering 30 per cent of all patients remaining under treatment for one year or more as permanently cured."

The reports of the Foxborough State Hospital, Mass., show 30 or 40 per cent of the patients remain temperate for a long period and from 15 to 20 per cent show definite improvement.

Success of Curative Institutions

Switzerland has long since learned that inebriety is a curable disease and that it pays to maintain hospitals for this purpose. At Ellikon, near Zurich, such a hospital has been maintained for the past nineteen years. The results of its labors are most encouraging and prove conclusively that the treatment of inebriety has long since passed the experimental stage.

From the eighteenth annual report we learn that out of 531 patients discharged between '99 and '01 there were cured 240, or 45.2 per cent; improved, 125, or 23.3 per cent; relapsed or unheard of, 165, or 31 per cent.

Of 255 patients discharged between '01 and '06 there were cured 104; improved, 61; relapsed or unheard of, 50.

At Knoxville, Iowa, there has been in existence for the past three years a state hospital for inebriates, whose results thus far are very satisfactory. From the second biennial report we learn that out of the entire number of patients admitted, 774 (41.1 per cent) are known to be cured and living up to the conditions of their parole.

When we consider that in the above mentioned institutions the worst cases are encountered, the percentage of cures is encouragingly high.

The states of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Iowa, Minnesota and Pennsylvania have state institutions for this work. Tennessee has laws committing patients to such institutions.

When the Southern California Hospital was established by the state it was intended as an institution for inebriates, but the number of insane people increased so rapidly that the provisions permitting the commitment of inebriates had to be repealed.

New York and New Jersey have a bill before the legislature favoring this plan.

The Federal Government is now providing accommodations at Washington for this work.

Dr. T. J. J. Burgess, medical superintendent of the Protestant Hospital for the Insane, Montreal, Quebec, says that "I am of the opinion that state institutions for these cases would be of distinct value."

Opinions of Experts

The trustees of the Foxborough State Hospital, Mass., are so well satisfied with the results of that institution that they have recommended to the Governor that the present institution be disposed of, and a new site purchased whereon to erect three institutions, one for men, one for women and the third for a detention colony where hopeless cases are to be kept.

Dr. R. H. Hutchins, superintendent of the Lawrence State Hospital, New York, says: "I am of the opinion that there is a large number of alcoholic and drug habitues who require treatment in an institution conducted by the state. It is not desirable to admit such patients to institutions for the insane, as their influence on insane patients is not good. I believe that such patients may be committed to a proper state institution for an indefinite period dependent upon good behavior and appearance of recovery, but that each relapse and re-admission should be for a longer minimum period, and if it is found, after proper treatment, that the patient can not resume his place as a useful member of society, he should be committed for life with opportunities for liberty and employment within some industrial colony."

In its report to the Hon. John Franklin Fort, Governor of New Jersey, the Dependancy and Crime Commission says: "The state needs most urgently a hospital for inebriates as a means of preventing insanity, disease, degenerate offspring, dependency and crime. Aside from its incalculable value as a life-saver of men and women it would be a great financial gain in the end."

Rossenwasser of New York says: "Such an institution could serve as a center of learning for the medical profession with a field fertile with opportunity." He further says: "It seems to me that there is no branch of medicine which is more important and none in which the physician can do more good for humanity. Unfortunately, as the field was neglected by the regular profession for many years, the work fell into the hands of quacks and is still looked down upon by many. At least I have found it rather hard to convince physicians and others that the treatment of inebriety is a legitimate specialty." Rossenwasser is entitled to much credit for the educational work he has done in this line in the states of New York and New Jersey.

Judge Wilbur's Opinion

A letter received from Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, Los Angeles, of the Juvenile Court of that city, is so pertinent to the subject that I quote it in full. He says:

"There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the state should provide an institution for the treatment of chronic alcoholics and drug habitues. The trouble with our present system is that many of these cases we require to wait until they are absolutely insane before they can be taken charge of by the state in any way, except in jails or prisons. The mere fact that a man has a strong desire for alcoholic drinks or narcotic drugs does not constitute insanity or justify incarceration in an insane asylum, though judges sometimes yield to the appeals of friends and relatives and even of the victims themselves and send such people to insane asylums, where they are usually released in from three weeks to three months and frequently go back to the same habits.

"I have for some time advocated the establishment of a state institution for the care of inebriates. The fact is, that many men are sent to our jails and penitentiaries for crime who, if it were not for the drinking habit, could be safely placed on probation. If, instead of placing these men immediately on probation from the criminal court, they could be committed for the necessary length of time to a state institution and released on probation it would be vastly better. The fact seems to be that most chronic alcoholics and drug habitues do and will commit crime for the purpose of satisfying their appetites.

"It would be vastly better to treat such cases in an institution for that purpose than to attempt to handle them in the ordinary prisons of the state. For instance, it may be cited that last night a drug habitue died in the city prison after having been in jail only twenty-four hours."

California Needs Institution

It is my firm belief that the time will come when California will have a state institution for this class of unfortunates. Further, laws will be enacted to compel a known habitue to go to this central institution and submit to treatment, and the present laws will be changed so that the Superior Judge, upon proper showing of a relative, supported by the evidence of a reputable physician, may commit such a person to a private sanitarium for a stay sufficiently long to accomplish a cure. As it is at present, there is no way of restraining a patient and forcing him to take treatment if he will not do it voluntarily, without having him declared incompetent, and this means publicity and delay.

This may seem a Utopian dream, but I firmly believe the time is not far distant when it will be taken up as a battle cry not only by members of the W. C. T. U. but by all men of whatever political faith or religious belief.

HOMELY PHILOSOPHY

If you want to git the support of some folks for any proposition, prove to them that it's wrong.

If lots o' reformers would rickollect that God takes thousands of years to work out His plan o' salvation, seems ter me it would make 'em more reasonable an' easier to work with.

Still, Ezry, don't you forgit that even an unreasonable reformer is 'bout ten million per cent better than the feller that fairly dotes on vice jest es it is.

The Scripcher says, "Whoso findeth a wife findeth a good thing," but o' course a man can't be too kearful 'bout whose wife it is.

Seems to me the sayin' that a hoary head is a crown of glory must have been intended to be discouragin' an' disheartenin' to bald-headed men.

HONOLULU and back first class from San Francisco

Reduced Rate $110

The splendid steamship SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, July 9, July 30th and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sales from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING
CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 435,000.00

DIRECTORS James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant
Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)

526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909.....38,610,731.93
Total Assets41,261,682.21

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office,
or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin
by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock
P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock P. M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First
Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-
President, Emil Rohte; Cashier, A. H. R.
Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann;
Secretary, George Tourny; Assistant Secretary,
A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt,
Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohte, Ign. Steinhart, I. N.
Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, F. Tillmann, Jr., E.
T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C.
Heyer, Manager.

Rubber Stamps

10 CENTS PER LINE

AT

Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information
from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country.
Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do. If you want to dine well
you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law
SUNSET TEA COMPANY
911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid
on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper	James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper	Mark L. Requa
Thomas Jennings	J. H. Skinner
James K. Lynch	Rudolph Spreckels
Walter S. Martin	John W. Van Bergen
J. K. Moffitt	Rolla V. Watt
S. G. Murphy	Clinton E. Worden
George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults
provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

IT was a great disappointment to gruff old Dr. Archer that his only son should choose a path through life other than the one he himself had trod; but then he had been disappointed in Royal in more particulars than one, and he could bear this also. The boy's dreamy, unpractical ways perplexed and nettled him; and yet Royal had been a valued assistant at times and had learned quite enough first and last to entitle him to a physician's diploma, but had not taken it. He had been found particularly useful in the sick room and, moreover, had assisted his father through two distressingly severe epidemics of diphtheria.

When, therefore, upon the last day of school prior to the holiday vacation, a little child came to him and complained that her throat hurt her, Archer needed no second glance to be assured that his little pupil was stricken with diphtheria in a virulent form. Summarily dismissing school he wrapped the ailing one snugly in his greatcoat and quickly bore her home. Then, securing a pack animal, he spurred away to the nearest town driving the pack horse before him.

It was late that night when Archer returned; for the trail led over the mountain and was long and rough, and the tired pack animal was glad enough to be relieved of his burden. There were tinctures, powders and liniments, delicacies for convalescents and conveniences for the sick room. The diphtheria had been very severe down in the valley that fall, but Wilkerson's Flats were so high and dry, so secluded from the rest of the world, that Archer hoped it would be spared a visitation; but now that the disease had found a lodging place he was fearful that it would sweep the whole settlement through; and so it did. The ill-housed, ill-clad and blood-impoorished people offered but a feeble resistance to the disease, which was of a malignant type; and there was scarcely a home in all the Flats which did not mourn the loss of one or more from the fold. Old as well as young were taken.

For days and nights together Royal Archer scarcely touched his head to a pillow, and he did not lay aside his clothing for weeks. Galloping from house to house, at all hours of the day or night, he ministered to the sick, burned and disinfected, made gruels and broths, instructed, scolded, commanded, spoke words of comfort to the stricken, and closed the eyes of the dead. Wherever he went in daylight hours, and often in the night, Jess was at his elbow. Archer protested; but, "I reckon I kin go whar you kin," she said; and where Archer's mare galloped Jess's pony ran.

It was well for others that Jess had her way; for when children struggled against the hand of Archer, screaming with agony, they submitted to have their throats cleansed by Jess with scarcely a murmur. Jess seemed no longer a child, but to have leaped at once to the estate of capable womanhood, with a hand ever steady, and eyes which did not flinch when gazing into the very face of death. People stood aghast at her behavior and, ever superstitious to a degree, whispered from one to another that Archer had her under an evil spell, and no good would come of it. Their going and coming were everywhere attended with sullen looks though their errand was mercy; for it was said that the affliction came upon the people because of the school, and that the fault lay at the feet of Royal Archer and Jessie Ware.

The holidays went by—such holidays—and January was far spent before the scourge abated; but at last no new cases were reported and those not dead were convalescing. Jess, worn out with watching, had remained at home for a day; and Archer, haggard, unshaven, soiled and weary nigh unto death, crept away to his cabin and to his bed; for he no longer boarded at Borden's. Unable to endure the unvarying fare of biscuit, bacon and black coffee, he had, at Jess's suggestion, purchased a squatter's possessory right to a claim with a cabin on it, and now had a home of his own where he was master and matron, cook and chambermaid, all within his own person.

It was not much of an affair, that bachelor's hall; but it was clean and sweet and quiet, and served the teacher's purpose well. Besides, there was a full quarter section of

THE REGENERATION OF WILKERSON'S FLATS

(Concluded)

BY

ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY

the claim, and much of it was arable and could be irrigated from a stream which came rollicking down from the mountains all summer long. Jess loved the riotous little river even more than she loved the great, jagged mountain which gave it birth; for the mountain was a solemn old fellow, and only put on a glad face when sun and cloud were playing at hide and seek among its hundred canons; but at such times it appeared to have forgotten sorrow and laughed outright. As for the stream, well, it was almost always happy—much happier than Jess and more noisy, too; but once in a while its waters ran high, and then it was terrible. Jess had often wished that Grandpap lived on the river instead of on the "branch," where she could see the great mountain standing full and square against the morning sky; but when the teacher bought the place she was almost as well content as though Grandpap had gotten it.

The sun was getting low when Archer awoke. He had slept through the night and nearly through the day, and would have gone right on sleeping through another night had not Burt Scruggins come tugging at the bedclothes, calling: "Teacher, teacher, wake up! Jess is tuck—tuck this mawnin,' 'nd I reckoned I orter tell ye."

"What's that?" Archer exclaimed, springing from his bed and grasping the boy by the shoulder; "what's that you say?"

"Jess is tuck. Tuck this mawnin'!"

"Jess? What time is it? Bring my horse, quick!" and the enfeebled youth, scarce half recovered from the disease, hastened to obey; but he had no more than reached the pasture gate when Archer, half clad, dashed by him, threw the saddle upon the mare, and spurred away as fast as she could carry him.

Archer had used every means within his power to fortify Jess against the disease, and, having escaped so long, he hoped she would escape it altogether; but it was not to be so. A single glance sufficed to assure him that his little friend and helper had taken the disease, and that her case was likely to be a severe one. It sufficed also to bring the hot blood to his cheeks, and rouse within him an indignation he had not felt before.

The child was lying upon a pallet in a corner of the living room; peevish children were fretting about her, women were scolding, and men with heavy boots were tramping in and out. Tobacco smoke so pervaded the atmosphere as to render objects half indistinguishable; and, if anything at all had been done for the little sufferer, there was nothing to indicate the fact.

Jess raised such pleading, distressful eyes to Archer when he entered that he forgot the customary civilities of greeting and, rushing at once to her side: "This is no place for you," he said, "you must come with me"; and, stooping, folded the coverlid about her as if to take her in his arms.

"Well, if that ar ain't tollerable peert!" snarled the grandmother from her corner; "tekin' our own chile from out'n our own house without'n so much ez sayin' howdy! And a house full of men a-stan'in' round a lettin' of him do it! Sech oudacious doin's I never seed nowhar! Curse the day ye ever came!" she screamed, rising from her chair and pointing her long, withered finger at Archer. "Curse the day ye ever came, I say! Ye fetched fuss 'nd worry 'nd pestilence 'nd death! Ye've bewitched the chile, 'nd now ye'd be a-tekin' of her away; but ye shay'nt do it!" Then, advancing again upon the intruder, hissing and snarling like a witch of the heath, "Be off with ye!" she shrieked—"be off, I say! Thar's been no peace sence ye kum hyer, 'nd thar'll be no peace till ye'r gone!"

Her venomous words roused the men from their lethargy, and they strode toward the door as if to bar the teacher's passage out.

Then broke forth that spirit of the lion which, all unsuspected, slept within the breast of this tall Ohioan. "Old Ben Ware!" he cried, rising to his full height, and shaking his clinched hand before the old man's face, "you shall not keep her here in this kennel of human hounds. That child is an angel. You were not worthy that she should be born under your roof. Your son, whom we buried, was not worthy to be her father, and that woman there was not worthy to be her mother. God sent me to her half across this continent, and she shall not be murdered by your brutish ignorance and dumb neglect. The man who stands betwixt her and me in this extremity endangers his life; do you understand? Stand aside there!" and gathering the child to his arms and crying to the mother to follow, he swung into his saddle and, tenderly bearing his burden, rode away to his cabin.

The mother came cantering after on Jess's pony; the child was slipped between fresh, white sheets; the room was made fragrant with evergreen, and a partly opened window afforded needful ventilation; but there were dull and heavy days to come. There was never a complaint, never a protesting hand raised against the cruel swab, nor a whimper because of the burning medicine. Day after day she suffered in silence, speaking only with eyes which followed Archer everywhere. If Archer slept, it was sitting in his chair with head bowed upon the sick one's bed. Every dose of medicine was administered by his hand alone, and the mother's ministrations were directed by signs rather than by word; for the teacher's heart was too full to admit of speech.

"Please, dear God, let me keep my Jessie! Please, dear God, let me keep my sweet Jess, and I will feed thy sheep!" No other form of prayer had place in Archer's heart; but a thousand times a day was this inarticulate petition reverently laid at the foot of the throne of grace.

It was afternoon. The watcher had done all he could, but the disease had not spent its force, though it was evident that the crisis was not far off. There had been showers at times during the day, and the sun, bursting through the clouds and falling upon the little pepper tree at the gate, made the raindrops clinging to its pendant foliage dance and glisten like burnished jewels. Jess saw it through her window and smiled, then, turning her eyes to where Archer's violin hung against the wall, looked upon it wistfully; and he, comprehending, took it from its peg and drew the bow lightly across the strings, aimlessly at first, but soon, accompanied by it, his voice floated gently out upon that hymn of resignation:

"Father, whate'er of earthly bliss,
Thy sovereign will denies;
Accepted at the throne of grace,
Let my petition rise."

Never before had Archer felt the burden of that hymn as he felt it then, nor had he ever played or sung as he played and sung that afternoon; and when the departing sun fell athwart the landscape it seemed that the gates of glory had opened wide and Heaven's own effulgence bathed the earth. He ceased to play and bowed his head for the thousandth breathing of his prayer. A little, wan, transparent hand stole out from under the coverlid, and, taking his, raised it to blistered lips and kissed it; and Archer, looking up, saw through his own hot tears the streaming eyes of Jess; but she was smiling.

"I am goin' ter git well," she said, slowly and softly—"goin' ter git well ter help you. I am goin' ter help you always, I reckon. It 'pears like I be somehow—help—you ter—make we-uns like you'uns," and pressing Archer's hand tight to her bosom, Jess slept, slept peacefully, breathing deep and regularly. There was no more strangling, no more catching at the breath, fighting for life. The crisis had been safely passed, and Jess was going

Why not have the Best Newspaper

The Weekly Edition

OF THE

Springfield Republican

MASSACHUSETTS

Sixteen Broad Pages for
Only $1 a Year

THE LEADING NEW ENGLAND JOURNAL

A college professor writes to The Republican: "In the three months during which I have been receiving The Weekly Republican I have been so impressed with its vigor, fairness and worth that it seems to me folly not to keep it coming."

A reader in Illinois writes: "The Weekly Republican certainly is different from all newspapers I have ever taken, and I think far superior."

These tributes, selected from hundreds of letters received during the past year, are suggestive of the satisfaction which subscribers to The Weekly Republican derive from their favorite newspaper.

This famous independent New England journal, established in 1824 by Samuel Bowles, appeals strongly to a thoughtful, intelligent class of readers. Its able, vigorous editorials are quoted all over the country, and cover every range of human interest.

The complete news service, local and general, of The Daily and Sunday Republican is drawn on for the Weekly's record of the world's events, while special departments in charge of experts treat of literature, art, music and the drama, science and invention, education, the interests of women, recreation and out-door sports, progressive agriculture and forestry. Travel sketches, handsomely illustrated, and original stories add to the interest and charm of this high-class home paper.

The subscription rates are, for The Weekly $1 a year, Daily $8, Sunday $2.

Specimen Copies of either Edition sent free on application. The Weekly Republican will be sent free for one month to any one who wishes to try it.

All subscriptions are payable in advance. Address

THE REPUBLICAN,
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

to get well and help Royal, help him make her people like his people. Kneeling at the bedside of sleeping Jess, Archer consecrated his life, and hers, to the work of the regeneration of Wilkerson's Flats.

For seven full years did Royal Archer and Jessie Ware serve the people of Wilkerson's Flats, studying and teaching, planning and working—striving to make the settlers industrious, frugal, intelligent; and that an example of thrift might not be wanting in their midst, Archer himself plowed and planted, pruned and grafted; made his own fields productive and his own affairs prosperous, and their efforts were not lost on the community. It was not an easy task to re-establish the school when at length the diphtheria had departed; but the class in practice upon the violin was the nucleus about which the rest of the people were gathered and school and scholars prospered.

Seven years, and there was a wedding at the church, for Jess had returned from Berkeley, where she had spent two years at school, and was going to help Royal—help him always as she had promised.

Surely it is a well-dressed and comely throng pouring forth from the little white church among the slender, trembling poplars, showering congratulations and roses all the way to the coach in waiting at the gate. If one were curious enough to listen, critically, to the hum of happy voices one might catch a quaint expression now and then and his ear certainly would detect a strange intonation and languid drawing of the words; but he could not find a soberer, kindlier people anywhere or one more tenderly sincere in wishing godspeed to a bridal party. Some of the older women wear sunbonnets, it is true, and some of the older men may be caught surreptitiously chewing away as though their lives depended upon the rapidity with which they moved their jaws; but every face is beaming, and many pairs of young eyes sparkle with intelligence.

But the reins are tightening in the hands of the driver, the long lash swings free, there is a falling back from the big coach, the leaders rear and the wheelers spring to their places, a hundred goodby's are shouted, an old shoe or two is flung awkwardly into the air, rice rattles upon the roof, handkerchiefs wave, and Royal and Jessie Archer are borne away from Wilkerson's Flats.

The stage stops at the "gap" to allow two newly wedded lovers to scramble to the summit of Old Storm Rock for a parting look at the old scenes. It is past Thanksgiving time, and the first rains of winter have cleared the atmosphere, washed the summer's dust from the trees, and faintly tinged the hills; but roses are still blooming, and orange and lemon trees are glossy and green. It is true that the fig trees are bare save for solitary leaves clinging pendant here and there to pudgy boughs like clumsy-fingered mittens hung up to dry; and the orchards and vineyards are more than half denuded; but it is a pleasing picture the young couple see looking down from the lofty cliff upon the low-lying flats and valleys betwixt the steep hills and ridges.

The old worm or brush fences are gone, and stout posts and boards or cypress hedges have taken their places. The rickety shanties, too, are nearly all gone, and in their stead are neatly painted cottages of modern pattern. The church stands clear and white among the oaks, and its spire o'ertops them; but it is not so imposing as the big schoolhouse recently built across the way. The box factory, that first venture in mechanics, which furnished winter work and made the rushing river work as well: the packing house, where fruits and raisins are made ready for the market; the creamery and sawmill—all help to impart a prosperous appearance to the view; and then there are those threads of silver, the irrigating canals, spun all along the slopes and hillsides, and which appear to carry water uphill, but do not. Standing upon that pinnacle of rocks the young husband and wife were in full view of the villagers. The mill whistles shrieked a parting salutation, and handkerchiefs fluttered from every garden gate.

"He who, by promoting industry, feeds the hungry and clothes the naked cannot be least among the servants of God." And Jess, looking up, wondered why Royal had said it.

"I ought to have told you before," he said, noticing the look of inquiry upon the face of his wife, "but the truth is I have been so very busy. I once asked a young woman to be my wife. That was before I ever saw you; but I was a dreamer then and fancied that it was only in the ministry that one might truly serve God. She rejected my suit, frankly declaring her preference for a hearty, pushing man of affairs who, in making a place for herself and him, would also make room in the world for many incapable ones and find them honest work to do. Such a one, she thought, could not be least among the servants of God. I thought very ill of the doctrine then, but, thanks to you, my little wife, I believe I see clearer now.

"We are going to Ohio, dear," Royal said, drawing the little woman closer to his side, "to see if we have indeed made your people like my people as you wished; but I fear we have not. I doubt if in all Ohio we shall find a community so truly prosperous, so contented, so beautiful as this one at our feet; for here we have ambition without greed and contentment with neither poverty nor slothfulness. It may be, dear," he added, "that I shall want you to stay in Ohio to help me make we-uns like you-uns."

"No, no, not one bit of it," Jess declared; "if we find that your people really need making over we shall have to bring them here to do the making; for you cannot be spared from the Flats just yet, and there is that pretty cottage among the orange trees. I cannot give that up on any account; but that young woman who was so good as to jilt you for my sake, I must look her up and—thank her. I shall not be jealous one bit, for did not her little speech lead to all of this at our feet? Say it again, won't you? I want to commit it to memory. How does it go? 'He who by promoting industry—I declare I am stuck already.'"

There was a laughing scudding down the hill, the long lash cracked, the leaders plunged, the wheelers bent to their work, and the great, lumbering coach went spinning down the grade, bound for the nearest railway station.

[The End]

THE LITERARY GENIUS

Genius in any art signifies the possession of the power to practice that art most nearly to perfection. In the art of literature this power presumes a wonderful congregation of diverse qualities in one person. These qualities are of the heart, the head and the character.

As literature is the representation of life, the literary genius must live fully. As that representation takes the form of pictures, he must see things and events with extraordinary acuteness. As those pictures are transmitted to the reader by means of words, he must have an extraordinary power over vocabulary and grammar.

The literary genius need not live the events he transcribes, but he must live, through the vitality and perception of his imagination, through the same emotional reactions that those events would have produced upon him had he passed through them in actual experience. This fact presumes a prodigious imagination. It presumes, besides, a prodigious capacity to endure the shock of great emotions. The little man, the everyday man, finds all the resources of fortitude, religion and philosophy none too much to help him bear the common experiences of the common vicissitudes of life. Think, then, of the greatness of soul required of Shakespeare, who endured his own experiences and, in addition, the vast torments of the spirit of his Lear, Macbeth, and Hamlet, and of that long roll of other names of them that suffer in his dramas.

Victor Hugo, in an essay published since his death, marvelously describes the travail of such a poet's soul. As he writes, says Hugo, the actual world fades from the poet's vision and in its place springs up another world, as vivid as the actual, wherein the poet sees a vast multitude of human beings, some decked with flowers and happy as the stars, others a great horde, writhing like the figures in Angelo's "Last Judgment," racked and tortured by the misery of life. From this restless, striving multitude the poet chooses those he would describe and, with them, lives every anguished torment that they feel. The sheer physical power to endure such an experience is part of the equipment of a great literary genius.

With this gift for life, he must combine the gifts of speech and music. Even prose has its rhythm, its music. Much of the enjoyment of great literature springs from the grace of expression that, when read in silence from the page, "sings to the spirit ditties of no tone."

Words are the common possession of a race. Each word is but an arbitrary symbol to express an idea or an emotion. But he who can arrange these symbols to invoke great ideas by their choice and great emotions by their connotation, possesses a peculiar power over language that is an attribute of genius.

We may not weary the reader with an anatomy of genius. But we would suggest the wonderful coincidence of gifts that make it up. To one man, great emotions. To one, great fluency of speech. To one, the gift of song. To one, great ideas. To the great writer, all these gifts and more, locked in one single heart and brain.

What, then, is literary genius? Accident, or divine design. If there be no God, or if He be not imminent in the affairs of men, then the great writer is simply a coincidence, an accident, a prodigy. If there be an overruling Providence, then surely he is a gift of God, a divine beneficence. Either way, mankind profits.

SCHOOLBOY "HOWLERS"

The earth is an obsolete spheroid.
Lord Raleigh was the first man to see the Invisible Armada.

Tennyson wrote "In Memorandum."
King Edward IV had no claim by geological right to the English throne.

George Eliot left a wife and children to mourn his genial.

The capital of Russia is St. Petersburg on the Douma.

The test act of 1673 was passed to keep Roman Catholics out of public houses.

Henry I died of eating palfreys.

Louis XVI was gelatinized during the French revolution.

The Rhine is boarded by wooden mountains.

Gender shows whether a man is masculine, feminine or neuter.

James I died from argue.

An angle is a triangle with only two sides. Algebraical symbols are used when you don't know what you are talking about.

Geometry teaches us how to bisect angles.

Parallel lines are the same distance all the way and do not meet unless you bend them.

The whale is an amphibious animal because it lives on land and dies in the water.

A parallelogram is a figure made of four parallel straight lines.

Horse power is the distance one horse can carry a pound of water in an hour.

The magnesium salt in the sea creates the effervescence when the tides comes in.

If the air contains more than 100 per cent of carbohic acid it is very injurious to health.

Gravitation is that which if there were none we should all fly away.

The press of today is the mouth organ of the people.

A deacon is the lowest kind of Christian.

The isles of Greece were always quarreling as to which was the birthplace of Homer. Chaos has the most right to claim him.

An Unkind Advertisement

($1.50 for long, wavy switches.)—A clipped advertisement.)

The little boy he looked at it;
The little boy he read,
And the little boy he dropped a tear,
A pearly tear he shed,
As he said, "It don't appeal to me;
I will not mention why,
But I think I'll hide this ad. away
For fear my dad 'll buy."

SHEAR WIT

Mrs. Dobbs was trying to find out the likes and dislikes of her new boarder, and all she learned increased her satisfaction. "Do you want pie for breakfast?" she asked. "No, I thank you," said the new boarder, with a smile. "Pie for breakfast seems a little too much." "That's just the way I look at it," said Mrs. Dobbs, heartily. "I say pie for dinner is a necessity, and pie for supper gives a kind of finishing touch to the day; but pie for breakfast is what I call putting on airs."—Youth's Companion.

A few years ago there was a shiftless colored boy named Ransom Blake, who after being caught in a number of petty delinquencies was at last sentenced to a short term in the penitentiary, where he was sent to learn a trade. On the day of his return home he met a friendly white acquaintance who asked: "Well, what did they put you at in the prison, Rans?" "Dey started in to make an honest boy out'n me, sah." "That's good, Rans, and I hope they succeeded." "They did, sah." "And how did they teach you to be honest?" "Dey done put me in the shoe shop, sah, nailin' pasteboard onter shoes fo' leather soles, sah."—Salt Lake Herald.

DIVIDEND NOTICE

SAVINGS UNION BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO, whose name was San Francisco Savings Union (Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco), N. W. corner California and Montgomery Streets.

For the half year ending June 30th, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1st, 1910. A dividend not drawn will be added to the deposit account, become a part thereof and earn dividend from July 1st. Money deposited between June 15th and Monday, July 11th, both days inclusive, commences to earn interest from July 1st.

R. M. WELCH, Cashier.
6-24-2t

DIVIDEND NOTICE

THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY (The German Bank), Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, 526 California Street; Mission Branch, 2572 Mission Street, near 22nd; Richmond district branch, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For the half year ending June 30th, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1st, 1910. Dividends not called for are added to the deposit account and earn dividends from July 1st, 1910.

GEORGE TOURNY, Manager.
6-24-2t

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 1.

Action No. 21780.

ADOLPH ZEIS, as Administrator of the Estate of AUGUSTE ZEIS, deceased, Plaintiff,

vs.

ALL persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property described herein, or any part thereof, Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of plaintiff filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Green street, distant one hundred and thirteen and nine-twelfths (113-9/12) feet westerly from the westerly line of Mason street, running thence westerly along said line of Green street twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23-9/12) feet, thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68-9/12) feet, thence at right angles easterly twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23-9/12) feet, and thence at right angles southerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68-9/12) feet to the place of beginning. Together with the improvements thereon and the appurtenances thereunto belonging.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 8th day of June, A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk
CAREY HOWARD, Attorney for Plaintiff.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of HELEN S. TRIPP, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON,
Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910.
W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF GEORGE CHILDS, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administrator, at the office of W. H. Payson, room 1700, Claus Spreckels Building, southeast corner Market and Third streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

RUFUS H. CHILDS,
Administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 10, 1910.
W. H. PAYSON, attorney for estate. 6-10-5t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of IRENE A. CONNER, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700 Claus Spreckels Building, southwest corner of Market and Third Streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON,
Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910.
W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate. 6-3-5t

NOTICE OF ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE OF THE REAL ESTATE AT PUBLIC SALE. IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

In the Matter of the Estate of JAMES BOLE, deceased.

No. 5905 New Series.

Notice is hereby given that under and pursuant to an order of sale of real estate duly given and made by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 9th day of June, 1910, in the matter of the estate of James Bole, deceased, the undersigned, David C. Bole, administrator of the estate of said deceased, will sell at public auction to the highest bidders, subject to the confirmation of said court, all the right, title, interest and estate of said James Bole, deceased, at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the estate of said deceased has acquired by operation of law or otherwise, other than or in addition to that of the deceased at the time of his death, in or to

All those certain lots of land situate near the Town of Colma, in San Mateo County, State of California, to-wit: Lots 48, 62, 64, 65, 66 and 67, as the same are delineated and so designated on that certain map marked "Map of the Property of the Villa Homestead Association, situated in San Mateo County Township 3 South, Range 5 West, surveyed September, 1872, George W. Doherty, Surveyor," which said map is on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said County of San Mateo in Book 4 of Miscellaneous Records at page 421.

Also all those certain lots of land situate in the said City and County of San Francisco, described as follows, to-wit:

1. Commencing at a point on the Northern line of Lobos Street, distant thereon 550 feet Easterly from the Eastern line of Plymouth Avenue, running thence Easterly along said Northern line of Lobos Street, 150 feet, thence at right angles Northern 125 feet, thence at right angles Westerly 150 feet, thence at right angles Southerly 125 feet to the point of commencement, the same being three lots, each with 50 feet frontage in Block "O" as per map of Railroad Homestead Association on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco.

2. Lot 9 in Block 40, and Lot 3 in Block 41, as the said lots and block are delineated and so designated on that certain map known as the Map of Sunny Vale Homestead Association on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco.

That said real property situate in the said County of San Mateo will be sold in one parcel, and that said real property situate in the City and County of San Francisco will be sold either in one parcel or in subdivisions, as shall appear to the said administrator from the bids at the sale to be most advantageous to the estate.

That said sale will be made on Monday, the 11th day of July, 1910, at 11 o'clock a. m. of that day, at the street entrance to the Grant Building on the Southeastern corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco.

That the terms and conditions of sale are cash in Gold Coin of the United States, ten per cent of the purchase money to be paid to the said administrator on day of sale, and the balance thereof on confirmation of the sale by said court and the delivery of a conveyance. Deeds at expense of purchasers.

Dated June 10, 1910.
DAVID C. BOLE,
Administrator of the Estate of James Bole, deceased.
EDGAR M. WILSON and POWELL & DOW, Attorneys for Administrator, Mills Building, San Francisco. 6-17-10

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Superintendent of Public Instruction

California has more reason to be proud of than satisfied with its system of public instruction. Compared with what most other states in the union are doing California's public school system looms large. It is only when compared with what urgently needs to be done that the system becomes inadequate and unsatisfying.

At the head of this system is placed, by popular election, a State Superintendent of Public Instruction. He holds his office for four years and receives a salary of $5,000 a year besides traveling expenses. It is a position of influence rather than of authority, for, in truth, the State Superintendent does not do much superintending, although by law that is declared to be his first duty. The word "superintend" implies power to regulate, supervise, manage, control. The State Superintendent of Public Instruction does none of these things. He watches, advises and reports to the public on what is done in the schools of California rather than directs what shall be done or determines who shall do it.

For, in educational matters, as in most others, we have home rule in California, or at least county rule, and, to some extent, district rule. The districts employ whom they will for teachers and even the State Superintendent cannot discharge one of them for incompetency and hire another in her place. Authority over our schools is partly vested in the legislatures, which never fail of tinkering at the school laws, partly in state and county boards of education, partly in county superintendents of schools, and only very imperfectly in the State Superintendent of Public Instruction. Perhaps the school system might be improved by giving the state superintendent a real power to superintend, and this might be done with a real warrant in justice, inasmuch as the state, as a state, collects and distributes the greater part of the school funds.

Briefly, the law makes it the chief duty of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction to report to the governor and, through the governor, to the people and the legislature, the condition and the needs of the educational institutions of the state; to gather and tabulate statistics relating to the schools of the state and the teachers in the schools; to ascertain the number of children of school age in the state and the number in the schools of the various grades; to apportion the school funds among the several counties of the state according to a ratio fixed by law, and draw his warrants in favor of the several counties for their due shares; to prepare and have printed copies of the school laws and distribute them among school officers; to prepare and furnish requisite blanks for reports from teachers and school officers and forms for teachers' certificates; to visit schools maintained in orphan asylums receiving state aid and examine into their courses of instruction; to visit schools in the different counties and inquire into their condition; to call and hold yearly conventions of county and city superintendents of schools for conferences and discussions regarding education and school needs. In short, his office is the center to which, rather than from which the educational activities of the state proceed.

Besides being a so-called superintendent of public instruction the one who holds that office is ex-officio member and secretary of the State Board of Education, whose activities may make the subject of a future article, and also of the State text book committee. Although weak in authority the State Superintendent of Schools holds no sinecure. Much of his time is spent on wheels going from county to county, and from school to school. He is a busy man or else a very unfaithful official, and those holding that office have generally been busy enough.

Nor can one person do all the work required to be done. Besides the State Superintendent he has first of all a deputy and, in recent years, it has been the custom of the superintendent to choose his own wife for his deputy and, inasmuch as he draws a salary of $5,000 a year as superintendent, and she draws $2,400 as deputy, they make it a good paying job for the family. Then there is the statistician, who receives $2,000 a year, a text book clerk, who receives $1,600, a stenographer at $1,600 and a porter at $480. These officials, if competent and industrious, are not over paid.

In the judgment of the writer of these lessons the state would do better to establish a department of education with a superintendent at the head with enlarged power, appointed by and responsible to the governor, a man fit to rank with the president of a university and with powers to match. Such a man with such powers could vitalize our educational system beyond compare.

LOOK WELL TO DELEGATES!

A fact important to be noted is that the delegates elected to county conventions at the August primary election to be held this year will be the delegates who will constitute the county convention to be held in 1912 for the selection of delegates to go to the state convention, which state convention will select the delegates to go to the national convention to nominate candidates for President and Vice-President. The new law provides for exactly that situation, and there will not be another general primary after the one to be held on the 16th of August, 1910, until after candidates for President and Vice-President shall have been nominated. This makes the selection of county delegates this year doubly important. They will name the men who will name the men who will name the next party candidates for President and Vice-President. Therefore, look well to those delegates!

It is expected that the Stockton Terminal and Eastern Railway will be in operation between Stockton and Jenny Lind, Calaveras County, about July 1.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary.....$50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary..... 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary..... 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week.. 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

☞ Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE

Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.
1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1239 Broadway

This Week: "THE EVOLUTION OF A WOMEN'S COLLEGE"

—By Josiah Keep

THE CALIFORNIA- WEEKLY: JULY 1 : '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH-GOOD COURAGE-GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00. In Advance. No. 32.

Take the Joy Out of It

SOME OF SAN MATEO'S smart women have been finding joy in speeding their automobiles in competition with express trains in contravention of law. One of them, a Miss Slade, whose papa has much money, is reported to have paid her fine of $25 without a grimace, declaring the joy of it to be well worth the price, but what if the magistrate had imposed thirty days in jail? A fine that may prove crushing to the poor becomes wholly inconsequential when assessed against the rich. The just province of a fine is to re-imburse society for the cost of prosecutions. For penalties imprisonments should always be inflicted, and none merit imprisonment like those who violate the laws because they find the joy of it worth the price.

One Or None

THERE CAN BE NO MORE justification for undertaking to hold two great world-participating, simultaneous expositions in honor of the opening of the Panama canal than there would be in undertaking to build two such canals. The attempt can have but one result, a double, disastrous financial and industrial failure, and the compromiser, be he President or member of Congress, who would sanction two such fiascos rather than muster the resolution to say "yes" or "no" to one or other claimant is made of too mellow material to be exalted to any position where tough fibre is likely to be required. Let there be one exposition or none, and if San Francisco cannot have that one it should keep its money in its pocket and abide its time.

Hope and Fear

THERE WAS PATHOS in the statements of Theodore Roosevelt at Harvard when he declared that, abroad, he found the multitude swayed by two powerful emotions concerning us—hope for the emancipation of the common man and fear that our ideals were being submerged by a greedy materialism. There is reason for hope and reason for fear, for the battle is yet neither lost nor won. And yet progress is making. We can see it right here in San Francisco. Grafting has been made odious if it has not been punished. Those who stood openly for the spread of the night life of San Francisco have felt the contempt of their fellow citizens. The slot machines have been put out of commission and now that survival of the cave-bear age, the prize fight, has been driven over the mountains.

In Fighting Trim

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE recently visited Theodore Roosevelt at Oyster Bay, coming away to report him in fighting trim. There will be fighting enough to do and already the New York machine is feeling the weight of his influence. His espousal of a direct primary election law was characteristic. Representative government is best when it represents. When it does not represent with fidelity it is no good at all and direct legislation is the only recourse.

Good Luck to the Gorilla

THE SOMEWHAT HUMANIZED and regulated survival of tooth-and-claw combat betwixt the California grizzly and the African gorilla will signalize the celebration of the nation's natal day at Reno. So mote it be. Here is hoping that the gorilla may mop the arena floor with his adversary and expectorate in his eye, not out of any spirit of enmity toward the grizzly, but as a fitting humiliation to the race that has capitalized the brutalized instincts of humankind and commercialized a day that should be sacred to high thoughts and hallowed memories. Physical prowess is to be despised only when bereft of moral purpose, but so bereaved man is hardly the equal of the orangoutang which he so much resembles.

The Grafters

ON THE SURFACE it seems a hardship that San Francisco grafters should be forced to pay large fees to surety companies or remain in jail, but whose fault is it that they are not being tried? Who was it that made an infamous deal with the forces of political evil in this city to defeat Heney for district attorney, and so put the administration of the law in the hands of one who has betrayed reluctance to administer it? And who is it that is paying Gallagher to stay away from San Francisco so that the trials of the grafters cannot proceed? As they have made their beds let the grafters lie in them.

It Is Time to Act

THE BIGGER BROTHER who, seeing the little fellows trying to scratch each other's eyes out, does not interfere to restore order and maintain the peace of the family is not fit to head the family. That is the case of Uncle Sam with reference to Nicaragua. Every day that passes adds new emphasis to our national neglect of duty. It is not more territory that we want, but that peace without which life is intolerable and that order without which life scarcely is worth the living. It is time for our government to act toward Nicaragua with firmness and with fairness, but for our common, not our special, good.

The Ridiculous Ideas of Kent

DUNCAN McKINLAY HAS PROMISED himself the pleasure of showing up the "ridiculous ideas" of William Kent regarding tariffs, taxation and other reformatory measures, in their true light throughout his district at an early day. It may well appear ridiculous to one with McKinlay's recent associations, for any man of wealth to hold that taxation should be upon anything except consumption of product, or that tariffs should be based upon what protection is needed, impartially and systematically ascertained, but he will find thousands in his district just fools enough to swallow those ideas whole. They have a taking way with them because they are true.

The Heinze Fee

IF, AS REPORTED FROM NEW YORK, F. Augustus Heinze had to pay his attorney $800,000 to keep him out of prison, where was the harm? Was it not worth the price to beat the law at a hundred points? No malefactor of great wealth ever yet became so reconciled to that prison pallor, cell odor and convict garb that, caught in a tight squeeze, he would not give half he was worth, if he had to, to the criminal lawyer or lawyer criminal who could get him out of his predicament.

Wholly Impersonal

THE ESTEEMED ARGONAUT says of Mr. Herrin's Oregon address that it was "wholly impersonal." So it was. That was the trouble with it. If the eloquent and able gentleman had seen fit to make the occasion one for a full and frank confession of his experiences in practical politics he could have dwarfed the big fight both in interest and lack of reputability.

Union Labor Here and Elsewhere

Skilled labor in and around San Francisco is pretty well unionized. It is not so at Portland, at Seattle, at Tacoma or at Los Angeles. These cities are all competitors with San Francisco in markets along the Pacific Coast, in Alaska, in the territories and inter-mountain states and with such countries bordering other shores of the Pacific ocean as maintain trade relations with our western coast.

This situation cannot permanently continue. Manufacturing cannot endure one-fourth unionized and three-fourths non-unionized. Wages of skilled labor are higher in San Francisco than in Portland, Seattle, Tacoma or Los Angeles, and production costs more in San Francisco than in the other cities named. This difference in the cost of production militates against San Francisco in all markets common to these ambitious and aggressive competitive centers of production. The contest is unequal. San Francisco enjoys no advantage of ore or coal supply, of oil or electric energy, that can equalize this difference in labor cost. The executive abilities of her employers are not of a higher order. Her skilled workmen are not more skilled. The cost of production in San Francisco is greater than in any of the cities named and must remain so as long as the skilled labor of San Francisco is unionized and that of her competitive cities is not.

Shall our energies be put forth to disunionize skilled labor in San Francisco or to secure its unionization in the other cities named? That is the question. It cannot be ignored. The only other choice open is for San Francisco to be content as a local trading center buttressed by such excess of transportation rates from these other cities into San Francisco's commercial preserves as her influence with transportation companies may make shift to maintain, an uncertain protection if not an ignoble.

The answer springs to the lips: "Disunionize San Francisco. That would be easiest, cheapest, speediest." On second thought, would it? San Francisco cannot be disunionized without a struggle as long drawn, as costly and as severe as would be required to unionize the other cities. It would be working against the spirit of the age, against the rise of the common man, against the enjoyment of a right to unite in defense of one's occupation, home and kind that the best thought of our time no longer questions. It would be reactionary in principle and destructive in application.

Once disunionize the skilled labor of San Francisco and adjacent districts, lengthen the working day from eight hours to nine, and lower wages, and Los Angeles, Portland, Tacoma and Seattle will be under competitive pressure to lengthen their working day from nine hours to ten and to reduce wages farther. The consummation of that policy must be the impoverishment of labor without benefit to any of the cities involved, for cut in labor cost must be met by cut in labor cost until that bedrock of mere subsistence is reached which spells poverty, squalor and such a hades of industry as now prevails in Pittsburg, contemplation of which brings the blush of shame to the cheek of every lover of his race.

But if these competitive cities can be unionized, as efforts are now making to bring to pass in all of them, essentially identical labor conditions will exist in all of them. There has never been another device for preventing a competitor cutting under in prices as reliable as the unionization, and consequent equalization, of labor cost. All price levels tend to conform to that initial element in production.

Frankly, in self defense, it would be good policy for San Francisco employers, as well

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News readers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Mott, 336 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

as laborers, to contribute their sympathy, their influence and of their means to aid organized labor in the work of organizing labor in Los Angeles, in Portland, in Tacoma and in Seattle. It would tend toward stability in prices, equality of opportunity and that humane uplift that should challenge the championship of every right-minded man.

If the unions, intoxicated by their success and animated by a narrow and greedy disregard of the common good, seek either to extort more than a just wage from all these cities, or conspire together to such a limitation of apprenticeship and admission to unions as will create an artificial and injurious scarcity of skilled mechanics, then all the employers of all these cities may stand together to resist such aggressions, as certain of the co-operation and support of public opinion as organized labor is now certain of it in its fight for the right to unionize. The policy here commended makes large demands upon the foresight, the magnanimity, the moral courage of San Francisco employers, but The California Weekly ventures to hope that the demand will not prove greater than will be honored.

Enemies to Protection

A concerted effort is making to deceive Republican voters into the view that those who do not approve of the Payne-Aldrich tariff measure are enemies to protection. Duncan McKinlay will ring the changes on this idea. Mr. Herrin's State Central Committee declared it. The "organization" press iterates it with one voice. The allegation is not true. The enemies of protection are those who, by combination and trustification of industries, destroyed free competition within the tariff wall, without which the protective theory has not one justification in theory or in practice. There is but one sound principle to apply to the issue and that is this: "All the protection that is needed without one dollar for monopoly." Whoever espouses any other tariff doctrine is an enemy to protection and deserves to be branded as such.

Over the Border

In round numbers, a hundred thousand "Unitedstatesuns" are crossing the line into the Canadian northwest every year, taking a hundred million dollars with them. They are being attracted thither by a land hunger that cannot be satisfied on this side of the line. It is not a bereavement to brood over. They will not be poorer Americans for crossing the line northward than the Canadians have proven through coming to the United States to cast their fortunes with us. When the time shall be at its fullness, they will count in the scale for that ocean-bound United States of America that shall open the way for a United States of Europe, another of Africa, a fourth of South America, if not sometime of Asia. When nations shall be continental in their dimensions the peace of the world will be subjected to few disquietudes.

Tendencies Maniacal

The accusations contained in Ellery's latest, to the effect that Hiram Johnson is insincere in his opposition to railroad domination of the politics of this state, and that William F. Herrin is backing Johnson as certainly as Anderson, give rise to the fear that State Engineer Ellery may not get the reconstruction of Agnew hospital so far advanced as to furnish fit accommodations for candidate Ellery's comfort against the time of need. His symptoms suggest a liability to become maniacal at any moment. Too bad! Such a promising young man, too!

Making-Up to Save From Prison

One Leland H. Barnard, of Oakland, is a defaulter. Report has it that if his delinquency be made up he may not be prosecuted. That were outrageous if true, which it probably is not, and yet not without precedent. It is not every embezzler who should be sent to prison. There are single, sudden, unpremeditated lapses from honesty that should not be even prosecuted to conviction, but in all such cases the rich and the poor should be treated exactly alike. The poor cannot square accounts with justice by making up the deficiency and the rich should not be permitted to square accounts with the state that way. Unless identical restitution can be made of that which was stolen any restitution on the part of the family should not stand betwixt the culprit and what should be his due at the hands of justice. If embezzled funds are made up it should be to protect the honor of the family, not the liberty of the accused. Another point in the case demands consideration: It is reported that the young man's accounts had not been investigated by his superiors for two years. That was leading into temptation and was blameworthy. No one who has not forgotten the Lord's Prayer should be chargeable with that neglect. Many a weakling has gone to prison because his employer was careless, a fact to be taken into consideration by the court in meting out punishment.

Gracious Goodness

With renewed assurances of his distinguished consideration and personal regard the Mayor of San Francisco has forborne to reappoint Mr. Flannery to the police commission in his own despite. With what justice therefore dare anyone charge P. H. McCarthy with a truculent disregard for the feelings of others? Nothing becomes the great like magnanimity. Again is the saying vindicated that, "Mercy is twice blest, blessing him that gives and him that takes," for nothing could be more fitting to his circumstances than that Mr. Flannery should be excused from having further honors thrust upon him. To be sure he was exonerated by a jury of his peers, but there was evidence of associations and affiliations with bunco men and convicted and confessed criminals that make discretion on Mr. Flannery's part the better part of valor. Mayor McCarthy's forbearing to reappoint Flannery whether or no descends upon the city as dew from heaven, a sigh of relief is yielded up from four hundred thousand grateful hearts.

The Slot Machines

The dove-like quality of the roar which Mayor McCarthy uttered when the Governor ruthlessly removed the Mayor's intellectual pastime to Nevada, his forbearing to reappoint Harry Flannery to the police commission, and that unwonted suspension of hostilities toward every good thing remaining to San Francisco which has prevailed for some weeks, afford ground for hoping that his truculence will hardly be equal to attacking the slot machine ordinance now fortunately in force. All the same it will be well to watch the movement for the reinstatement of the machines. The number of those who rate the careers of San Francisco's youth as of less value than nickels is legion and seldom caught napping. The children of light sometimes sleep. Watch!

Low Wool

Notwithstanding that the wool tariff schedule remains untouched, and that the woolen industry has more tariff protection now than it had during the Civil War, wool rules low in the American market and nearly fifty per cent of American machinery for woolen manufacture is idle. What can the matter be? Does the industry need more protection? Or has the substitution of cotton and shoddy for wool, and the inability of the purchasing public to pay trust prices for all-wool goods, paralyzed the industry? It looks as though the sin of greed had inflicted its own well merited punishment.

If Cities Knew Their Power

The decision of the Supreme Court of California in the Geary street railroad case was splendidly liberal. It is to be accepted with satisfaction. It opens the way for relief from a galling monopoly that had for its object, not alone the debauching and mulcting of the people of San Francisco, but such an overcapitalization of enterprise as must, if unloaded upon a confiding public, inasmuch as a day of reckoning between people and corporation will sometime come, prove a sorry experience to investors.

But the supreme court has opened a way for San Francisco to help itself and in a way not to invalidate any honest dollar invested in the existing street railroad enterprises. It is not retribution that is wanted, but deliverance.

If American cities could learn their own power there is scarcely a wrong they suffer that could not be remedied. The municipalities of continental Europe have learned their strength and British cities have learned theirs. Why should American cities be less self confident, resolute, daring?

Boston lately asked the legislature of Massachusetts to empower that city to buy suburban properties in large holdings, that the city may segregate them into small and sell them on easy terms of payment to persons ambitious to own homes of their own, not being able to buy of those promotion companies that feel that they must quadruple their investment every time they reduce a farm to city lots or villa tracts. Learned legalists are scrutinizing the proposal over their spectacles with doubts as to its constitutionality, with doubts as to whether or not a city should invade the sacred precincts of private or associated enterprise having extortion as its object. Meantime, tuberculosis ravages congested Boston districts and babies are born but to die babies, ill requiring the pain their coming entails. What Boston is striving to get power to do all American cities should have been doing for decades.

Los Angeles has begun to appreciate its own strength. It is fetching water more than 200 miles over desert and mountain. It is preparing to generate its own light and power and, at San Pedro, it is planning to make a harbor fit to supply the needs of the southern tier of commonwealths through to the Gulf of Mexico.

San Francisco is just beginning to feel the thrill of life along its keel. It, too, is trying to go to the mountains for water and, whether in the finality it goes there for water or not, it should go there for its own power every whit as important as water, and get it, too, in no other way can it be sure of slipping out of the grasp of the extortioner, the corruptionist and the exploiter of the wealth of the many for the advantage of the few.

The supreme court has given San Francisco a hint as to the power it may have if it will use it. That power should be limited only by the city's need. That need is mainly for self defense, the first of nature's laws and therefore well grounded; buttressed, validated. If any city be half slave and half free it is because it has not known its own power or had the courage to use it.

The Inter-Mountain Rate Cases

While the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission relative to freight rates into and out of the intermountain district has promptly been taken up to the supreme court of the United States it will come down again in due season not much impaired. By the court's own limitation of judicial powers in such cases those powers are confined within narrow limits and, unless the evidence shows that the commission has wantonly abused its prerogatives, its decisions will not be disturbed.

The commission decided, in brief, that the rates from Pacific Coast ports to intermountain points, and also from Missouri river common points to the same, were unreasonable and should be reduced. This was not saying that a differential should not exist in favor of Pacific Coast ports, but only that that difference should be reasonable, not extortionate.

This should be satisfactory to all Pacific Coast cities. No permanent value is to be gained by placing artificial barriers betwixt our patrons and our competitors within our common country. That spirit has been under the ban for three generations. In a generous rivalry there is stimulation and virtue, but not in ungenerous. That breeds rancor in the hearts of those who should be our friends. Neither love nor trade was ever won by a cut across the face with a riding whip. If seaport cities would derive advantage from being seaports let them develop a free and independent water transportation. That way lie the markets of the world.

Make Assurance Dead Sure

At the little station of Manteka there were forty registered voters at a Johnson meeting and every man of them signed the Johnson nomination papers. Now the danger was that those men would go to their homes justified, half of them neglecting to vote, as likely as not, in the firm belief that everything is coming Johnson's way anyhow and their votes will not be needed.

Now it is true that, on the surface, or so far beneath the surface as one may see, the nomination of Johnson is safe—provided that every Johnson man votes for Johnson and has his vote recorded for Johnson and not for someone else.

But, if the disreputable element in our political life, that element that is bound together by the cohesive power of graft, spoils of office and low conceptions of citizenship—if that element, on the 16th of August, be divided betwixt Anderson and Curry, 'alf-and-'alf, or anything like it, it will be the first time such a thing has occurred in the political history of this commonwealth since the advent of the Southern Pacific old guard. Good men differ on principle so that nothing can bring them together. Bad men can be brought into agreement on the instant with just one touch of personal or class advantage.

Moral, keep a-fighting till the sun goes down on Primary Day and then watch by the campfires until the votes are counted. That will make assurance dead sure and nothing else will. Please pass this along.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Somehow the doctrine of non-resistance to evil, and that of passive resistance to evil as well, has not taken a strong grip upon the world. This is not to question the soundness of these doctrines. The sanction they have is too high for that, but it is a truth that the hold they have upon the minds and hearts of men is feeble, and likely to remain so beyond our ken. There is, or was, one sect, now fast assimilating with an evil-resisting world, that made non-resistance a cardinal principle of life, but they do say that if any trouble breeder finds himself suffering for a walloping all he has to do is to goad a Quaker beyond the boundary of forbearance and he will get it.

The problem of evil in the world is not easily explicable, but the fact of it is plain to be seen. Every issue of a daily paper bears a hundred testimonies to the fact that evil exists, sometimes unknowingly, sometimes uncaringly, sometimes premeditatedly, and the call to arms to war against it is ever ringing in our ears. The hymnology of the very religion that dedicates itself to passive resistance to evil is surcharged with the spirit of militant resistance to it. From, "Fight on, ye little soldiers," to that splendid, martial-moving, "A safe stronghold our God is still, a trusty shield and weapon," we express our highest emotions in terms of war, and they are calculated to impart to youth and age alike that "fighting edge," which our first citizen admonishes us must not be allowed to become blunted lest the cause of righteousness be lost through a supine tendency to suffer evil rather than to resist it tooth and nail.

This warfare against that which would work us evil is going on in each of us every instant. Introduced into one of us the germ of typhoid, of ague, of diphtheria or smallpox and at once war rages from crown of head to toe of foot. The forces of righteousness in our blood are seizing upon the invaders and casting them out, and sometimes the carnage is so fierce that the patient is destroyed with friend and foe alike. The most hopeful advances of medicine and surgery have been made along lines of finding the most puissant enemies of our enemies and turning them loose within our veins to fight our life battles for us. We are led to hope that the great white plague, which is bad enough, if not the great red plague, which is worse, may be eradicated by enlisting in our service the good germs to fight against these microscopic enemies that will slay us if they can, and generally do before they have done with us.

If our enemies do not attack us bodily, then they attack our sustenance by destroying our fruit trees, our vines, our fields of grain, our herds of cattle, our sheep and our swine. California is having the world searched for insects that are the natural enemies of insect pests, and the national government is spending millions to the same end. Were these two governments to lose their fighting edge in these warlike activities there is no knowing what famines and what pestilences might sweep us and our substance off the earth.

Our navy is great and costly and our army, though small, is no small burden, and yet our greatest dangers from enemies, as a nation, as a state and as individuals, are from within rather than from without. It was an internal conflict that came nearest to costing this nation its life. When we die it is likely to be from the assaults of enemies within our own bodies, and if we fail of making our lives worth while it will be because we have somehow lost the fighting edge needful for resisting our own evil tendencies or the evil tendencies of those common enemies of mankind who are parasites upon their race, yielding it no benefit, but ever feeding upon its substance, its blood, its very soul. Of a truth the fighting edge must not be suffered to grow dull, and the forces of evil must be resisted in all the ways we know. They set snares for the feet of our children and none, not one, is safe from them while life lasts.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Rabies Practically Annihilated in Paris

The success of the Pasteur method of dealing with rabies is best demonstrated where it has been most tested; that is, in Paris. In the French metropolis the dread disease has been practically annihilated, there having been no record of a human being afflicted with it since 1905. In 1809, with a registration of 185,000 dogs, but thirteen cases were reported, while in 1902, with a registration of 140,000 dogs, there were 846 cases. The proportion of cases among dogs was about 85 times as great in 1902 as in 1809. Among 68,109 ownerless dogs taken into the charge of the police in the last four years, but four cases of rabies were found, while 155 cases were found among 78,768 such dogs taken in charge during the preceding six years. Looked at from any point of view, the figures indicate that hydrophobia is all but absolutely exiled from the great French city, and to the Pasteur method of treatment belongs the entire credit.

"Uncle Sam Is Rich Enough" *

The old song asserted that "Uncle Sam is rich enough to give us all a farm." At the present time his capacity for giving farms is becoming somewhat limited, but it is a cheering thought that he still is rich enough to own about one-half of the world's distributive and productive resources. He owns just about half of all railroad and telegraph mileage. He also owns over half of the trolley lines, and much more than half of all telephones. The list of such public or quasi-public utilities in which the ownership is half, or more than half, in Uncle Sam, might be extended almost indefinitely. Take the matter of automobiles, which are privately owned, but are a public blessing or nuisance. At the present time 130,000 are owned in this country, as against about 160,000 owned elsewhere, but our increase this year was 50,000, as against 38,000 in all the rest of the world, and it is estimated that by the end of 1911 we will own more than half. Oh, we are living high, but, Query: When we view some features of the situation, does it strike anybody that we are paying high, and may pay higher, for the privilege?

Interesting Facts Concerning Roses

Here are some facts concerning the queen of all flowers, the rose, to which attention was called during a rose show recently given in Paris by the French Horticultural Society: What is believed to be the oldest rose tree in the world adds its beauty to the wall of a cathedral at Hildesheim, Germany. Its exact age is lost in the muck of antiquity, but eleventh-century records mention expenses incurred in caring for the tree, so that it is at least nine centuries old. The largest rose tree in Europe, it is claimed, also is found in Germany. It grows in a private garden in Freiburg, and its top covers a space of 115 feet, forming an immense bower. It is a wild rose, on which a Chromatella tea rose was grafted in 1881. The finest rose tree, according to Frenchmen, is found in the marine gardens at Toulon. It is a Banksia, which covers a fifteen-foot wall for a distance of eighty feet and has been known to bear 50,000 blossoms at a time. The foregoing figures would seem surprising in almost any country except California. Here they are most likely to set the reader to wondering what are the dimensions of the rose tree in his own or his neighbor's garden.

Rat Catcher vs. Laureate

Some of the salaries paid to King Edward's domestic officials—thus to term them—are rather surprising, and they are particularly so when certain comparisons are made between them. It is not surprising, presumably, that housemaids depleted the royal exchequer annually to the extent of $11,180, nor is it astonishing that church officers received $30,095; but there was a "surveyor of pictures" who surveyed pictures to the extent of $1,000 every year. Also, there was the rat-catcher and purveyor of water at Buckingham palace. It was the duty of this official to catch the rats, if only there had been any to catch, and to turn on or off the water, if anybody ever wanted it turned on or off. For this masterly combination of activities he received $400 annually in cash and free use of a fine house in the best part of the city, the total evidently being not less than a thousand dollars per annum. Now for the comparison: The poet laureate received $350 a year, or perhaps one-third as much as the rat-catcher and water-purveyor. No wonder that Pegasus sometimes is pictured as being super-lean. How could he be anything else on that quantity of feed? It is a starvation wage. Still, there is something to be said on the other side of the question: Alfred Austin was the poet laureate who received the $350.

Prussia Will Allow Cremation

For some time past Prussia, the principal one of the German states, has been the only one in which cremation was forbidden by law, and now it seems likely that it soon will rid itself of this peculiar distinction, the lower house of the legislature having passed a resolution in the hope of inducing the government to bring in a bill permitting the practice. The argument in the lower house was warm, the clerical section opposing the resolution on the good old theological grounds. How, they desired to know, could a body be resurrected on the Judgment Day if it had been burned up? This is the old, old poser which, its proponents claim, cannot be satisfactorily met by asking another question, to-wit: How can the body be resurrected after it has been resolved into "the indefinite dust of the ages?" Over this involved question the battle was waged, and, as has been said, the cremationists finally won out, so that it is probable that Prussia soon will stand no longer alone in this matter.

Concerning the Oberammergau Play

If you are calculating to go to Oberammergau this year in order to see the Passion Play, it will be well to make up your mind in advance to pay for what you get and get what you can. People who have been there say that visitors will pay for enough and will not get too much. The facts of the case appear to be that the villagers of Oberammergau are a simple, primitive, well meaning people who are simply swamped by a rush of visitors for whom they have no sufficient accommodations. At every presentation of the play there are some 4,500 spectators—more than half of them Americans—and there are three or four times as many people in the village as ever have attended a previous presentation of the Passion Play. Prices for board and lodging run from three to six dollars a day, which would not be so bad for the small but neat room supplied if the struggle for existence in the form of food were not so strenuous, but where eating accommodations for fifteen are stretched to cover forty, as is the case over there, somebody is quite likely to be underfed. As a matter of fact, the villagers, with the best of intentions, appear to have bit off more than they can masticate successfully, and, as a consequence, their visitors should expect to lead the strenuous life in providing for the inner man.

Existence of Radium Questioned

Notwithstanding the many things that have been said or written concerning radium and its properties, it is a singular fact that its very existence as a chemical element still is in doubt. If it be an element chemists have not yet succeeded in isolating it, and it is known only in its chloride or bromide compounds, and radio-activity has been found only in these. It is assumed that there is an elementary metal, but no less distinguished an authority than Gustave Le Bon doubts that the assumption is justifiable. He believes that it eventually will be discovered that the so-called radium chloride is nothing more or less than barium chloride, and that the radio-activity, which does not characterize ordinary barium chloride, will be found due to unknown chemical combinations. It is supposed that the question eventually will be decided by chemical analysis, but the fact that at least a tenth of a grain of the substance would be required for the experiment, and that amount would cost $10,000, heretofore has prevented such an analysis. Meanwhile the question is interesting: Is radium merely a name for something that does not exist, and is radio-activity as mistaken a name as was America when given to the discovery of Christopher Columbus?

A German Prize for Aviators

Following the long flights of Curtiss and Hamilton, to say nothing of others which are in prospect, the German Aviation League has offered a prize of $12,500 for an aeroplane flight from Frankfurt to Mannheim and back by way of Mayence and Weisbaden, a distance somewhat less than 250 miles. Only Germans in German-built machines will be permitted to compete.

PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENT

To the Subscribers for the Liberator:

Dear Friends: After mature consideration, I have concluded to suspend the publication of the "Liberator." The publication may be resumed at some future time should the occasion demand it. It has, of course, not been self-supporting, and has never been intended for more than a voice crying out for justice and higher ideals. It was the mouthpiece of the Citizens League of Justice during the active campaign, and when the League was unable to finance it further, I continued the publication, largely at my own expense, until it seemed proper to suspend it for the present.

I have turned over the subscription list of the "Liberator" to The California Weekly, in the hope that all of our subscribers will transfer their subscription to the Weekly. This paper has always stood and now stands for all the principles of justice and good government which brought the League and the "Liberator" into existence. It is making a heroic fight in California for good government, and has arrayed against it the same enemies and forces of corruption, vice and wrong that opposed the Citizens League of Justice and the "Liberator." Therefore, I heartily recommend to you The California Weekly, and bespeak for it your cordial support. It will contain notices of matters of interest to the Citizens League of Justice.

The subscription price to The California Weekly is $2.00 per year, but the officers of the Weekly have agreed to fill out the term of subscription of the present subscribers to the "Liberator" without additional charge.

Yours very truly,

G. H. BOKE.

Until we have justice established, equally, speedily, cheaply, we have no government worthy of the name. If successful rascality may buy its way to liberty, or secure immunity from prosecution through political manipulation, government has failed and each citizen will sooner or later become his own judge of his rights, his own jury, if not executive officer. The interests of The California Weekly are manifold, its activities not few, but its purpose is to see justice established. To that end we welcome the co-operation of the Citizens League of Justice and that of its founder and chief advocate, Professor George H. Boke.

THE STAFF.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES
AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

A MODERN PRODIGAL

By Charles F. Lummis

Worse was mine than the Prodigal's wandering

(He who in rioting ran to waste),
I who have been love's birthright squandering
On the dry sands of a life of haste.

He for women and wine and laughter
Flung the yellow adown the wind;
But I—I was only groping after
Further blindness, who now was blind

Sirens' kisses nor blood-red chalices
Wooed me wander, nor gave excuse;
Not e'en with the plea of Pleasure's fallacies
Argues my heart for its wasted use.

Only working—working and blundering
On in the treadmill of every day,
Proud of the slavery—never wondering
If hearts could live "in a business way."

And now too late when the skies are hardening,
I turn for a light that has ceased to shine.
He could go home to his father's pardoning,
I must stay with my husks and swine!

OF MERE BOOKISHNESS

Books have the same effect as wine, they warm and stimulate. Used as an Italian uses wine,—as a temperate pleasure, as an inspiration to see life with more perceiving eyes and a warmer sympathy—they are wholly beneficial. But their stimulant effect is also a danger. All stimulants are, essentially, drugs, and as with drugs, so with books, they are easily made a vicious habit. And again as with drugs or wine, the danger of forming an evil habit of their use is greatest during the formative years of youth. The writer has seen scores of heavy-eyed boys and girls, habitués of the public library, who craved the printed page with no less eagerness than the drunkard craves his wine and with a passion not much higher in its origin or its practice than the sottishness of drink. These youthful adepts at an inspiring spring had already found life too dull, reality too obvious, the pleasures and duties of everyday too commonplace. They must drug their minds habitually with the stimulant of books, with scenes in which color is always bright, action always rapid and emotion ever pulsing high.

This kind of stimulation, or rather the habitual craving for it, is almost wholly evil. Youth cannot be healthful that is fed wholly upon spices. Youth craves naturally excitement and the stirring of the blood, but content to find these things only in books and not to look for them in the world beside them is unwholesome.

Another evil flows from this youthful intemperance upon books, an evil that is merely an abuse, or overuse, of an excellent thing. The mind of youth is broadened and spurred to higher interests by the suggestive pages of books. This is good. But when the mind of youth follows books too much it exhausts too rapidly the resources of interest and instruction. The youth is bored at twenty. Great things seem small, because he has read of so many great things that he is cloyed and his power to experience surprise is deadened. The sense of emotional values is deadened by too many emotional experiences in reading. The fresh responsiveness of youth is weighted down by a too early sophistication.

But the worst evil of this early exclusive absorption in books is that its devotee graduates into a merely bookish man. There are few things more sad. To find life itself uninteresting or, worse, even an irritation, and to find flavor and substance only in what other men have written about life, what a perversion of the natural order this! To rejoice in the printed record of the clash of great events, and yet to see no zest nor interest in present men and movements that future historians will describe with relish! To sorrow with the oppressed and heavy-laden that peopled only the imaginations of dead authors, and to see neither pathos nor tragedy in the life of the newsboy in the next street! What a second-hand sort of life is this, to hear only from another man's voice and to see only with another man's eyes the vast and complicated pageant of existence as it marches by one's door! It is as if a man chose out of preference to be deaf and blind, and voluntarily sat all his days reading from raised print about the things he would not see and hear.

The true use of books is to instruct and to inspire. Whoever uses them so, finds them a precious blessing. To live life fully, joyously, they help by opening up new fields, by clearing the mists of doubt and superstition, by correcting our first impressions by the sober judgment of wiser men, by reminding us of charity and suffering and the need for helpfulness, by calling to our duller eyes the lights and glowing colors that men of keener vision have detected and enjoyed.

Some reading every day, some moments with the wise, the discerning, the just, the lovers of beauty, but more life than the mere records of it. This is the proper spirit to obey in reading.

"SKID PUFFER"

Skid Puffer, the hero of an anonymous volume published by Henry Holt & Co., is a character unique in fiction. There has been none like him heretofore, and there will be none hereafter unless the unknown author concludes again to take up his, or her, pen. It is said that the author is a Californian; it even has been hinted by somebody, anybody, or perhaps nobody, that he resides somewhere along California's great bay. Further than that nothing is known of the author, but, whoever he may be, that he has made a ten-strike of "Skid" is indicated by the fact that, although the first edition of this anonymous story was issued hardly more than three months ago, the third edition is now in preparation—which is "going some" for the work of an absolutely unknown writer.

A fate which perhaps was less unkind than it appears at first glance has made the boy, Skid, a resident of the Kankakee swamp, Indiana, and the people of the Kankakee swamp have their own vernacular and their own serious or humorous views of life. Nearly the first third of the book is devoted to a series of sketches linked together by the uniformity of their characters, and through these sketches we learn to know the swamp, its denizens, their manners and customs, and particularly do we know Squire Puffer and Skid so well that we are inclined to hold them as somewhat uncouth, but quaintly humorous and decidedly refreshing members of our literary family.

After the humorous sketches, in which we learn to know the "local color" of the swamp and its people, comes the story, and it comes with a vigor and dash which are maintained to the end. There is no flagging of interest. The quaint little waif of the Kankakee swamp learns the secret of his parentage, and hears the story of the great wrong done his mother. The swamp is left behind, the scene shifts to Indianapolis, where Skid acquires the manners of city-civilized mankind; Cupid shyly appears and makes his bow, but he is a coy Cupid and at all times refuses to constitute himself the main motif of the story.

No attempt will be made here to follow the interesting plot. Future readers may learn that for themselves, but one cannot refrain from calling particular attention to that considerable part of the book in which Skid follows across the Sonora desert the betrayer of his father and mother in order that justice may be brought home to him. The description of the long, thirsty trail and of the final fight in which Skid at last attained his end, is wonderfully graphic. It requires no potent imagination to journey and thirst with Skid; indeed, a very commonplace imagination must do this much, and the brute vigor of the fight must thrill anyone in whom some remnant of the animal still remains. It is a rare bit of imagery, this.

And at end of it all, the question again arises: What Californian did this? and a fairly intimate acquaintance with western writers will suggest no answer. The question must be answered by the author in his own time and way, if he chooses to reveal himself.

(Henry Holt & Co., New York, $1.20.)

HOW McGRATH WRITES NOVELS

Harold McGrath, whose novel, "A Splendid Hazard," is published by the Bobbs-Merrill company, says that he usually begins a novel as a dramatist begins a play, at the end. His plots he carries in his head for a long time while ripening, and he never outlines the story very strictly in advance. Of his literary theories he says:

"The one definite idea I have in mind in writing stories is to afford an agreeable, pleasant hour or two to my readers. I wish to amuse them, to make them wish that they, too, might have lived as this or that hero, in this or that land, probable or improbable. I prefer sunshine, mirth, buoyancy, and I believe most readers prefer the same. Grown up people never are wholly deprived of their love of fairy tales; and grown-up fairy tales have been the scheme of most of my novels. I write whenever I feel like it, for when I am in the mood I do better work. I never force myself to do so much work each day. There are days when it is impossible to write a hundred words; again, I have written as many as 7000 words a day. Obstacles? There are altogether too many to enumerate. A character that doesn't 'balk' never fails to be uninteresting. I have always tried to place human people in absurd or unique situations and to let them extricate themselves as you or I would if so placed."

SHAW'S TRIBUTE TO RODIN

George Bernard Shaw, the Irish humorist, declined an invitation recently to a banquet in honor of the great French sculptor, Rodin. His letter follows: "For me, a banquet is superfluous. I have already taken measures to assure immortality by attaching myself to Rodin. In every future encyclopedia you will find 'Bernard Shaw—subject of a bust by Rodin, otherwise unknown.'"

"If the bust is broken, destroyed, or lost, so much the better for me. Future generations will speak of 'the lost Bernard Shaw' as people now speak of Phidias's lost Athena."

"To entertain Rodin seems to me to be rather presumptuous. It is as if Adam after the seven days of creation had offered a snuff-box to the Almighty with the remark, 'My congratulations! It's quite nicely done.' Personally, I do not dare, but I trust Rodin will forgive you. He already has much to forgive his country, so he must be accustomed to it by now."

PERSONALIA

Mascagni has just given out information as to the story of his new opera, "Ysobel." It is a variation on the old legend of Lady Godiva. In the new opera the heroine is Ysobel, the daughter of the Earl of Chester, who makes the famous ride through the streets to save her townsfolk. The hero of the opera is a young huntsman, who has worshipped her from a distance, and who braves the edict, remaining on a balcony when Ysobel rides past, and pelting her with flowers to bring himself to her notice. It is about this incident and the love story that follows that the opera is built.

Gabriele d'Annunzio has recently been making arrangements for a play to be performed at the Vaudeville Theatre in Paris, and has been collecting material for a new novel, of which the scene will be laid in the French capital. Amaranta, the heroine, leaves her old aunt in Italy, and comes to Paris to seek fortune. Like his previous play, "La Ville Morte," both the vaudeville drama and the Parisian novel will be written in French.

A. CAMINETTI

A STATE SENATOR WHO WOULD NOT COMPROMISE

By FRANKLIN HICHBORN

At the last session of the legislature the machine bent its energies to eliminate from the direct primary bill all provision for giving the people a practical state-wide vote for United States Senator. Senator Wolfe, machine leader, having got the bill into shape to his liking, with a suave smirk upon his face, addressed the senate, asking that all opposition cease, and the senate go on record unanimously for the machine-amended bill.

No sooner had Wolfe concluded his oily suggestion than an emphatic "Not on your life!" came from the rear of the room.

Senator Caminetti of Amador, whose vocabulary knows no such word as compromise when the rights and privileges of the people are at stake, was in action.

On another occasion when some now-forgotten machine encroachment was under consideration, Warren Porter, president of the senate, ordered Caminetti to his seat.

"I shall not take my seat, sir," thundered back Caminetti. "I am entitled to be heard on this question, and I shall be heard, sir, whether you approve or disapprove."

And Caminetti was heard.

Incidentally, Caminetti was in the right.

When, at the last session of the legislature, the machine defeated the Stetson railroad regulation bill, substituting for it the Wright bill, amendments to the Wright bill were invited from the anti-machine members. Caminetti among other square-deal senators, accepted the invitation in good faith. The senator from Amador had many good amendments to offer, the best of which were voted down. Because a few of the less important were accepted, however, the machine craftily attempted to make Caminetti bear the burden of partial responsibility for the measure.

This is practically a "Caminetti bill," adroitly suggested a machine member.

Caminetti was hair-trigger prompt in his denial.

"This is not a Caminetti bill," he thundered. "You would not permit a Caminetti railroad regulation bill to pass."

When the machine amendments to the direct primary bill were under consideration, Senator Leavitt taunted the anti-machine element with having deserted Senator Wright. As a matter of fact, Wright, who had at first stood with the anti-machine element on this issue, was then voting with the Leavitt-Wolfe faction.

Quick with reply came Senator Caminetti. "We have not deserted Senator Wright," he cried. "Senator Wright has deserted us."

The aptness of the response brought down the senate.

Meeting all issues squarely, Caminetti expects the same of his associates. A characteristic incident illustrates this.

An important roll call was on—if the writer remembers correctly, it was on Burnett's motion to continue the investigation into the causes of the increase of freight and express rates. Senator Price was present in the senate chamber, but did not answer to the call of his name. The advocates of the resolution insisted that all vote, and demanded a call of the senate. The doors were ordered closed, at which order Price made a run for the senate entrance. Caminetti saw the move, understood it and started to intercept the fleeing senator. But if Caminetti were quick, Price was quicker. Caminetti missed his grab at Price, and so chased that gentleman to the door. The assistant sergeant-at-arms was just swinging the door closed as Price shot through. The determined Caminetti made a last grab at Price's coat-tails, but too late. The massive doors banged closed, with Price, coat-tails and all, on the outside, and the balked Caminetti on the inside. Price did not vote on that roll call.

When the direct primary bill referred to above was up for final action the other anti-machine senators, recognizing that the machine had out-generated—or better, out-tricked—them, yielded to the inevitable, and voted, under protest, for the machine-doctored measure.

"Before voting," said Stetson, for example, in explanation of his vote, "lest anyone in future think that I have been passed something and didn't know it, I wish to explain my vote * * * * I shall vote for this report, not because I want to, but because I have to, if we are at this session to have any direct primary law at all."

Such was the feeling of the anti-machine members. Nevertheless they voted for the bill, all with the single exception of Caminetti. He, for one, would not compromise on a measure of such vital importance to the people.

The people of California are just beginning to recognize what they lost and what the machine won, when the anti-machine members of the legislature threw up their hands after the machine senators had tricked them to defeat on the direct primary issue.

Caminetti was not tricked to defeat, nor has he ever yielded to defeat. The machine has out-voted him, and insulted him, bullied and attempted to bluff him. But it has never compelled him to acknowledge defeat, or accept compromise on a vital question, when the machine was on one side and reputable citizenship on the other.

Caminetti's record in the legislature is that of a fighter who has fought for what he deemed to be right. In sectional disputes, with the valley on the one side and mountain districts on the other, one side or the other may question Caminetti's position. But none can question Caminetti's record where vital state issues have been at stake. He has been found ever fighting for the interests of the people, for a better and freer state, against the craftily working machine element of both parties.

Caminetti's record during his last term in the legislature, covering the sessions of 1907 and of 1909, illustrates this very well.

The writer is indebted to Mr. Charles R. Detrick of Mayfield for a table showing eighteen test votes taken in the senate of 1907. In arranging his table, Mr. Detrick was governed by the same rules and considerations under which the writer selected the test votes as set forth in "The Story of the California Legislature of 1909." The votes selected represent real contests with the machine element on the one side and the anti-machine element on the other; they pertain to questions of state-wide importance; they represent in each instance a vital issue or principle.

Following these considerations, Mr. Detrick has taken as his tests for the session of 1907, the votes giving the people state-wide expression of their choice for United States senator; the vote on the Stetson direct primary bill; the vote on the anti-race track gambling bill; on the demurrage and other railroad regulation bills; on the resolution giving the public unhampered opportunity to purchase prison-made jute bags; on the change of venue bill and other measures affecting the criminal statutes; on the resolution to limit by constitutional provision the sums to be paid attaches of senate and assembly; and the vote on the initiative amendment.

On eighteen issues, including the questions enumerated above, two senators, and two only, were found voting every time against the machine and on the side of progress and reform. They were Senator Bell of Pasadena and Senator Caminetti of Amador. Senator Bell is labeled Republican and Senator Caminetti is labeled Democrat. As a matter of fact, however, there is no partisan division in the state legislature—except when the vote on United States senator is taken—and has not been for years. Bell, the Republican, and Caminetti, the Democrat, are the only members of the state senate of 1907 who present absolutely clean records on the eighteen test questions which Mr. Detrick covers.

The indications are good that men of the type of Caminetti and Bell will control the next legislature. Indeed, at the session of 1909, such men did control the senate by a narrow margin, a control that was for practical purposes lost through the partisan organization of that body. The machine leaders were the same at each session, Wolfe, Leavitt and Wright working as a unit, comprehensively, effectively. But the three had no such overwhelming vote behind them in 1909 as they had at the session of 1907.

Caminetti, as at the previous session, under his standard of no compromise with corruption, stood out for the interests of the public as against the interests of the beneficiaries of the political machine. True to principle, Caminetti, a Democrat, voted for United States Senator Perkins, not because he considered Perkins the type of man who should sit in the United States senate, but because, from Caminetti's viewpoint, no other candidate, so far as the legislature could ascertain, came so near being the popular choice of the people as Perkins, and Caminetti holds that the people, and not the legislature, should select United States senators. The machine was glad of Caminetti's vote for Perkins, but was not at all pleased with the departure of a Democrat voting for a Republican. Were Caminetti's course to be continued in by all members of the legislature, the machine would lose its monopoly of federal senator-making.

As at the session of 1907, Caminetti at the last session worked for and voted for anti-race-track gambling legislation, this time with success. The machine which had, session after session, prevented the passage of such measures, was, in 1909, itself defeated and the bill passed. In a senate where in 1907 only nine votes could be mustered to the support of the bill, in 1909 only seven senators, with Wolfe and Leavitt at their head, voted against it. And it was not a compromise measure, either.

On the direct primary issue, Caminetti insisted that a clause be inserted to give the people a direct vote for United States senator, such as the people of Oregon enjoy. The machine, of course, opposed this, and the anti-machine senators were inclined to compromise on the issue to get a state-wide vote within the several political parties.

Caminetti refused this compromise, walked out of the anti-machine caucus because of it, and himself introduced a separate measure giving the people of California the same privileges in selecting federal senators as are enjoyed by the people of Oregon. When even the compromise provision which the anti-machine members had offered had been rejected by the machine, Caminetti, of the forty members present, refused to admit defeat, and is, as is stated above, recorded as voting against the machine provision. (See Senate Journal, 1909, p. 1976.)

Needless to say, the machine defeated the Caminetti bill providing the Oregon plan for the election of United States senators.

On railroad issues Caminetti stood for progressive legislation such as has been adopted in the middle western states. Not only on the floor of the senate, but in committee, he fought for the passage of a railroad regulation bill that should prove effective. It was largely through his efforts that the effective Stetson bill was given favorable recommendation by the senate judiciary committee. This measure was defeated by a narrow margin on the floor of the senate, the Wright railroad bill being substituted for it.

Caminetti was, too, the author of many bills and resolutions for the correction of abuses practiced by common carriers and the bettering of railroad service within the state. The most important of these were two resolutions which directed the senate committee on federal relations to inquire into the cause of the increase of freight rates and the increase of express rates to Pacific coast points. Caminetti had introduced his resolutions on January 18, but it was not until March 12, twelve days before adjournment, that the committee was in a position to put the first witness on the stand. In the few days of investigation that followed, much testimony showing the hold-up of the people of the state

(Continued on Page 510)

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Plain Bunkum

When a neighbor requests, as a neighbor may do,

Of you an opinion veracious,
For he always has "placed such reliance in you,"

As he mentions, with compliments gracious;
When you find that the thing he has writ or has wrought

Is rank, or is crude, amateurish,
What is it you give him, since words conceal thought,

And, of course, you dislike to be boorish?

Why, bunkum,

Plain bunkum.

The thought that you think

You conceal in its rink,

And the thing that you give him is—
Bunkum.

When your neighbor remarks, "I've a wonderful son,

And I think he will startle the nation,"
Though you know that the youth is a son of a gun

Who scarcely is worthy salvation;
When he says, "Don't you think that my daughter has quite An angelic style, and appealing?"

What then do you give him, since you are polite

And chary of hurting his feeling?

Why, bunkum,

Plain bunkum.

You may know that the lass

In a crowd wouldn't pass,

But the thing that you give him is—Bunkum.

* * *

The Thoughtful Man on Kent

"This damned Kent," the Thoughtful Man began, and I felt it my duty to interrupt him right then and there.

"S-s-sh!" I said, "Aren't you ashamed of yourself?"

"I acknowledge," the Thoughtful Man resumed, "that the word is somewhat effervescent, but when I think of this da—of William Kent as a candidate for congress, I find the language of Sunday School text books too attenuated and anemic to express my real sentiments. He is a traitor to his class, a—"

"What has he done?" I asked.

"At a time when capitalists can hire Oriental labor cheaper than any other, he opposes it; while the Cinch still is necessary to the continued prosperity of Big Business, he stands in with the pestiferous Insurgents; he encourages Union Labor when it alone stands in the way of longer hours, smaller wages and increased profits; he inveighs against the high tariff when without it the worthy stockholders in the Steel and other trusts would be compelled to accept lower dividends. Oh, da—"

"S-s-sh!" said I.

"I wasn't going to finish it; I thought in time. He gave the Muir woods to the people when they hadn't earned them. Oh, he is a traitor to his class all right. Then, too, he is a candidate against Duncan McKinlay, as good, gallant and useful a Congressman as ever kissed anybody's foot and then asked somebody to pass another one. Oh, da—"

I had to lead the overwrought Thoughtful Man out. We could not endure the repetition of such language in the office.

* * *

There Are Several of Us

"He is bitterly opposed to prize-fighting."

"How bitterly?"

"Well, so much so that he lifts up his voice in protest against it, but not so much that he won't get up early on the morning after the fight so as to get the paper and read most of the five pages it will devote to telling which pugilist whipped and how he did it."

"Hypocrite, hey?"

"Not in the least. Merely another instance of the spirit pulling one way and the flesh yanking another."

The Opinions of Rufus

The glory of bein' on the fightin' line has its drawbacks. F'rinstance, it's generly the same line that's bein' fired at.

P'raps the reason sin's in the world is 'cause we'd swell up so there'd be no livin' with us if we hadn't ever done anything we was 'shamed of.

You can't notice the diff'rence 'tween some man-made gentlemen an' all God-made gentlemen without feelin' increased rev'rence fer the Almighty.

You may hold a grudge 'gainst the man that injured you, but I'd bet you somethin' the injury he did you wan't knee-high compared with some you've done to yourself.

Remember, Hester, that good looks are like roses; attractive, but not very sustainin' es the main dish in a square meal.

They's sech a thing es wastin' energy, es the discouraged hen remarked after settin' three weeks on two china eggs an' a door-knob.

Considrin' a good many specimens that the survival of the fittest has given the world, I can't help shudderin' to think what we'd have been like if the unfttest hadn't petered out.

Truth comes high. The cross on Calvary was merely the price that One paid for seein' more truth than most people could comprehend.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again," but sometimes she limps for quite a while afterward.

It's kind o' comfortin' to reflect that none of us has to live with a perfect man or woman, for if we did we'd never understand each other.

I reckon follerin' fashion sometimes is a good thing, seein' es it gives occupashun to some that ain't capable of anything else.

It's ruther discouragin' to us grabbers to reflect that the busy bee lays up honey fer somebody else to eat.

Isabel and Her Soul-Mate

My young friend, Isabel, says that she is convinced that sooner or later each soul will find its mate in this world; that yearful heart will reach out to longful heart until, at last, yearning and longing are lost in the great peace of oneness. She says she has known several such instances, and she is assured that neither seas nor lands ultimately can separate those whom Fate (Isabel mentally says it with a capital letter, I am sure) has intended for each other.

I guess you are right, Isabel, for lots of the poets say that you are, and they ought to know, but have you never noticed that this soul-mate pretty generally is found on a quarter-section of land closely adjoining your papa's? Singular, is it not, that, broad as this world is, your soul-mate is quite certain to be found in your own little neighborhood? Even if you know but four young men, it is highly probable that the soul-mate is one of them. Thus does Providence send soul-mates to those who need them. Isn't it beautiful?

Then, again, have you ever observed the conduct of some of these soul-mates after they are captured? It would be easier to go to war than to live with some of them; in fact, in staying at home you would have both the war and them, too, which would more than double your trouble. And often such people originally were the soul-matest kind of soul-mates, too. Any 'observer of mankind would tell you so.

To be almost brutally frank, my dear girl, the poets' talk about soul-mates is pretty largely moonshine. Your "soul-mate" is quite likely to be the first fairly decent-looking young man who floats in your direction, and I hope for your sake that he will be the right sort, but whether or not he is you will not know till after you have been married quite a while. This is not poetry, Isabel, but observation of the human heap will convince you that it is rather sound common sense.

Our Awfully Awful Fourth

Of course it is solely for the sake of our dear boys and girls that we are so violently opposed to the baneful Fourth of the past. The fact that firecrackers, etc., made the day noisy, and that our aging nerves do not endure noise so well as they once did, has nothing to do with our yearning for a Fourth that is "safe and sane." No, it is out of the kindness of our hearts that we propose to save the little ones, even against their protest.

Let us see just how awfully awful is this "glorious Fourth" which we propose to bury—for the sake of the darling little ones, of course. There are, say, 90,000,000 people in the United States. Of this number more than one-fourth are of that age which is interested in the firecracker and torpedo, but, for the sake of argument, we will set the number at one-fourth, or 22,500,000. Just 215 children were killed on last year's Fourth. This is one in every 104,651 children. San Francisco scarcely has children enough to furnish one of the 215. Ninety-three children were maimed or injured for life, or one in every 241,935. All California would hardly more than supply two in this list. The number of children "also injured," but not seriously, was 5,307. As the writer was one of such "also injured" several times in the course of his youthful career, he does not attach much importance to this list, but only one child in every 4,239 was thus injured, at any rate. It would require a San Jose to furnish its proportionate one of the number.

Now, I do not propose to minimize the gravity of any loss of life. Rather, I would guard against it by doing away with cannon crackers, pistols, etc., thus compelling a Fourth that would be safe and sane, but not noiseless—I would not pander to my nerves to that extent. Especially would I not when I recall the enthusiasm and incipient patriotism which once were part and parcel of the noisy Fourth for a small boy who was I. I want the day to mean to other boys what it then meant to me, the great, splendid—yes, and patriotic—day of the year, and I must know the small boy less well than I do if I did not realize that it cannot fill the bill without the noise.

Cultivate patriotism in a boy by means of a noiseless, "safe and sane" Fourth? Well, you try it, if you know no better.

* * *

What Constitutes a Gentleman?

At various times English courts have decided that the following, among others, are not "gentlemen": A buyer of silks, a solicitor's clerk out of employment, a commission agent, an audit-office clerk.

Such decisions ought to settle it, and yet the haunting and perplexing question will arise: Suppose that the Almighty made gentlemen of these individuals, which authority should be recognized and accepted by a person who desires to maintain his place in the swim? The Almighty or the courts—which? Oh, the Smart Set is not without its wearying mental problems.

* * *

A Case That Proves Nothing

"Their little one was so very sick that they immediately summoned three doctors."

"Did the child recover?"

"Yes."

"Wonderful, isn't it, the progress that medical science has made within the last few years?"

"Yes, but—that is—none of the doctors could come."

* * *

A Sunlight Idyl

The sunlight shines on vale and lea

It shines for you, it shines for me;

It shines where ripples kiss the shores.

But, then, it always shines out-doors—

And I'm mostly in the house.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Governor Gillett Out For Anderson It was not the unexpected that happened when Governor Gillett expressed to a convention of fruit growers the hope that the next governor of California would be one who had been closely identified with their interests. It was a delicate and not inept way of expressing his preference for the candidacy of Alden Anderson. It was anticipated that, sooner or later, the gubernatorial influence would be thrown into the scale in favor of Anderson. There is no good reason why Mr. Herrin's preference should not also be the preference of Governor Gillett. The Governor is under many obligations to Mr. Herrin and he has no stomach for being charged with being an ingrate. He can look his benefactor in the eye any day in the week and say with truth: "I have not been disobedient to your wishes." Just how much good this will do Mr. Anderson cannot now be told. He will be better off with the Governor's aid than with his enmity, for, just at this time, Governor Gillett's stock has much improved in quarters where it was not strong before. To be sure, Hiram Johnson, in his place, would have acted in regard to the big fight weeks earlier, and so saved a vast deal of turmoil and trouble, but Gillett acted and there are many who will not go behind that act to inquire into the reasons for it. Gillett's espousal of the cause of Anderson will help Anderson, will not hurt Curry and will make the cause of Johnson more difficult. These were the reasons which prompted the Governor to take such a lively interest in the fruit growing industry, especially desiring for them a friend at court. It may be remarked parenthetically that Mr. Anderson's interest in the fruit growers of California consists in his having made a comfortable fortune out of them.

Anderson To Be Given His Chance The fact that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company is affording Mr. Anderson all the aid it can render in enabling him to advance his candidacy does not imply that Mr. Herrin is trying to kill off Charles F. Curry. Whichever of them stands the best show in the last days of the contest will be thrown all the strength the Political Bureau has to throw. Mr. Curry's only cause of offending is that he has not placed the patronage of his office, and ex-officio offices, at the disposal of Mr. Herrin's men Parker, Hatton and Burke, which he has not. He has filled them with men who were for Curry first and Herrin afterward, and Mr. Herrin naturally demands that those whose political fortunes he makes should remember who made them.

It is not likely that Mr. Anderson is paying the bill posters for pasting his agreeable physiognomy on all the billboards of the state. If he keeps within the law his allowance will not permit it, the more certainly that the billboards are under contract to do the work all over again on the 16th of July. The face of Anderson is not as striking as that of Curry, and again Anderson never had a cigar made in his own image, as Charley Curry has, hence the greater the Anderson need for pictorial publicity. That Anderson is the preferred candidate of the Southern Pacific Political Bureau is now fully evident. But this does not imply that Curry is rejected. It only means that he is a deferred candidate and may yet become the head of the corner. He has many elements of strength and the strength he has is his own.

Redstreake Is All Right Some weeks since The Watchman said nice things about Harry Polsley, assemblyman from the fifth district, at the same time disclaiming any knowledge to the discredit of George S. Redstreake, his Republican opponent. The Watchman has been taken to task for that, for the reason that Polsley is a Democrat. There are those who think that nothing good should ever be said of a Democrat. The Watchman is not of that way of thinking. He likes to say good things of Democrats whenever he can, the opportunities are so sort of scarce, don'tcherknow.

But we have been taking counsel regarding Mr. Redstreake from those who know him. Two years ago when the "organization" applied the thumbscrews for all they were worth in the third senatorial district, in the interests of former Senator Root of Nevada City, George S. Redstreake was the leader of the Plumas delegation. That delegation made a squaretoed, anti-machine fight and secured the nomination for Senator Birdsall, one of the most independent minded and courageous senators of the last session. That test was a good one.

George S. Redstreake is forty-four years of age, a miner by profession, has always taken a keen interest in public affairs, has stood for Right Things in politics, has been opposed to Southern Pacific domination and is in sympathy with the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement within the Republican party, to which party Mr. Redstreake belongs. In short, the situation in the fifth assembly district is all that it should be. Both political parties have put up good, free men. The only point The Watchman sought to make is that the issue of turn-about among the counties making up the district ought not to take precedence over selecting the best man for the place, as it ought not.

A Fight To Capture And a Fight To Hold Los Angeles has discovered, what was by no means a new thing, that victory is only half won when the fort of the enemy is taken. Those who stand for good government have got to keep right on fighting to hold what they have captured. It was only a few months ago that a splendid victory for good government was achieved, but as soon as it became necessary to fill two vacancies in the council there was the old enemy in full war paint trying to elect two unfit men to the positions, and the whole city has had to be stirred up from center to circumference to prevent the election going wrong. Decency has to fight for its life without so much as an armistice, to say nothing of peace.

Who Shall Go to Congress From the First District? A change ought to be made in the representation in the House of Representatives from the first district of California. Representative Englebright is looked upon as small potatoes out of which to try to make a statesman. He is "organization" through and through and that would be a blight even if he were bigger, but that, together with not being of congressional size, should put him out of the running.

Judge Childs of Del Norte has shied his castor into the ring and is now making a canvass of the district for the Republican nomination, but there are those unkind enough to say that, while his abilities are fair, and in excess of the mental endowment of Englebright, he is neither as tall as Goliath nor as formidable as David, and that it may be well to look farther that the district may fare better. Del Norte is off by itself and reputations made there are not like a city set on a hill, but it has been noised abroad that Judge Childs is inclined to be the political boss of his neck-of-the-woods.

There is another man being talked of, of whose mental endowments there is no question, and that is Judge George W. Hunter of Eureka. He is able, honest and clean, but it has not yet developed that he is in the fight for the nomination. He is considering and being considered.

The first district will do better to change to either of the above men than to send Englebright back.

Who Are the Disrupters? Mr. A. G. Spalding of San Diego has been importuned to enter the race for United States senator, and he has written a letter to the importunate ones on the subject. In that letter he disclaims being any particular kind of Republican, but avers that he is and ever has been a "plain Republican without prefixes or suffixes." He goes farther and declares that he thinks that "It would be a great misfortune to the nation to have the Republican party disrupted for any reason at this crucial period in America's political history." So it would. Let's not disrupt it. But who are the disrupters? Are these they who, like Aldrich and Cannon, Herrin and Gillett, make the party subservient to corporate interests in nation and state? Or, are they Dolliver and Cummins, LaFollette and Clapp, Norris and Murdock in Congress, and Johnson and Rowell in California, who are striving with all their might to make the Republican party so decent that no decent man will have any inclination to leave it, and every decent man will be attracted to it as being officered, guided and filled by his kind of people? What was it, Mr. Spalding, that made this period in American history "crucial," if it was not the herculean efforts of Roosevelt, of insurgency at Washington and of the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement in California, and similar movements elsewhere, to make the Republican party decent and do it within the party? Are the disrupters of the Republican party those who would make that great party subservient to the Morgans, the Rockefellers and the Guggenheims, through the Ballingers, the Hitchcocks and the Wickershams? Are we wrong in the surmise that they are?

The Right Man For Secretary of State Republican voters will be making a crucial error if they take any chances on nominating the wrong man for Secretary of State. It is one of the most important offices in the state system of government. Walter D. Wagner of San Bernardino county is the "organization" candidate. He will have the machine behind him and, if elected, will be a machine man through and through. There is no question about it. He may be competent to perform the duties of the office, but unless the Republicans of the state want "organization" Republicans offered to the people to be voted for in November his claims should be discarded.

Frank Jordan is impossible. He is not of the material that should fill any public office. He is light weight, and not to be trusted with any serious responsibility in public affairs. He is merely a glad hand artist. In that he distances all rivals. When that has been said all has been said that can be said of Frank Jordan.

But there is one candidate before the people who is as competent as Wagner, as good humored as Jordan, and as free of corporation control as Hiram Johnson. That man is F. J. O'Brien of Chico, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League candidate. He is absolutely honest, steady, has his wits about him, is well educated and, if elected, will cause no one to apologize for having worked or voted for him.

Johnson's Itinerary Hiram Johnson's personal canvass of the state is under way again. He will speak today (July 1st) at Pacific Grove at 2 p. m. and at Monterey at 8 p. m.; and tomorrow at Paso Robles at 1:30 p. m., and at San Luis Obispo at 8 p. m. He will rest at home over the Fourth of July and resume his tour on the 5th, speaking that day at Cloverdale at 12:45 p. m., and at Ukiah at 8 p. m. On Wednesday, July 6th, he will speak at Willits (Whited Hall) at 11 a. m., and at Ft. Bragg (Red Men's Hall) at 8 p. m. Thursday, the 7th, he will spend traveling. On Friday, the 8th, he will speak at Ferndale at 8 p. m.; on Saturday, the 9th, at Fortuna at 11 a. m., at Arcata at 3 p. m., and at Eureka at 8 p. m.; on Monday, the 11th, at San Rafael at 8 p. m., and on Tuesday, the 12th, at Napa at 8 p. m.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

Chandler Much against his personal inclination, but because his friends have made his duty plain to him, W. F. Chandler has consented to make the race for the Republican nomination and election to the assembly from the sixtieth district. His disinclination did not arise from an unwillingness to serve the people of his district, as he has served them before, ably and honestly, but through what his friends believe to be an under-estimate of his own strength in his district. The district is difficult, but there is a good fighting chance for a man with a good fighting edge on him to win, and, as the campaign warms up, Mr. Chandler will develop such an edge. Men may oppose him, and there are some scores or even hundreds who will not vote for him, but not a man of them all, in his own heart, can entertain anything but the sincerest respect for and abounding confidence in W. F. Chandler. That is an advantage of position that it will be difficult for any opponent to go up against either before the primaries or after.

Prize Absurdity Of the Campaign One Woertendyke, at Porterville, is alleged to have demanded to know why it is that, now that the prohibitionists are beginning to command attention in California, all this hullabaloo about emancipating the state from corporation control has to be kicked up if it be not to divert attention from the prohibition issue to the advantage of the Royal Arch, plainly intimating that Hiram Johnson is making his campaign in the interests of the liquor business. Perspicacious Mr. Spoopendyke! The issue is between himself and one Nathaniel Ellery as to which of the twain has conceived the most fanciful absurdity of the entire campaign. The Royal Arch has been supporting Charles F. Curry, but the air is thick with rumors that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company is using all of its powers of persuasion to switch the Royal Arch to Anderson, whereat the barkeepers of California, almost to a man for Curry, are manifesting a rebellious spirit toward the Royal Arch.

Presidential Interference Perhaps the real inwardness of the President's butting in on behalf of the candidacy of E. A. Hayes, and butting out again, may not become well known to the public, but there is nothing inherently improbable in the story. It is not inconsistent with the President's tendency to do and undo, stand to and not stand to, as pressure is alternately applied one way or other. May it not be just as well for the President to keep his hands off the congressional situation in California? We Californians know our representatives as well as we know the multiplication table, and we are quite competent to send the right ones back and keep at home those who should be kept at home. It is not a sufficient warrant to return any one of them that the President finds him convenient to run errands for the chief executive, a function that has absorbed much of the attention of Duncan McKinlay if not of E. A. Hayes.

Quite As Right As Right Can Be Mr. Charles F. Curry is not difficult to please. Patriot that he is, ever willing to serve the people in office, he loves his country just as it is, and would not have it other than it is if he could. In the course of an address delivered to his admirers at Sacramento a week ago, Mr. Curry expressed himself thus: "I believe absolutely in the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States and the Ten Commandments, and I have no amendments to offer to any one of them. I have no use for the professional reformers, or the un-American, hypocritical, phylactery wearing pharisees. I like the American people just as they are.

Still I believe this is the best world ever created and I believe that I live in the best age, the best country, the best state and under the best government. I like our country just as it is. I think it is the best on earth. I have no sympathy with those who make invidious comparisons of our government with the governments of other nations. Perhaps in the future, in some purer age, a better system of government may be evolved, but our present government is the best possible for the circumstances of this day."

While the foregoing is the merest clap-trap it is thoroughly indicative of the mind of Curry. For any proposal designed to make things better than they are he displays, if not a bitter resentment, then at best an amused, contemptuous, cynical, satirical sneer. To his mind the purpose of government is the levying and collecting of unlimited taxes for paying the salaries and expenses of innumerable offices in which Mr. Curry may ensconce himself and find jobs for as many of his friends as may prove serviceable to him in time of political need. Mr. Curry's mental capacity no one who knows him will question. His ability is exceptional, but his political standards would almost be discreditable to W. F. Herrin, P. H. McCarthy or Warren Porter.

NOT IN CALIFORNIA

Trouble in the Thirty-ninth The Independent Republicans of "the fighting Thirty-ninth" district are living up to the name and to their reputation for fighting out their differences before the primary election. The difference this year is over the candidates for state senator from the Twenty-second senatorial district, of which the Thirty-ninth is the strategic half and the Fortieth the "organization" minority. The storm-center is the Independent Republican Club of the Thirty-ninth which, at the annual meeting held on the 18th of last March, endorsed for the senate E. J. Callan against E. T. McMurray.

Callan Version Callan's supporters allege that, at a meeting of the executive committee of the club, held on March 7th, to settle the finances of a previous banquet and to issue the call for the annual meeting to elect club officers, McMurray brought up the matter of Callan's candidacy for the senate and urged that it be endorsed. That the executive committee, after discussion, unanimously referred the endorsement to the club as a whole, and that, during the eleven days to the annual meeting, McMurray marshaled the full strength of his supporters in the club, and had Burrell G. White present to that meeting a petition signed with 125 names, asking that McMurray be the candidate. That the petition was ruled out of order, but that at Callan's request the names of both men were voted on by roll-call, and that Callan won by 80 votes to 60. That McMurray was bound in honor, by his initiation of the Callan endorsement and by his permitting his name to go to vote in the club meeting against Callan's, to abide by the club's choice, and that he now shows bad faith in entering the race.

McMurray Version McMurray's supporters put a different construction on all these events. They declare that McMurray repeatedly tried to get Callan to say whether or not he wanted to run for the senate, and failed to get a definite statement. That McMurray had sounded the sentiment of the active workers in the club and was convinced Callan would not enlist enough support of the club to win against a strong "organization" candidate, and had told Callan this and urged him to stay in the assembly race. That the meeting of March 7th was called to thrash out the senate situation, that this meeting was prefaced by the warning that its action bound nobody, and that McMurray said the club should support Callan if he were the best man and insisted on running. That at the annual meeting, thirty or more of those present had never before attended a club meeting and were not legally on the rolls, as their names had not been passed by a majority of the committee on credentials, and that these men voted solidly against McMurray. That McMurray's enemies in the club, determined to wreck him, so defamed his character and so impugned his political integrity that he had either to quit politics under a cloud or meet these enemies and prove them slanderers before the people. That Callan himself had nothing to do with these things, but that McMurray's enemies were using Callan's candidacy as a club to hit McMurray with. That McMurray, not being bound by a fraudulent vote, and having at stake his personal and political honor, determined to run against Callan, not to beat Callan, whom he respects, but to beat his own enemies. That he did not decide to do even this until he was sure that no other candidate could enter the field strong enough to beat either Callan or himself, so that, whichever won, the district would be represented at Sacramento by a man who stands for the principles of the Independent Republican Club.

Watchman's Analysis The Watchman's opinion of the whole matter is that both sides are seeing red and need a cold bath and an evening at Kolb and Dill's humor factory. The rivalry of the McMurray and anti-McMurray factions has long been a very serious thing in the Thirty-ninth and a smile-provoking phenomenon everywhere else. The Watchman is disinclined to become blood-curdled over it. A few things should be borne in mind: McMurray founded the Independent Republican Club and built it up largely by his own personal efforts. He should have the credit for this achievement, which is too considerable to be forgotten. That he is ambitious to receive recognition from that club for that service in some palpable form The Watchman does not doubt. Whether he is dangerously near to going over to the "organization," as his opponents have long charged, The Watchman does not know. He has at the very least his long record and the presumption of innocence in his favor. On the other hand, Callan made a perfect record in the assembly last year, he is clean and able, and The Watchman considers this a bad time to swap horses. Hiram Johnson is going to need all the support in the legislature that he can get. The Watchman does not attach too much weight to the contention that Callan's record would have been made by any man the club might have sent in his place. The point is that Callan has made it, and has earned his promotion. Hence, The Watchman will continue to support Callan as the logical man this time, without prejudice to whatever vindication McMurray may want, and which The Watchman heartily hopes, in the interest of its faith in human nature, he may receive. But Callan should be nominated, and elected.

THE EVOLUTION OF A WOMEN'S COLLEGE

THE GROWTH OF MILLS COLLEGE FROM A SEMINARY TO A GREAT SEAT OF LEARNING

By JOSIAH KEEP

"What shall we do with our daughters?"

This question, difficult enough of solution under the best of circumstances, was doubly puzzling to a group of thoughtful men who gathered in the little city of Benicia in the year 1851. The situation was becoming acute. Gold had been discovered and was being panned out in astonishing quantities; men had been pouring into California from all parts of the world, attracted by the yellow glint of the mines. The state government had been established and legal machinery set in motion; young churches were battling with the wild vices of the present and the depraved inertia of the past; homes were being built, family life was becoming more settled, and the children were growing up so rapidly. The boys could get along in some way,—but the girls, there must be some special provision for their education.

It is hard for us, living nearly sixty years afterward, to realize the condition at that time. We look with pride upon our groups of fine grammar schools, our splendid high schools, our seminaries, colleges and universities, and we can hardly credit the statement that three score years ago there was not one of them in existence.

But that group of men in Benicia realized the fact, and they set to work to create what had never existed in California, a Protestant seminary for the education of girls and young women. Among their number were ministers of different denominations, hard-headed business men, fathers of families and professional men, all intent upon the one purpose.

Organized First as a Seminary

After due consultation they proceeded to act, and the first business was to organize a board of trustees. It consisted of Rev. Sylvester Woodbridge, Dr. W. F. Peabody, Capts. Walsh and Frazer, and Messrs. Crocker, Mudge, Samuel C. Gray and J. Wesley Jones. There was also a visiting board of clergymen, representing different denominations. After organization came work, thought, self-denial, and gifts of money drawn from scantily filled pockets. But the work went on, a suitable house in Benicia was rented, furniture and school equipment were purchased, a teacher, Miss Susan A. Lord of Boston, was secured, and in August, 1852, the Seminary was opened as a boarding and day school, with a fair number of students in both departments. It has been well said by one who was familiar with all the facts, that "among the acts of the Pioneers of California there is none which has had greater or more lasting influence than the sacrifice made by those men who gave time, money and brains to establish and uphold the education of woman."

In two months Miss Lord desired an assistant—who could blame her?—and Miss Georgia A. Allen, who had recently arrived from the east, was engaged as teacher of piano and mathematics, a well balanced combination of subjects. In February, 1853, Miss Fannie A. Allen was added to the corps of instructors, filling the position until near the end of the second year. And so the school grew and prospered, but at the end of the first year Miss Lord resigned to marry. The trustees sought a new principal, and secured Miss Hudson, an experienced teacher from New York. The school increased in numbers, the work grew difficult, and at the end of the second year Miss Hudson also resigned and also married. Another witness says of this trying period: "To the board of trustees great credit is due for their noble, self-sacrificing course during a time of extreme discouragement."

But the men of the early fifties would not quail, though Cupid and all his emissaries seemed to be bent upon the destruction of their pet project. For a third time a principal was sought, and Miss Mary Atkins, a graduate of Oberlin college, was induced to give up a fine position in Cincinnati and come to this far land to take charge of the infant institution. She came, she saw the situation, and she conquered gloriously. She was an extraordinary woman, practical, noble, inspiring. Hundreds of middle-aged women on the Pacific Coast are ready to bear witness to the unobscured character and influence of Miss Atkins.

Purchased by Miss Atkins

Not long after her coming the trustees of the "Young Ladies' Seminary" were relieved of their responsibilities, for Miss Atkins promptly purchased the school and its property. Students flowed in, the premises were enlarged, and new members were added to the teaching force. At length nature demanded rest, and she took a year for travel. During her absence the school declined, but on her return it became more prosperous than ever. In 1865 she sold the institution to Rev. and Mrs. Cyrus T. Mills. Then she retired, and in due time married, like her two predecessors.

Dr. and Mrs. Mills were graduates respectively of Williams College and Mount Holyoke Seminary, which is to say that the one had been educated by Mark Hopkins and the other by Mary Lyon, two of the most inspiring teachers that America ever produced. Years of educational work in foreign lands had also added to the practical equipment of the new proprietors of the Benicia Seminary, and under their guidance it entered upon a new era of growth. Many are the stories still told of the old "Benicia Days,"—how young McKenna, now a member of the supreme court of the United States, came calling, and temporarily "lost" his hat and gloves; of jolly old times in the narrow rooms and still narrower halls; of the growing and crowding and expanding process, till something had to be done to relieve the congestion. And soon the question arose, "Shall we remain in Benicia or seek more room in a region of greater promise?"

Removal to Alameda County

Alameda county held out important inducements for removal; extensive grounds could be obtained on reasonable terms, financial assistance was offered, and proximity to a growing center of population was assured. The decision to remove was made, a tract of ground in Brooklyn township was purchased, a large building was erected, and on August 1, 1871, the institution was removed from Benicia and was now called Mills Seminary. Concerning the main building the Oakland Daily News of June 1, 1871, says, "As one drives up the winding avenue leading to the premises, the immense building suddenly looms up in its full proportions, and the visitor is astonished at such a display of architectural grandeur in so quiet and remote a locality. It surpasses in beauty and extent any building for educational purposes in California."

And so Mills Seminary was securely grounded and housed in a permanent location. In 1877 it was incorporated under the laws of the state, and deeded to a board of trustees, who temporarily leased it back to the founders, to carry on, improve and develop. More land was purchased from time to time and improvements of various kinds were made as rapidly as the available means would allow.

Dr. Mills and his wife were great lovers of nature, and immediately after the school was established on its new site they began to set out trees and make gardens. As a result of this work there are now on the premises about fifty acres of beautiful woodlands, one-third of the whole area, while in springtime there are roses by the million. Some of the trees early set along Leona Creek are now from four to six feet in diameter, while there are rows of cypress and pine which a hundred eastern summers would not have developed.

Evolution from Seminary to College

Dr. Mills, never strong, died in 1884, leaving many cherished plans unrealized. Chief of these was the change of the institution to a woman's college, with full power to grant degrees. After his death steps were taken to carry out his wishes, and October 7, 1885, a charter was granted to Mills College, giving it the desired authority. The school was then known as Mills College and Seminary. The first college class was graduated in 1889, but the seminary department continued for many years to greatly exceed the college in the number of its students. This was largely caused by the counter attractions of Stanford University, which had suddenly sprung into being, and the simultaneous expansion of the State University.

But as the years went by it became evident that a choice must be made, and Mills must either become a college, pure and simple, or revert to its early status, doing good work, indeed, but work akin to that of the high schools. The latter was the easier proposition, for secondary education is cheaper to give and less exacting than true college work. Moreover a good seminary will always be needed, and may do very useful work for the community. Not a few friends of the school deeply felt the force of these arguments, and doubted the wisdom of an advance. But the surviving founder of the school, who for more than a score of years after her husband's death had been its president, led the way, and united with its trustees in a contrary decision. "California and the Pacific Coast," said she, "need at least one institution, with courses parallel to those of the universities, yet offering the choicest home life to its students; in short, they need a true woman's college."

Mills College Today

And so a process of pruning was begun. Large numbers of applicants to the lowest class were refused admission, and each year, as its members were promoted, the lowest remaining class was dropped from the course. Today, only one seminary class remains in the institution, and in 1911 the entrance and graduation requirements for all students will be the same as at Stanford or Berkeley. And so the evolution of the college is practically completed.

In 1873 there came from Benicia to the new Mills Seminary a pale, slender girl, whose home was in Oregon. With the other students she helped to bring the household pets from the old school and transfer them to the larger life of the new home. The parrot, the pussy cat, and the poodle,—they all came; and middleaged ladies now debate as to their personal parts in the drama. This young girl found one large hall, a marked-out lawn, and some acres of bare ground, remote from Oakland and comparatively isolated. Today this same young girl, developed into Dr. Luella Clay Carson, is the honored president of Mills College. She sees about her half a score of buildings, all devoted to college life and work, with surroundings rivaling any in this fair state; with Oakland, no longer far away, but reaching far beyond, and with easy communication coming to the very college gates. This is another phase of the evolution of the woman's college. And the changes of the past sixty years are a partial answer, yet to be made more complete, to that anxious question of fond fathers in old Benicia, "What shall we do with our daughters?"

A statement of the present condition of the institution will give the best idea of the degree of its evolution from a pioneer girls' school to a modern woman's college. And first as to its faculty; for, as Emerson has said, "It matters not so much what you study as with whom you study." The surviving founder, Mrs. Mills, resigned her office over a year ago, but is quietly spending the evening of her days at the college, where her presence is an inspiration. President Carson is a woman of rare talents and executive ability. Receiving her early education in the schools of the Pacific Coast, understanding its problems and deeply sympathizing with its spirit, she has added the culture obtained from eastern and foreign universities to many years of experience as a college professor, and is ever enthusiastic for what is noblest and best.

Instructors

In the departments the professors and instructors are among the best obtainable. They are graduates of the finest colleges, universities, and professional schools, and many of them have taken high advanced work. They bring the culture and the traditions of Vassar, Bryn Mawr, Mt. Holyoke, Amherst and Brown; they come from the Universities of California, Wisconsin and Paris, from Stanford and Radcliffe, and so on down the line. There are over thirty of them, one-fourth of the number being men. They are chosen by a board of trustees, composed of the best representative men and women, presided over by Rev. Charles R. Brown of Oakland.

HONOLULU and back first Reduced Rate $110 class from San Francisco

The splendid steamship SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, July 9, July 30th and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sales from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS 309-310 MARINE BUILDING CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 435,000.00

DIRECTORS James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.
Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant
Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,529,978.50
Deposits, Dec. 31, 1909.....38,610,731.93
Total Assets41,261,682.21
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office,
or Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Money Orders, or coin
by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock
P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8
o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First
Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-
President, Emil Rohte; Cashier, A. H. R.
Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann;
Secretary, George Tourny; Assistant Secretary,
A. H. Muller; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt,
Daniel Meyer, Emil Rohte, Ign. Steinhardt, I. N.
Walter, J. W. Van Bergen, E. Tillmann, Jr., E.
T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Street. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.
RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C.
Heyer, Manager.

The description of the courses of study occupies over fifty closely printed pages of the catalogue, and includes a lifetime of work, divided among the ordinary departments of a first-class college. Naturally, the student who wishes to take her bachelor's degree in four years must elect very carefully, and in any case she must leave untouched far more than she can carry. However, sixty-four units of college work, in addition to forty-five units of preparation, are required for the Junior Certificate, ordinarily obtained at the end of the second year, while the Upper Division work must occupy the last two years of college life, and a considerable part of this work must be along some one line.

Courses of Study

For example, a young lady who wishes to become a thoroughly trained teacher in Home Economics will take in her earlier years liberal courses in Chemistry, Biology, Cooking, Sewing, etc., besides language and other required studies; and in her later years she will find time for Philosophy, Theory of Education, Economics and kindred subjects, with general electives in science and literature. Another may specialize in History, a third in German, a fourth in Geology; and every one will find plenty of well taught subjects to occupy her attention from the time she leaves the high school till she receives her degree.

Training for Noble Living

Graduates of Mills are accepted by both of the great universities as graduate students, and receive their high school teacher's certificates with the same amount of additional study as graduates of those institutions. As a matter of fact, Mills College graduates have won an enviable record both for scholarship and for success as teachers.

But to train young women to be good teachers is not the only end or the chief business of a woman's college. "Education," says Dr. Goodspeed, "is the imparting of skill so that the pupil shall know not merely how to get a living but how to live,—and the difference is the whole distance between the animal and the archangel." The college indeed recognizes the fact that many of its graduates must earn their own livelihood, and it prepares them to do so; but it also inspires them with noble, unselfish ideals which will make their lives grand and fruitful whatever may be their station or vocation. It trains them to be intelligent, resourceful, loving daughters, wives, and mothers; in short, to be worthy members of that band of women who are the glory and crown of any nation, and who influence and control society as sunshine controls climate. Mills College stands for thorough scholarship without sham or pretense; for the best training in whatever makes life beautiful and lovely, as literature, art and music; for true refinement without one particle of snobishness; for intelligent patriotism and for pure and undefiled religion, whose essence, as the Master taught it, is love to God and love to man.

Equipment

To sum up, then, the evolution of the college has resulted in a campus of nearly 150 acres of beautiful woodland, hill and lawn, a group of noble buildings, well equipped halls, library and laboratories, a large teaching force of trained instructors bringing the learning and the methods of many of the best colleges of the land, courses of study parallel to those of our great universities, the enthusiastic support of hundreds of alumnae, and an outlook upon life sane, hopeful and uplifting.

Needs Public Recognition

Like every growing college, Mills has pressing needs, especially for endowment sufficient for its maintenance and expansion; but its greatest need at the present time is a general and generous recognition by the people of the Pacific Coast that it is not a fashionable finishing school, nor even a commendable seminary, but that it is just what its name indicates, a real college for the young women of California and the adjacent states, doing true college work and turning out graduates who stand on a par with the products of the best colleges of America.

Rubber Stamps 10 CENTS PER LINE

AT

Tully's

18 and 20 MAIN ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

WRITE for our mail-order catalogue. Let us show you our NEW SAMPLES and NEW IDEAS in Rubber Stamps.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information
from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country.
Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining,
but thousands do.
To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well
you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law
SUNSET TEA COMPANY
911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00
Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00
Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid
on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper	James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper	Mark L. Requa
Thomas Jennings	J. H. Skinner
James K. Lynch	Rudolph Spreckels
Walter S. Martin	John W. Van Bergen
J. K. Moffitt	Rolla V. Watt
S. G. Murphy	Clinton E. Worden
George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults
provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

THE occasion was a little bachelor luncheon at the Players Club, which contains as many doctors and lawyers and writers as actors. The group that gathered for the cigars and liqueurs at the window looking out over Gramercy Park was a group that had often gathered there in the past, and all its members felt at perfect liberty with one another. The star member of the party today was the Doctor, whose intention of sailing for Japan, announced a few days before, was the occasion for this gathering as a farewell and bon voyage to him.

"Well, my boy," said the Judge, slapping the Doctor a resounding whack on the back, "You are off for a land of romance. I will not be surprised to hear of you in almost any adventure. Only, beware of the Geisha. They tell me that even the most confirmed of bachelors go down before their charms."

"Well, I don't know about this romance business," replied the Doctor. "It has never seemed necessary to me to leave little old New York to find romance."

He fingered the fob of his watch as he spoke, a plain leather affair, plaited after a fashion common in the far west in earlier days, from the pendant end of which hung a plain gold band. He had been looking downward, but now he raised his head and looked at the Judge with eyes rather thoughtful than intent.

"For instance," he said, "This watch-fob seems a commonplace enough looking affair."

"Lord, yes," interrupted the Reporter, "and if I were our plutocratic friend here, instead of being a hard-run scribbler for the press, I would present you with a fob that would not be a disgrace to your otherwise very respectable appearance."

"As I was saying," continued the Doctor, ignoring the Reporter's comment, "this fob proves, to my satisfaction, at least, the contention that romance is far from dead, even in New York."

"Boys," said the Judge, "we will have to have the Doctor examined. Hear him talk of romance! Why, man, I believe you would perform a post mortem upon the remains of your departed sweetheart, and find no interest in the task, except as an investigation on behalf of science."

"As I was saying," repeated the Doctor, ignoring the Judge's interruption also, "There is quite a romantic story connected with this fob. Of course, if you don't want to hear it, I will not bore you. By the way, Judge, when did you say you were to run for office again?"

"Give us the story," chorused the whole group at once.

The Doctor looked up with a mild surprise. "I took it for granted you didn't want to hear it, but just as you say."

"Well, it won't be necessary to name any names, if you will take this story on my word that I knew the principals—they are both dead now—and that all the facts, except where I shall say otherwise, I either know of my own knowledge, or from one or the other of the people."

"This is a romance, you understand, and so, of course, there is a man and a woman. The man was a Doctor, like myself, only he was a very much better Doctor and, I believe, one of the rarest medical geniuses the world ever saw. If he had not died as young as he did, he would have been another Pasteur. I never saw a man so absolutely devoted to a science, nor one who followed her so resolutely to the innermost recesses of her secrets. He gave to science the kind of service and devotion that our romantic friends say a lover gives to his sweetheart."

"And yet, he wasn't a wild-eyed, unworldly sort of person. He was very wholesome and very human. He was one of these romantic people himself, in fact. He saw a certain woman—the woman in this story—and he said to himself: 'this is the only woman in the world whose presence or absence would make the difference to me of the presence or absence of a breath of wind.' His devotion to her became idolatrous."

"I was on the inside of their love affair. He made me his confidante, and I am violating none of his confidences in telling this story, because I happen to know that it is physically impossible for you to identify the man or the woman. Nor is it saying anything improper about the lady when I criticise her, because she, also, is beyond your acquaintance. But I never could understand what my friend found to admire in her. To be sure, she was a handsome woman in a way: tall, well proportioned, but she had a shock of yellow hair that always, somehow, reminded me of a tiger's hair, and in spite of a shallow cleverness and quickness of mind, I never could see that she had any depth of character that should make her attractive to a man like him.

"But, of course, these things do not go by any rule. You can no more tell what sort of woman will please a man than you can tell when a civilized gentleman is going to revert to the primeval type. There is something in the instincts of man that makes me almost believe he has a soul, for certainly no process of mentality can account for what he does."

"Anyhow, my friend was wholly wrapped up in this woman. She used to read everything that he had read that she knew he liked, and she could talk to him about it in a sort of way that made him think, in his already infatuated state, that she had a genuine understanding of, and appreciation for, the things he loved. I don't, for a minute, think she had, for I knew that at this very time she was doing the same sort of thing with two or three other men, and I told him so, but couldn't make him believe it. But I do believe the woman was rather extraordinary, and that, if she had been a man instead of a woman, she would have done something to indicate it, but she lacked a man's definite purpose to achieve—she fell between her masculine intelligence and her feminine discursive instincts. And I never saw a woman so mad to be admired. I suppose, on a lower plane of intelligence, she would have been called a coquette, but that is hardly a fair name for her, because she did lift her arts a little above that level. But she wanted excitement, social excitement as well as mental, and as men especially appealed to her, she took out the social part of it in playing with men's hearts by using their intellectual interests as a bait. She really made fools of them twice over: once in the way that any woman can, and then rubbed that in by using the man's equipment of intelligence and judgment as the means to his overthrow."

"But my friend never saw a fault in her. He shared with her every ambition, every hope; he forgot other friends, he almost forgot me. He staked his whole faith in humanity upon her—unconsciously, of course, but just for that all the more fatally."

"And then, one morning he woke up to find out what she really was. I will give her credit for the way she showed him—she was reasonably honest about it, and pretty decent in the way she did it. She wrote him that her interest in him had been wholly intellectual, and she quoted Philip Gilbert Hamerton's saying in his 'Intellectual Life' that 'certain of our friendships, based upon intellect, we must look forward to losing with philosophy when those friends cease to interest.'"

"As I say, she was honest about it, and reasonably decent. That is true in one way, but, of course, coming from a woman to a man, it was absurd in the ordinary human sense. Some sorts of men might honestly have such an idea as the one she wrote my friend, but no woman is fool enough to believe that any man, in his heart, ever let a friendship such as theirs go as far as theirs had gone on a wholly intellectual plane. She knew what my friend did not until he got her letter; that he was desperately in love. So she was, I think, on the whole about the cruellest woman I ever knew; unnecessarily cruel, and all the more cruel because she knew, with some degree of balanced judgment quite apart from the instincts of passion, exactly what she was doing in leading him on to throw him over."

THE DOCTOR'S FOB

BY

LAWRENCE LAWTON

"I am not going to describe how he took it. He was not the sort of man to baby around nor do the mock-heroic. He burned the letter after he had showed it to me on the first impulse of grief, and then he shut his mouth, and never referred to the matter again—but once. But I know how deeply it burned into his soul. His faith in human nature was gone, his interest in everything but science was dead; even something of the vital spark of ambition to excel in science had departed from his life. But what he yet retained of an intellect that demanded exercise, and of an interest in the world that abides with even the most wretched as long as life persists, he devoted to research in his chosen special branch of surgery. He had worked for years in the faith that surgical methods would yet be found efficient to conquer the scourge of cancer. He believed that the ineffectual use of the knife was due to some lack of skill, or to some failure to provide every accessory essential to complete antiseptis. He had become pretty well discouraged in this hope, and only the urgings of his 'lady of the yellow hair' had kept him from utter doubt."

"When her letter came his work was demoralized for months. Time and again he tried to summon the energy and interest to carry out further his surgical researches, but every time he drifted back into indifference. I tried repeatedly to brace him up, to point out to him that, in spite of the fact that his own career was wasted, his own enjoyment of life gone, he still owed to the world at large the use of his skill and the equipment of his extraordinary brain. About a year after he got her letter he came to me one day and said, 'Look here, Archer, I have been thinking about what you have been saying about my trying to be of some use. There is no use of talking about my trying to use my brain any more; I haven't got one—anyway, I haven't got the energy to use it—but you are right in one way. I can still be of some use, and I am going to do it. You know that fellow, Barich, the man up at the Rockefeller Institute—you know he came from the Pasteur in Paris—has got an idea on cancer that I believe is right. He has a new serum that works on the same principle, of course, as the diphtheretic antitoxin. He makes out a pretty good case for it in theory, but the trouble he is up against is that nobody will let him try it on him in practice. Now, I am going to follow your advice and be useful. I am going to let him inoculate me with cancer, if he can do it—I don't believe he can, I don't believe it is communicable, but he is welcome to try—and then, if he gives it to me, let him practice on me with his serum, or any variants of it he may devise.'"

"Of course I was horrified, and tried to dissuade him, but he only pointed out the example of the army surgeons that proved the mosquito theory of yellow fever, and went ahead. Barich gave him the cancer all right, and then, of course, he tried his best to save him with his serum."

"Under ordinary circumstances it would have been a long pull to determine how long it might be before he would die, but he had insisted on being inoculated in several places, and in three of them the injections took effect. He had a year to live at the outside, and there was no telling how much less. I went to see him at the hospital one day. He seemed perfectly calm, though suffering much pain. He sat propped up in bed, looking out over East River. After a bit he turned and said to me, 'Archer, you have been the best friend I have in the world. I'd have said so two years ago; today I'll add that you are the only friend I ever had, and I want you to promise to do two things for me. They concern you, my best friend, and another person whom I once thought would be something more than that even. You know whom I mean."

"I do not think I am naturally vindictive;

the idea of revenge has never appealed to me, not, I think, because I lack spirit, but simply that it offended my sense of what was good taste. Particularly, being a gentleman, it would never have occurred to me to cherish malice against a woman, much less to seek revenge, but I have been thinking about a thing that I want done, and I have been a long time in my own mind, whether it would be revenge—which is purely a personal thing—or whether I would be acting simply as an instrument of poetic justice. Somehow, I feel, since I have voluntarily put myself within reach of the grave, as if I were no longer a personality, and as if the things I do have no relation to the person that once lived as I. If this thing I want you to do strikes me as revenge, tell me so, and I will not ask it, but if it does not, I want you to swear that it shall be done.

"What is it?" I asked.

"The thing I want you to do may sound absurd—worse than that; I suppose most people would say insane,—but it has a certain sanity, a certain pertinence when taken in connection with two facts. You may remember reading an account three years ago of the first successful operation in skin-grafting. If you do, you will recall that the names of the principals were not printed in that account. The reason was, I didn't want them printed. A woman's face had been terribly burned when she was hunting by the flare-back from a shotgun. It was the woman. You know, skin grafting had always been a hobby of mine, and that fact, and what I thought of her, made me suddenly determine to have the first experiment in it tried at my expense. All the surgeons agreed there was no other hope of saving her beauty, and that it would make things no worse to try my scheme, so I gave the skin from my right arm and risked my career as a surgeon to do it. I didn't think much of that then, because I did not believe, if they took the skin the way I told them, it would contract the muscles enough to make a permanent injury. Still, I took my chance, and I think it fair it should be counted in the final settlement between her and me. She knew the risk I ran, and accepted my part of it with as little compunction as you would accept the gift of a cigar.

"What else she did to me and my life you know. As I said, I don't want revenge, but I do want her to be reminded of the fact that there are weightier obligations in the world than the whim of a moment, and that she cannot lightly play with the emotions of men and arouse their expectations without suffering the penalty that cold-bloodedness and calculating cruelty have earned.

"So, when I am dead—I know you will say it is insane, but it isn't—I want my body turned over to the clinic here for the uses of science, but I want you to take the skin. I want it tanned, leather made of it, then I want you to get a copy of 'Sonnets from the Portuguese' and use as much of the leather as is necessary and have it bound, and I want you to send it to her with my compliments from beyond the grave.

"For yourself, I want you to have a fob made from the leather, and I want you to promise to wear it always."

"I did think he was crazy, but I promised anyhow. He died two months later, and then I began to ponder whether I were bound or not by my promise. The day after his death I received a letter in the mail. He must have written it some weeks before, and saved it till the last, enjoining one of the nurses to mail it. It reminded me of the promise, and adjured me to redeem it."

The Doctor looked up from the window and glanced about the group that sat around him. The faces of all were intent. He stopped his narrative.

"Go on," said the Judge. "Go on, man, what did you do?"

The Doctor turned his eyes again out the window.

"Well, I redeemed the promise. As I said in the beginning, this watch-fob suggests to me possibilities of modern romance. Don't you think I have proved my case?"

"But what about the woman?" the Reporter interjected.

The Doctor shook his head.

"I told you in the first place," he replied, "that the woman really was a nobody. I sent her the book with a note saying merely that it was a remembrance which he had charged me to deliver to her upon his death. I received in reply from her a very effusive note of thanks, containing some perfunctory remarks about his beautiful sentiment. I replied to that with a letter in which I explained fully the nature of the remembrance. Her reply was a flippant letter suggesting that 'he had always been such a wag.'

The Doctor ceased speaking, and continued to look out of the window in silence. At length the Judge spoke.

"My boy," he said, "I can hardly believe there was ever a woman so inhuman."

The Doctor merely shrugged his shoulders. "You said she was dead?" the Reporter inquired.

The Doctor nodded. A gleam shot across the Reporter's face, as it did when he scented the crux of a good story.

"Cancer?" he queried sharply.

The Doctor merely nodded again. The Judge broke in:

"But aren't you afraid to wear that fob?"

Again the Doctor shook his head.

"No," he said. "In the first place cancer cannot be transmitted that way. It wasn't the book that gave it to the woman. You will remember I have already admitted one belief most doctors do not have; the belief in the existence of a soul. I might as well admit a more unusual faith. Somehow or other I believe the spirit that went with the gift to her and the spirit that went with the gift to me were two vital things, and that their effects are as opposite as he intended. Hers was for evil and mine for good."

There was no sound from any member of the club for seconds that seemed like minutes. At length the Reporter loosed his bated breath with the exclamation, "Well, I'll be damned!"

"By the way," the Doctor said, "you boys were going with me to the show this afternoon. I have tickets for the 'Follies of 1910.' It's about that time. Let's go."

("Little Talks"—Concluded)

calls together and collects a large rabble of rough and lawless, and dangerous classes, it creates the peace and quiet and good order of the neighborhood, and for that reason is a direct injury to the persons of the neighborhood and the owners of property in the immediate vicinity. A court of equity has jurisdiction to abate or restrain the commission of a nuisance, and courts of equity, consistently upon proper evidence and showing, by persons to be injuriously affected, enjoin the holding of a prize fight—not on the ground that the prize fight is a crime, but on the ground that it is a menacing nuisance to the people and the property in the immediate vicinity of the place where it is to be held. That is, the courts will enjoin the nuisance caused and inseparably connected with the holding of a prize fight, not the prize fight itself, as such.

JAMES M. KERR

3511 Buena Vista Way, Berkeley.

The foregoing very lucid explanation of the law in the case should be read with thoughtful interest. It serves to show how the dead hand clutches at our throats at the same time that it guides our footsteps, often with much wisdom, along slippery paths. Nothing could be clearer than the need for judicial power to forestall and prevent the commission of a crime. However the power of injunction may have originated, it should be available to prevent the commission of a crime, not because its commission would be injurious to adjacent property owners, but because the public stands to be injured. How shall we, then, be guided by the wisdom of the past and yet be free to avoid the follies and fallacies of the dead? Among the thousand needs of our time there is none more pressing than this.

("A. Caminetti"—Continued)

by the transcontinental transportation companies was developed. But the senate refused to have this investigation continued after adjournment. A great opportunity to secure reliable data regarding the increase in rates was thus lost.

Consistent with his record of 1907, Caminetti at the session of 1909 continued to vote for the passage of good measures and the defeat of bad. On the direct primary bill he is recorded for every amendment that gave the electors increased power in the selection of candidates for office, and against every amendment and feature that restricted such power. He voted for the measure to do away with the party circle on election ballots, for effective railroad regulation, for the passage of the "Stanford bill" which prohibits the sale of intoxicants within a mile and a half of a university; and for the initiative amendment. He voted against the notorious change of venue bill and all similar legislation. In a word, where the political, business

"WE HOLD THEE SAFE"

Total Assets
Over Ninety-one
Million Dollars

Exclusively Fire
Funds Thirty-nine
Million Dollars

The World's Greatest Fire Insurance Company

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.
OF AMERICA

TOTAL ASSETS NEARLY NINE MILLION DOLLARS
POLICY HOLDERS' SURPLUS OVER FOUR MILLION DOLLARS
Agents In Every City, Town and Village

ROLLA V. WATT, Manager

ROYAL INSURANCE BUILDING

Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco

rial or moral well being of the state was in issue, Caminetti was found voting for the state's well being.

The only vote which Caminetti cast at the session of 1909 which the better element of the state can criticize, was his vote against the local option bill. But in this issue, Caminetti was but one of several of the best members of the legislature who voted with the machine element. Sanford, Holohan, Birdsall, Rush and Strobridge, who otherwise voted consistently against the machine, voted against the local option bill.

But all of these gentlemen showed by their records that they stand for measures which give the people power to govern themselves. They all voted for state-wide, practical vote for expression of choice of United States senator, and for the constitutional amendment to give the electors of the state the power to initiate laws. The same principle embraces local option, the right of the majority to say whether saloons shall be licensed. Consistent with their record, the senators named would have voted for local option. Because of their record, they are by far more entitled to be trusted to vote for local option in future than even such senators as voted for local option at the last session, but whose record shows them to be opposed to the principle of local option.

For more than a generation, Senator Caminetti has been a thorn in the side of the machine delegation in the legislature, a thorn which in the state's best interests, and in the interests of good citizenship generally, the Tenth Senatorial District should not withdraw. The good government element of California, regardless of party, look to the electors of the Tenth Senatorial District to return the senator, who regardless of immediate advantage or personal prestige has steadfastly refused to compromise with corruption.

SHEAR WIT

A little lad had too much underdone pie for his supper, and was soon roaring lustily. His mother's visitor was visibly disturbed. "If he was my child he would get a good, sound spanking," she said. "He deserves it," the mother said, "but I don't believe in spanking him on a full stomach." "Neither do I," said the visitor, "but I'd turn him over."—Philadelphia Times.

Newwed—I inserted an advertisement for a plain cook last week and there wasn't a single applicant showed up. Oldwed—How did you word it? Newwed—"Wanted—A plain cook." Oldwed—Huh! No wonder your advertisement didn't pull. Try something like this: "Wanted—A refined young lady to do plain cooking," and you'll have a hundred applicants for the job.—Chicago News.

"Mr. Fanning," said the lawyer, "may I ask if you have any scruples against capital punishment for the crime of homicide?" "What?" asked the venieman. "To put the question more simply, do you believe in hanging a man who commits murder?" "Not if he kills an umpire." "We'll take him, your Honor," said the lawyer.—Chicago Tribune.

"Let me see, Alice," said the old man to his eldest daughter, "young Blinks has been calling on you regularly for six or eight months, hasn't he?" "Yes, father," replied the fair Alice. "Well," continued the anxious parent, "if he asks you to marry him when he comes tonight, tell him he wants to see me. Understand?" "Yes, father," she rejoined. "And if he doesn't ask you to marry him," added the old man, "just tell him that I want to see him."—Chicago News.

"I want the office, of course," said the aspiring statesman, "but not unless I am the people's choice." "We can fix that, too," said his campaign manager; "only you know it's a good deal more expensive to be the people's choice than it is to go in as the compromise candidate."—Chicago Tribune.

Gladys Beautiful—We girls of the Lotus Coterie discussed Hamlet last night. Maud Brisk—What was the result? Gladys Beautiful—Oh, after a spirited debate lasting an hour and a half, it was unanimously decided that a chaperon is not a necessary adjunct to a motor car.—Puck

DIVIDEND NOTICE

FRENCH-AMERICAN BANK OF SAVINGS (Savings department), formerly French Savings Bank, 108 Sutter street. For the half year ending June 30, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1, 1910. Dividends not called for are added to and bear the same rate of interest as the principal from July 1, 1910.

A. LEGALLET, President.

ANNUAL MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS

The regular annual meeting of the stockholders of NEPTUNE DREDGING COMPANY will be held at the office of the Company, Number 237 First street, between Howard and Folsom streets, in the City of San Francisco, State of California, on MONDAY, the 18th day of July, 1910, at two o'clock p. m., for the purpose of electing a board of directors to serve for the ensuing year, and for the consideration and transaction of any and all other business that may be brought before the meeting.

By order of the Board of Directors.

J. S. SPILMAN, Secretary.

7-1-21

DIVIDEND NOTICE

THE SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY (Member Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco), 101 Montgomery street, corner Sutter street.—For the half year ending June 30th, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1st, 1910.

Dividends not drawn become part of deposit accounts and earn dividends from July 1st.

Money deposited on or before July 11th will earn interest from July 1st.

WM. A. BOSTON, Cashier.

7-1-21

DIVIDEND NOTICE

SAVINGS UNION BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO, whose name was San Francisco Savings Union (Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco), N. W. corner California and Montgomery Streets.

For the half year ending June 30th, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1st, 1910. A dividend not drawn will be added to the deposit account, become a part thereof and earn dividend from July 1st. Money deposited between June 15th and Monday, July 11th, both days inclusive, commences to earn interest from July 1st.

R. M. WELCH, Cashier.

6-24-21

DIVIDEND NOTICE

THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY (The German Bank), Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, 526 California Street; Mission Branch, 2572 Mission Street, near 22nd; Richmond district branch, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For the half year ending June 30th, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1st, 1910. Dividends not called for are added to the deposit account and earn dividends from July 1st, 1910.

GEORGE JOHNSON, Manager.

6-21-21

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 1.

Action No. 21780.

ADOLPH ZEIS, as Administrator of the Estate) of AUGUSTE ZEIS, deceased, Plaintiff,)

vs.)

ALL persons claiming any interest in, or lien) upon, the real property described herein, or) any part thereof, Defendants.)

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:)

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon,) the real property herein described or any part thereof,) defendants, greeting:)

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of plaintiff filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Green street, distant one hundred and thirteen and nine-twelfths (113 9-12) feet westerly from the westerly line of Mason street, running thence westerly along said line of Green street twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23 9-12) feet, thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68 9-12) feet, thence at right angles easterly twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23 9-12) feet, and thence at right angles southerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68 9-12) feet to the place of beginning. Together with the improvements thereon and the appurtenances thereunto belonging.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 8th day of June, A. D. 1910.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

CAREY HOWARD, Attorney for Plaintiff.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of HELEN S. TRIPP, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix, at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700, Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON, Administratrix of the estate of Helen S. Tripp, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910. W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate.

6-3-21

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF GEORGE CHILDS, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administrator, at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700, Claus Spreckels Building, southeast corner Market and Third streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

RUFUS H. CHILDS,

Administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, June 10, 1910.

W. H. PAYSON, attorney for estate.

6-10-21

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of IRENE A. CONNER, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administratrix at the office of W. H. Payson, Room 1700 Claus Spreckels Building, southwest corner of Market and Third Streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

ETTA L. PAYSON,

Administratrix of the estate of Irene A. Conner, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, June 3, 1910.

W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Estate.

6-3-21

NOTICE OF ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE OF THE REAL ESTATE AT PUBLIC SALE. IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

In the Matter of the Estate of JAMES BOLE, deceased.

No. 5905 New Series.

Notice is hereby given that under and pursuant to an order of sale of real estate duly given and made by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 9th day of June, 1910, in the matter of the estate of James Bole, deceased, the undersigned, David C. Bole, administrator of the estate of said deceased, will sell at public auction to the highest bidders, subject to the confirmation of said court, all the right, title, interest and estate of said James Bole, deceased, at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the estate of said deceased has acquired by operation of law or otherwise, other than or in addition to that of the deceased at the time of his death, in or to

All those certain lots of land situate near the Town of Colma, in San Mateo County, State of California, to-wit: Lots 48, 62, 64, 65, 66 and 67, as the same are delineated and so designated on that certain map marked "Map of the Property of the Villa Homestead Association, situated in San Mateo County Township 3 South, Range 5 West, surveyed September, 1872, George W. Doherty, Surveyor," which said map is on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said County of San Mateo in Book 4 of Miscellaneous Records at page 421.

Also all those certain lots of land situate in the said City and County of San Francisco, described as follows, to-wit:

1. Commencing at a point on the Northern line of Lobos Street, distant thereon 550 feet Easterly from the Eastern line of Plymouth Avenue, running thence Easterly along said Northern line of Lobos Street, 150 feet, thence at right angles Northern 125 feet, thence at right angles Westerly 150 feet, thence at right angles Southerly 125 feet to the point of commencement, the same being three lots, each with 50 feet frontage in Block "Q" as per map of Railroad Homestead Association on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco.

2. Lot 9 in Block 40, and Lot 3 in Block 41, as the said lots and block are delineated and so designated on that certain map known as the Map of Sunny Vale Homestead Association on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco.

That said real property situate in the said County of San Mateo will be sold in one parcel, and that said real property situate in the City and County of San Francisco will be sold either in one parcel or in subdivisions, as shall appear to the said administrator from the bids at the sale to be most advantageous to the estate.

That said sale will be made on Monday, the 11th day of July, 1910, at 11 o'clock a. m. of that day, at the street entrance to the Grant Building on the South-eastern corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco.

That the terms and conditions of sale are cash in Gold Coin of the United States, ten per cent of the purchase money to be paid to the said administrator on day of sale, and the balance thereof on confirmation of the sale by said court and the delivery of a conveyance. Deeds at expense of purchasers.

Dated June 10, 1910.

DAVID C. BOLE,

Administrator of the Estate of James Bole, deceased. EDGAR M. WILSON and POWELL & DOW, Attorneys for Administrator, Mills Building, San Francisco.

6-17-21

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

State Board of Equalization

California is divided into four equalization districts. The first district embraces the city and county of San Francisco, the second district takes in eleven counties running from the bay of San Francisco right through the central portion of the state to the Nevada state line, the third district embraces all the counties north of the second, and the fourth district includes all the counties to the south of the second—much more than half the superficial area of the state. Each of these districts elects a member, and the State Controller, by virtue of his office, becomes the fifth member of the Board of Equalization.

This board has to do with taxation, one of the most troublesome problems of government, and it especially has to do with so equalizing the assessment values in the fifty-eight counties of California as to make the burdens of state government bear equally upon all property owners. Surely we should elect to this board only our wisest, fairest and most thoroughly honest men.

Epitomized, the law says that it shall be the duty of the State Board of Equalization, to make out and provide all blank forms to be used in assessing property and collecting taxes, to hold regular monthly meetings at the state capital and such other meetings elsewhere as may be needed, annually to assess all railroads operated in more than one county and apportion the assessment to the counties through which such railroads run, to equalize assessments on mortgages or deeds of trust on property situate in two or more counties, to visit, in person or by its representatives, all the counties of the state for the purpose of inspecting property and learning its value, to call county officers before the board, or any member of it, and require such officer to produce books and papers needed for disclosing property values, to examine the books of railroad companies for the purpose of verifying the accuracy of their statements to the board and to advise with county assessors as to how property should be assessed to the end that each county shall bear its just portion of state government. Finally, to make a biennial report to the Governor of the state showing the acreage assessed in each county, the assessment per acre, the aggregate value of city and town lots, the kinds of personal property and its value, such other information as necessary to show the entire taxable wealth of the state and what it consists of.

The law presumes that the four elected members of the board shall give all their time to their duty, but they seldom do. There is enough to keep them busy all the year through if they will equip themselves for the task of knowing at first hand the comparative values of all forms of properties in all parts of the state. The State Controller, of course, has great multitudes of duties to perform appurtenant to his own office and can only give a portion of his time to the ex-officio duties of the Board of Equalization. Still, he visits over the state with the rest of the board and keeps in touch with their work as far as possible.

Each county assesses its property and levies its taxes for the support of its own county government. If that were all it had to do there would be less need for a State Board of Equalization. But each county must also levy and collect a tax for the support of the state government, and each assessor is fearful that his county may be called upon to bear more than its just share of the common burden of state government. It is not so much that he wants his county to shirk its share as it is that he fears that other counties will shirk all they can, and so, to be on the safe side, he shirks all he can by assessing as low as possible and yet raise enough money for county purposes without sending the rate so high as to frighten would-be investors by a high tax rate. Here is where the trials of the State Board of Equalization are not unlike those of drivers of big teams of balky horses, or horses inclined to let their traces get as slack as possible. Equalizing is about as painful and as necessary under our present system of taxation as surgery.

Another function even more trying is that of assessing the railroads. Here the trial is mainly moral. Railroads are as human as counties and are likewise so fearful of bearing more than their just share of the common burden of government that they have almost uniformly, at least until within the last few years, sought by all means they know how to use (generally by procuring the election of serviceable members on the state board) to shirk as much of the tax burden as possible. If a true history of this phase of taxation for the twenty years succeeding the adoption of the new constitution could be written it would make solemn and humiliating reading for honest citizens. Since 1904, anyhow, conditions in this respect have been growing better, but there is still room for improvement.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

The Richmond Daily Independent is a new star in the newspaper firmament. I. N. Foss is its editor.

At Blue Ridge, in Tulare county, bears are unusually numerous this year, and are killing many hogs belonging to ranchers.

There is a prospect that an electric line, which will be built from Fresno to Coalinga, will be extended to Monterey.

Happy Camp, a mining village in the western part of Siskiyou county, was nearly destroyed by fire recently.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander
ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL
 ATTORNEYS AT LAW
 Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
 845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
 San Francisco, Cal.

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
 J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
 Invisible Bifocal Lenses
 181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE
 Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.

1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
 INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950 OAKLAND
 Home A 3950 1236 Broadway

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary . . . $50.00
 One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary . . . 65.00
 One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
 One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
 16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

JULY 8 : '10
FIVE CENTS THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 33.

McCarthy Getting Good

WITH WHAT SURPRISE and pain Mayor McCarthy, upon reflection, reached the conclusion that the Jeffries-Johnson "contest" really was a prize fight may be imagined, but not described. Language would be impotent without the aid of sobs and tears, and such womanly weaknesses would be unbecoming in the mayor of a great city. "I have ever been an earnest advocate," the Mayor declares, "of legitimate boxing contests." No doubt of it, also of illegitimate, but when did he witness the last legitimate boxing contest? Was it the one in which young Tommy McCarthy was killed? Governor Gillett affirms that all the sparring matches held in San Francisco for five years have been fights and known to be such. His accusation has not been denied, and yet it was in the light of these that the Mayor of San Francisco sought to have the Jeffries-Johnson fight come off in San Francisco! Is McCarthy getting to be good? His action in preventing the showing of the moving pictures of the fight in San Francisco is heartily to be commended. When the public conscience becomes thoroughly aroused even the low-browed render homage to decency. And they do say that those who hold the picture concessions in San Francisco are not of the McCarthy ilk. How about that?

Theodore's Center Shot

IN ALL HIS HUNTING experiences in Africa Theodore Roosevelt never sent a shot straighter to the heart than when, in the New York Outlook, he wrote, "The question whether, in a self-governing republic, we shall have self-governing parties is larger than any direct primary bill." In a government by parties we cannot have a self-governing government without self-governing parties, for whoever controls the political party in power controls the government. For twenty years, and perhaps longer, the Republican party of California has not been self-governing. It is not now. It is time it were made so. Our new primary law gives us the opportunity we need. We must see to it that only Best Men are sent to county and state conventions. Mr. Herrin's mercenaries are not overlooking this opportunity. The forces of good government must not.

Fight the Fight Pictures

GOOD MAY YET COME out of this miserable grizzly-gorilla fight business. The conscience of this nation, and other nations, seems to be aroused to the baneful results certain to flow from pampering the brutish instincts of men. If there are no ordinances in cities prohibiting such exhibitions it will take no long time to get city councils together and have ordinances passed. Fighting the fight pictures is as important as fighting more such fights.

What Gives Tex a Pain

THE BULLETIN QUOTES Tex Rickard as follows: "These crooked politicians give me a pain. I don't know who is behind McCarthy, but I do know that this country is getting to be run by crooked politicians. Why, you can meet a lawyer on the street and he'll tell you that if you want an injunction you can get it from such a judge. The same in Nevada. They'll tell you that if you want a quick divorce to go to Lawyer So-and-So. He has influence with the Judge, and so on. There is no justice in the courts any more." Alas for Tex! But we can give him a pointer on these "crooked politicians." They are on their good behavior in San Francisco until after the 16th of August. The exigencies of the Anderson campaign require a moral wave to last until the sun goes down on that day and date. Then "let her roll."

No Use to Wax Wroth

IT WILL AVAIL NOTHING for San Francisco to wax wroth at the East or the South because old personalities, in relation to our unconvicted grafters, our unspeakable city government and our railroad-ridden political institutions, are dug up and aired in the interests of our rival of the crescent if not of the crown. We cannot say it is not so. All we can say is that, at heart, the people of San Francisco are moral, albeit a bit pleasure loving and careless of the proprieties of modern urban civilization. San Francisco exposes its weaknesses as New Orleans does its dirt, on the surface, but there is much sound healthfulness in both the character of San Francisco and the sanitation of New Orleans. If the great exposition is held in San Francisco, visitors will be as safe as they would be in the bosom of Abraham. The plundering will not begin until the guests are all gone, and then it will be only the property interests of the city, in what remains after the exposition, that will be plundered. Even that may be forestalled.

For Chief Justice

IT IS THE CONSENSUS of opinion that Governor Charles E. Hughes of New York will be made Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Perhaps so. Let us hope so. He is in his prime. He is clear-headed. He is honest. He is able. What more? "He lacks judicial experience." Quite so, and, therefore, may not have become so grooved and rutted in the judicial matrix of the mind as to have his sense of justice swallowed up in much learning. That is a chance to be jumped at.

Our One Free State

WITH BOASTING the Governor of Nevada declared that his was the one state in the Union where the people were free, and he might have added—to go to hell with nothing to hinder and mighty few to regret. But when Nevada shall have cooled off and come to realize its position as the Gehenna of America, the Tophet, the place defiled with human sacrifices to Moloch, the spirit of boasting will give place to one of contrition for sin and the next legislature will be forced by an aroused public sentiment to enact laws driving prize fighting out of its last retreat in the United States. The requisite manhood is there, but it sleepeth.

Face to Face

IF THERE BE A REPUBLICAN voter in California who does not, before the 16th of August, look into the face of Hiram Johnson that he may, for himself, take the measure of the man, the fault will be the voter's and not Hiram Johnson's. He will afford every voter in the state that opportunity. It is one thing to hear of a man. It is quite another to hear that man, to look into his face, his eyes, to observe his attitudes, manners, carriage, the set of his clothes, the poise of his head. Who among us does not know any man better after that? In such a contact one false note, one touch of make-believe, may betray the innermost secrets of the human soul. Hiram Johnson does not shrink from that test, or any other. He is a man-to-man Man.

Behold the Man!

Huge of chest and arm, supple of body, lank of hip, agile of limb, the hollow of his foot making a hole in the ground when he walks, skin of ebony, head shaped like a stone cutter's mallet—there stands forth THE MAN, the cynosure of half the globe. He has not only proven that a negro may be as good as a white man, but better. Possessing a white wife, and receiving the homage and the money of thousands of white men, this our modern Othello looms large. For months he has divided vast fields of printers' ink with another. Whole forests of spruce have been laid low that the praises of these two might be sung in the ears of our youth; that their naked and muscle-knotted limbs might become familiar to the eyes of children, of men and of women. From henceforth this son of Ham will monopolize the pictorial, the graphic, the spectacular and the sensational all to himself. Men of letters, women who write, the skill of the artist and the illustrator, all these have vied with one another in doing homage to this our modern gladiator. To supplement the efforts of literature and the pencil, in extolling the glories of The Man, the art of instantaneous photography has been invoked and pictures that live and move and re-enact with fidelity every blow struck, feint made, step taken, will be flashed upon ten thousand screens in city and hamlet over half the globe that the youth of this and other nations may perceive The Man in action and so beget in young minds a concept of that which constitutes true greatness. And yet, in the valley forests of the equatorial Congo, there roams at large a consanguined anthropoid analogue of The Man that, in a free arena, asking and giving no odds, would tear The Man limb from limb, disembowel him with a scratch, crush in his ribs, tear out his vitals and swallow them at a gulp. If physical prowess be the measure of manhood then the gorilla of the Congo and the Kamerun ranks as superior to Jack Johnson as Jack Johnson is the superior of the veriest bantam weight pug that "puts up a fin," and the world has been moving backward for not less than a thousand centuries. It was the hope of the senior editor of this paper that the black man mop the floor with his white antagonist at the Gehenna of America on Independence Day, and this, too, without any ill will toward the pudgy Goliath who went forth to meet his David, but that misguided men might see the miserable business to which they have given their interest, their thought, their time and their means, in their proper perspective. Their ideal of The Man is one that human civilization has been doing its best for twenty centuries to get away from and with such a modest measure of success that during successive weeks countless millions gave more heed to this encounter than to the welfare of their respective nations, the Rights of Man or the Glory of God. What progress the cause of The Christ might make if it were able to bring to its aid all the energies, activities, expenditures and enthusiasms of the prize-fighting world, the powers of illustration and moving panorama, we can only conjecture, but it would be sufficient to constitute a pentecostal feast of The Spirit. Such abominations as that which transpired at Reno last Monday serve to show us how far humanity has journeyed since it emerged from the abysmal forest. It is not far. We have but to hark in the stilly watches to hear its saturnalian roar. The gulf between a Jack Johnson and a David Starr Jordan may not be bridged in twenty centuries.

Residence Option

The movement in San Francisco with reference to residence option in liquor selling is not particularly a temperance movement, al-

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Meier, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

though the fewer the saloons and the greater the distance of the drinker from one of them the less the drinking and less the drunkenness. It is a movement to make it easier for the families of San Francisco to rear the children of San Francisco in soberness and decency. It would seem that no one who has emerged from the simian stage of existence, or whose manhood is not weltering in greed, should oppose this long delayed movement toward home and family protection. May the movement succeed!

Porter Charlton

Poor boy! All he did was to murder his wife, stuff her body into a trunk and sink the trunk in Lake Como in Italy, and then come home to the protection of his rich and influential father. He seems likely to have to spend a season in some hospital for hurt minds by reason of the incident. His own father has gone so far as to charge him with insanity, which serves to show that things are not yet quite as they ought to be. In no long time such charges, where wealth and influence abound, may be looked upon as a manifestation of eccentricity, not insanity, for to be charged with insanity is a reflection upon the family; it attaints it.

The Duty of Conservatism

The attention of our readers is directed to the Fourth of July oration delivered at San Francisco by Judge John F. Davis. The daily papers, being surcharged with the more weighty matter of the prize fight, passed this address over with the barest mention, but it is the duty, the province and the pleasure of The California Weekly to glean where the daily papers have carelessly cut over, the gleanings being the better part of the harvest. Judge Davis, in effect, makes reply in his address to the burden of the address delivered in Oregon by Mr. William F. Herrin. He shows clearly that the forward movements of the American people are due to the pressure of a necessity forced upon them by such great interests as Mr. Herrin serves; that the people are not afraid to meet these issues as they arise with the best remedies that suggest themselves at the time, and that conservatism, if it would be of service, must do more than to sound alarms, call halts and admonish the people not to venture upon untried paths. Conservatism, if it would be anything better than a block to the wheels of progress, must come forward with wiser remedies to suggest than radicalism has to offer. The liberty-loving world is not to be beguiled into marking time while organized greed shackles it, or that the people may hear the plaints of those who are afraid of the future. Judge Davis's address deserves a careful reading. It is buoyant as befitting the day, but it is thought-inspiring as befitting our time and attention.

By Way of Setting Things Right

We note a tendency of the press of the state to look upon The California Weekly as the official mouthpiece of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. The League has no mouthpiece and The California Weekly is no more its mouthpiece than is the Los Angeles Express, the Riverside Press, the Fresno Republican, the Sacramento Bee, or a hundred other papers that are standing for Right Things. The League and the progressive Republican press are traveling the same road. And it has also been stated that the maintenance of The California Weekly is proving a heavy burden upon the exchequer of the League. Perhaps so. Any draft upon the treasury of the League is a burden, but, up to this date, all accounts being squared, The California Weekly has drawn upon the treasury of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League to the tune of exactly four dollars, and that was for a map specially prepared to show certain election districts in certain cities. This statement may not stop the tongues of liars from wagging, but it may prove reassuring to those who would contribute to the League if it were understood that League money is not being devoted to sustain a Republican paper that is just as likely as not to support some Democrats for office, more especially such men on the judicial ticket as Judges J. V. Coffey of San Francisco and Peter J. Shields of Sacramento.

Meat Inspection

It is good that San Francisco is trying to co-operate with the other bay cities in securing a concerted meat inspection system that will prevent the selling in one city that which was rejected in another; but that indifferently covers the needs of the people of this commonwealth. It would seem to be a state function to supervise the killing and handling of all animals designed for food, about as the United States government performs that service for interstate and export commerce. If our state had a Department of Agriculture, as it should have, with a bureau having in its charge animal industry, it would be comparatively easy to require the killing of all animals at specified abattoirs provided with trained inspectors. A small fee paid for each animal slaughtered would bear the expense without appreciably enhancing the cost of meats to consumers. As population increases, and civilization advances, we must anticipate more of the regulating hand of government for the protection of the many against the rapacities of the few. The alternative is to suffer the killing of the defenseless with as little compunction as we suffer the killing of beeves and muttons.

Why Do They Hang On So?

The late Chief Justice Fuller could have retired on full pay seven years ago, and so could Justice Harlan. Why didn't they? There can be little doubt that the bench could have been made stronger for it. It is needful that the highest court in the land, perhaps the most puissant department of government, should be conservative; but it is also necessary that the highest court in the land keep pace with human progress and national growth. It can hardly hope to do this if justices hold on, as they commonly do, until they drop in their tracks. Have such men no resources within themselves, no interests outside the law with which they may concern themselves during the evening of life? Few men recognize the failure of their own powers as they grow aged. They are likely to feel that the world is all going to the bow-wows, but are slow to grasp the idea that that feeling is a symptom of that conservatism of age that borders upon fogysm if not upon reaction. We have laws for compulsory retirement from army and navy at definite ages. May it not be a good thing to enact such laws in relation to judicial positions? There are great issues before that court now and the need of the nation is for a great court to meet those issues. Few men should go to that bench at a greater age than fifty or stay there after attaining seventy.

Funds for the League

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League needs money for carrying on the campaign for Johnson and the rest of the ticket. The law limits the amount that the candidates may expend and, being law-abiding men, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League candidates for office will stay within the law's limitations. There are no corporations to finance the work that is being done. Not a single public service corporation can be drawn upon. A few devoted men have gone into their pockets as liberally as their fortunes will permit, and without hope of personal gain. Reliance must now be placed in the good citizen here and there who can spare $25 or $50 to see the campaign carried to its close without abatement of effort. The redemption of the state from corporation domination will mean much to every property owner. Not all of them can be seen individually, but checks made payable to the treasurer, Adolph Uhl, 717 Market street, San Francisco, or to Charles Detrick, secretary, Metropolis Bank building, will be gratefully received and promptly acknowledged. Give the League a boost. It deserves it.

The Pillars of Society

Henrik Ibsen, like Shakespeare, Hugo, Goethe and other masters of the literary art, cuts to the bone and lays it bare undeterred by oozing blood or quivering flesh. No hand but that of a master can do this and not goad Society to destroy the wielder of the knife, and even a master is sometimes crucified by the people of his own age to be adored by ages following him, somewhat the fate of Ibsen and somewhat deserved.

Are then, our "Pillars of Society" the whited sepulchers that Mrs. Fiske and Holbrook Blinn have been making them out to be at the Columbia theatre in San Francisco the past week?

Ask of the slaughtering of train men by the railroads of America for want of the reasonable precaution that an outraged public sentiment has for half a century been seeking to force upon protesting railroad corporations. Ask of the history of the adoption and installing of life-saving mechanisms and regulations and that history will tell the inquirer that not one important appliance for making trainmen safe has been adopted by the railroads except at the command of a justice that refused longer to be trifled with. Ask of the engineers and brakemen whose employers compelled them to serve so many consecutive hours that nature had long since surrendered sensibility to that involuntary force of habit that made the performance of all functions automatic and unconscious.

Ask of the coal operators who fill their mines with stupidity and ignorance, with live wires and half ventilated chambers, resulting in a death roll unparalleled anywhere in the world save in America alone.

Ask of the great factories that leave dangerous machinery unprotected to chew up workmen, workwomen and work-children without throwing so much as a wooden rail around gaping jaws of death until public clamor has forced legislators, courts and juries to so mulct industrial heartlessness that it becomes cheaper to protect life than to destroy it.

Ask of the great mills of Pittsburg where the killing of men causes so much less proprietary concern than the killing of a mule that no records are made of killings of men, while every mule must be accounted for or the responsible employee be mulcted for his price.

Ask of the steamships that go out from the port of San Francisco and, according to testimony adduced at an inquiry, are compelled by their owners to make such time, and hug the coast so closely, that scarcely a season passes without a disaster that costs life and property.

Ask of the great transatlantic steamship companies that so overwork the "Man on the Bridge" that he goes forth along that perilous track with faculties so benumbed that, like the locomotive engineer, he acts as an automaton and not as a man.

Ask of the cotton mills and woolen factories that would, unhindered by law, and wherever so unhindered, coin babyhood into cash and motherhood into dividends. Ask of those department stores that pay their female clerks so scanty a wage that they must, to maintain the style of dress they are required to wear in order to hold their places, be supported in part by others or live in sin. Ask of those merchants that petitioned that the night life of San Francisco be thrown wide open. Ask of those hotel men that protested that the "contest" of the grizzly and gorilla should take place in this city to this city's lasting disgrace in the eyes of the world that their rooms might for a few days be filled and their cafes crowded.

Ask of those corporation-financed and officered political machines commissioned to so organize and energize the off-scouring of saloon and tenderloin as to overthrow free government and make a few score "Pillars of Society" the task-masters of a continent.

Ask of the fenderless cars that craunch the flesh and bones of men, of women and of children under their grinding wheels because it is cheaper to kill than to provide protection against killing. Ask of whom one will, ask where one may, in America, in Britain, on the continent of Europe (for it was in far Norway that Henrik Ibsen asked and answered) and ever the answer is the same, in all ages and among all peoples, "the love of money is the root of all evil."

And ever the lure of the greater good beckons on and on, from over-reaching in one case to under-paying in another, from needless risk of innocent life to manslaughter, from sharp bargaining to graft, from avoidance of civic duty to political corruption, from laudable enterprise to that money-madness that, the moment a business proposition enters the perspective, sends together with a cruel snap jaws that once framed a mouth expressive of gentleness and turns to granite a visage that, at other times and under other conditions, beams with benevolence and shines with the light of love.

Is it, then, true, as the Socialists affirm, that scoundrelism is the price which executive ability must pay as the toll of that large service to society which harnesses the powers of nature, annihilates time and distance and augments the riches of the race? Are our captains of industry our martyrs to our material welfare? Do they offer their souls for crucifixion upon a cross of greed that the idle may have work to do and that the hum of the wheels of industry may not be stilled? Was it after such a manner that the God of the Universe ordered this world?

Evidently Ibsen thought not, for, in this almost alone of all his dramas, he makes everything come out right in his last act, makes Karsten Bernick, the pillar of that community, purge himself of his wrong-doing, cease to do evil and learn to do good. It was not of the quality of the Ibsen mind to so end a drama unless the laws of being pointed a right way out.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Some thousands of persons were able recently to see enacted at the Greek theatre at the State University one of the old Greek dramas, not just as the old time Greeks would have enacted it, but near enough to give us an idea of what the Greek drama was like and, what is more important, what the human interests in those days were, what was commonly believed, the ideals that animated men's acts, the faiths that sustained them. Antigone was written more than four hundred years before the Christian era, and was then Greek tradition gathered up and put into dramatic form by Sophocles.

In those days men believed in many gods, now in one God the Father; in those days the abode of the dead was below, in ours it is above; the Greek peopled the hollow earth with the dead, we the empyrean; they saw in the course of events the unyielding and often malevolent decrees of fate, we the unbroken law of cause and consequence, somewhat within our own keeping and somewhat beyond our power to determine either for good or ill.

But those Greeks were very human, as we are, and we have very much more in common with them than we have that is contradictory to their philosophy of good and evil, of justice and mercy, of reason and sentiment, of loyalty to the living and veneration for the dead. Let us not be over-much boastful of the progress we have made or be too sure that our fathers and our grandfathers, even back so far as seventy generations, were dotards. So far as the development of the mind is concerned the Greeks of four or five centuries before Christ need not shrink from comparison with the best intellects nineteen hundred years after. In art they excelled us, in literature they were our equals, in clarity of reasoning they were not inferior. In material comforts we have surpassed them. Knowledge and justice now are more generally diffused.

Eteocles and Polynices, sons of Oedipus, king of Thebes, were to rule the kingdom on alternate years, but Eteocles refused to give up the sceptre when his year had expired and Polynices fled away and returned with an army to secure justice. The brothers fought and killed each other and Creon, their uncle, became king. The body of Eteocles was buried with appropriate ceremony, but that of Polynices was left exposed to dogs and vultures under an edict from the king that whoso conferred upon it rites of burial should suffer death. Antigone, sister to Polynices, who was "formed by nature not to join in hatred, but in love," poured libations upon the body and sprinkled it with earth that the soul of the dead might go in peace to Hades. For this she was condemned to death. That is the story, or part of it.

Arguing with the king, Antigone affirms that, "The grave at least desires equal laws," a truth that we still cling to in the knowledge, shared with them, that this side of the grave equal laws are not had. The king protests, "But not the bad to obtain an equal share with the good," to which Antigone replies, "Who knows if these things are held holy, below?"

Who, indeed, knows? The Greeks of old asked a thousand searching questions that no one has since been able to answer, and yet we of today have an advantage that those of old did not possess. The gentle Hebrew carpenter, with his wonderful spiritual insight, had not walked with his disciples, as he did not for four hundred years after Antigone was written. Because of him the world has a clearer concept of moral values than was possible before and, what is more important still, we have been able to displace that pitiless fatalism of other times with a boundless hope. It does not yet appear what the next life shall be, but the world is no longer overshadowed with the crushing concept of an atmosphere surcharged with meddlesome, malevolent, whimsical deities.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

What the Reclamation Service Has Done

About five years ago—to be exact, on June 17, 1905—the United States reclamation service formally began its first work in reclaiming water for arid wastes. This was in Nevada. Brief as has been the time since then, the amount it has accomplished and the benefit it has conferred upon the people are all but startling. It has built 4,215 miles of canal, 70 miles of levees and 417 miles of roads. Concrete conception of the value of its work is best given in the fact that it has secured water in sufficiency for 750,000 acres of land, divided into 13,000 farms which theretofore had been worthless desert. Only gradually throughout these five years have these reclaimed lands been developed and used, and yet it is estimated that already they have yielded crops to the value of $14,038,000, while land values have been increased to the extent of fully $105,800,000. This is the briefest sort of a resume of the work that the service has done, but it will suffice to give some conception of the vast benefit it has conferred on the people. If making one tree to grow where none has grown before is a worthy deed, as somebody has suggested, it is difficult to set too high a valuation on changing unfruitful deserts into hundreds of thousands of acres of wealth-yielding grain and fruit.

The Living Chance of the Babies

Sanitary methods and safeguards have nowhere scored a more striking success than in decreasing the mortality among babies. Everywhere the chance of life of the little ones is much better than it was before men knew less of the manner in which they should be treated; that is, everywhere except in the larger cities of Italy and along the Mediterranean. Even poor old Russia is improving in this respect, and, while mortality still runs high among its children, it is constantly improving. Among the great cities of the world Buenos Ayres gives its little ones the best fighting chance for life, although Amsterdam, a smaller city, outclasses it in this respect. Among the large cities of this country, the babe has the best show in Boston, where, in 1909, the average mortality in each thousand babies was 115, a decrease of 35 per thousand since the year before. On the whole, however, it is to the discredit of this country that infant mortality in its cities averages higher than in those of Great Britain, France and Germany. In London, for example, there were but 116 deaths to the thousand in 1907, while the record of Paris in the same year was but 104 to the thousand. Compared with these figures, New York's 144 to the thousand and Philadelphia's 159 do not read pleasantly, and it is only when they are compared with the greater records of previous years that they are discovered to be encouraging, but it is the general decrease in such figures that is most cheering of all.

Wine a Foe of Tuberculosis?

Dr. Jacques Bertillon, the eminent French scientist, has, from his observations, evolved a sort of double theory concerning the relation of alcohol to tuberculosis. The first half of the theory takes form in the proposition that wine is a foe of the dread disease; in the second half he holds that spirituous and malt liquors are a potent factor in increasing consumption. In justification of his belief he cites the following figures: In 28 departments of northern France, in which beer and spirits are generally drunk, deaths from consumption number about 230 in each 100,000 people, while in other departments, where wine is the favorite drink, the proportion is but 140. Again, he calls attention to the fact that at the age of 30 consumption is two or three times as prevalent among men as among women, the former, of course, being much the greater drinkers of alcoholic beverages. All of which might seem to prove the eminent doctor's theory, but it certainly is open to the objection that the relationship between the figures and the thing demonstrated is not necessarily clear. To illustrate: If it should be shown that there is more skittle-playing in the wine-drinking than in the whisky-gulping departments of France, would it necessarily follow that wine tends to encourage skittles, while whisky is the bitter enemy of skittles? Why would not the argument be as sound in one case as in the other?

The Crime-Incubators of Italy

That form of banishment known as coerced domicile which was in usage as long ago as when the Roman empire was in power still is maintained in Italy. Under it criminals are punished by deportation to some one of a number of small islands about Italy. There are eight of these islands, on which more than 5,000 felons are residing at the present time, and the islands have practically no other population. There the prisoners may come and go and do about as they please, but there they must remain, for that is the crux of their punishment. In this almost entirely criminal population, too, there is marriage, or such form of marriage as the participants in it choose to consider more or less binding, and it follows that the children born of criminal fathers and mothers are born to criminality. They live in an atmosphere of crime, and, with rarest exceptions, they become what might have been expected—criminals of a particularly odious type. So it has come to pass that Italy now has about her eight islets, each one a sort of miniature Hades, and the condition is likely to get worse, rather than better, as time passes, unless the methods of the "coerced domicile" are disused, as they probably will be sooner or later, for even now Italian statesmen are considering the feasibility of such a step.

Laziness in Children a Disease

In a recent article in La Nature, a French publication, Dr. Lamounier asks the question, "Is laziness in young people a form of disease?" and answers it in the affirmative. In so doing he confirms a theory largely held by educators in this country, rather than presents a new idea, but some of his observations in support of the theory will interest both educators and many other people as well. For example, the doctor investigated the cases of 27 school children who were considered notoriously lazy, and he found that the parents of 22—more than 80 per cent—of these suffered from obesity, gout, diabetes, arterial sclerosis, or nervous troubles. These cases and others more or less similar led him to the conclusion that laziness in a child is a disease and that it is inherited. To such a heritage often is added unsuitable diet, lack of fresh air, etc., the child attaining a reputation for laziness and dull wits, when he really is diseased and should be treated accordingly. These facts, as has been said, are being recognized more and more in the public schools of America, but Dr. Laumonier's appeal that children be carefully studied and wisely treated cannot be made too forcible either here or elsewhere.

Britain's Battleship Array

During the present week Great Britain has assembled her ships of war for their annual maneuvers, and it was the most powerful array of warships of one nationality ever gathered together. There were 45 battleships, 25 armored cruisers, 15 protected cruisers, 8 scouts, 20 depot ships, 50 modern destroyers, 58 older destroyers, 36 torpedo boats and 50 submarines, and their total value is estimated at $468,750,000. Bear in mind that nearly all of this sum has been expended within a few years, for it is a recognized fact that almost nothing becomes out of date sooner than vessels of war. This is one side of the picture, the militant side. Suppose that for a moment we compare it with another side which is not militant, but has been known to become so, and might become so again. As stated in this department a couple of weeks ago, there are in England and Wales 789,000 people who are paupers to the extent of receiving public aid. If the sum invested in battleships in preparation for wars which nobody desires had been so invested as to realize three per cent it would have returned $14,062,500 annually, and with this sum pauperism might have been obliterated, or, at least, pretty thoroughly crippled. One need not consider the matter long in order to realize that we pay high for our war whistle.

"Race Suicide" Increasing in France

For some time past it has been recognized that the French people are peculiarly identified with that form of injury which Mr. Roosevelt designated as race suicide. It has remained for Dr. Bertillon, however, to demonstrate by the statistical method that race suicide has so increased in France that the French people are likely to become non-existent if the present tendency is not reversed. It appears that in 1909 the number of births in France was 770,000, of deaths 756,500—the deaths almost equaled the births. This is the worst record yet made, but the record constantly has grown worse. Prior to 1886 the birth figures always began with a nine, then they dropped to eight and began with that figure twenty years longer. In 1906 they dropped below the 800,000 mark, and have begun with a seven since then, until now they hardly exceed the death rate. Dr. Bertillon prophesies, "That will continue until the total extinction of the nation."

The Example Posen Has Set

A correspondent of the Public tells of an experiment made by the officials of Posen, German Poland, in the line of beneficially assisting the poor. The city bought a small tract of land at a reasonable price, and then divided it among a number of poor families, giving to each one of them about 200 square yards. The lands were given to the families about the first of April, and they also were given fertilizing material for the soil. Each holder of land furnished his own seed for planting, consisting principally of potatoes, cabbages, carrots, beans, spinach, lettuce and tomatoes. The products largely supplied the families with food, and in some instances they raised and marketed a surplus. The experiment, of course, was watched with much interest, and it was considered so successful that the officials have determined to make the plan a permanent feature of their government, securing land and farming it out in this manner as rapidly as possible.

Union Square Hotel

POST STREET
At Stockton

Best Location in San Francisco; Faces Union Square
and the Victory Monument

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PLANS

Terms Moderate

Cuisine Excellent

Take Sutter St. Cars to Stockton St.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES
AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

EROS

By Juliette Estelle Mathis

Blue-eyed and winsome as bright morn is he,
 Puissant god and radiantly fair,
 With strong allures meshed in his shining hair.
 In spring he calls from every song-filled tree,
 Hums in each note of bird and beast and bee,
 In sea subdued he sighs. The lion from his lair
 Leaps swiftly to his mate through mountain air,
 With breath of chapparral made sweet. The free,
 Unfettered lover lives where'er he be
 For time at least, an envied deity.
 Eternity? That is another thing;
 To-day with Love's mad strain let Cosmos ring!
 The desert bursts abloom where he doth pass,
 Yet men must say him nay. Alas,—alas!

ECONOMIC ANNUAL OF JAPAN

The California Weekly has received a copy of The Tenth Financial and Economic Annual of Japan, "with the compliments of Marquis T. Katsura, Minister of Finance." A part of the volume is a very complete map of Japan, including Korea, Manchuria and adjacent territory. As the statistics cover several recent years and are thoroughly up to date, and as they necessarily are official, they give the investigator a most complete idea of the wonderful industrial and economic development of the oriental Island Kingdom within the last few years. Tables and charts add greatly to the worth of the annual, and, indeed, it will prove a "treasure-house of information" to all who desire to be fully acquainted with the remarkable developments among this re-born people on the other side of the wide Pacific.

O. HENRY'S LIFE

Just a year ago the late O. Henry did something he was not in the habit of doing. He gave to the New York Times a story of his life, and it was the real story and not the invented narrative that went the rounds and was the inspiration of persons unknown even to the writer of many charming and subtly humorous stories. That story was typical of O. Henry, and he told it just like he wrote the short stories that made him famous.

"A lot of yarns," he said in that interview, "have been printed about me and none of them is true. It has been said that I was once a cattle thief. The nearest I ever got to that distinction was going down to a friend's ranch to learn the cattle raising business. Another story is that I have been a miner. I never saw a mine in my life. Then there is the yarn that I was once a tintype artist. So far as this is concerned, I must admit that I once had a tintype taken with my arm draped gracefully over a lady's shoulder.

"Then there is that newspaper in Pittsburg that printed the story that when I first began to write I blew into its office, looking like a tramp, offered manuscripts for sale and borrowed a dollar before blowing out again. That story is an embroidered fit. Why, I was the best dressed man in the office, unless it was the editor, whose shoes were a little more pointed than mine. A year after this story was printed I saw it. I made a special trip over to Pittsburg and sent in my card to the editor.

"Sir," said I when at last I found myself face to face with this libeler of my solvency, 'I have come to lick you.'

"But wasn't it a bully good story?" asked the editor.

"I admitted that it was and then instead of licking him we went out and had luncheon together.

"No, sir, all stories to the contrary notwithstanding, there never was a time that I could not dig down into my pocket and find coin therein. I never rode a mile unless it was in a Pullman."

Then the writer reverted again to the story of his younger days when he was on the ranch in Texas. He said he stayed there two and a half years, and when it stopped raining and the pastures dried up he decided to quit the cattle-raising business, and, packing his grip, he went to Houston and got a job on The Houston Post. He had a column in the paper each day, and got $15 a week at first, and then it was raised to $20, and finally to $25. After being on The Post for a year, he bought from Brann the Iconoclast for $250.

"I bought out the whole plant, name and all," said O. Henry, "and started a ten-page weekly story paper. Being an editor, I of course resigned from The Post. The editor did most of the writing and all of the illustrating. Meanwhile Brann had gone to Waco, and he wrote and asked me if I wouldn't let him have his 'Iconoclast' title back. I didn't think much of it, and let him have it, and accordingly renamed mine 'The Rolling Stone.' It rolled for about a year, and then showed unmistakable signs of getting mossy. Moss and I never were friends, and so I said goodbye to it.

"Then a friend of mine who had a little money—wonderful thing that, isn't it, a friend with a little money—suggested that I join him in a trip to Central America, whither he was going with the intention of going into the fruit business. Well, it takes a long time and costs a lot of money to learn how the little banana grows. We didn't have quite enough of the latter, and so never did learn the whole secret of the banana development.

"The banana plantation faded into nothing; I drifted back to Texas. In Austin I got a job in a drug store. That was a rotten two weeks. They made me draw soda water, and I gave up.

"Let me see; after the soda water I think there came the highball stage. I went to New Orleans and took up literary work in earnest. I sent stories to newspapers, weeklies and magazines all over the country. Rejections? Lordy, I should say I did have rejections, but I never took them to heart. I just stuck new stamps on the stories and sent them out again. And in their journeying to and fro all the stories finally landed in offices where they found a welcome. I can say that I never wrote anything that, sooner or later, hasn't been accepted.

"As for rejections, take 'The Emancipation of Billy,' as good a story as I ever wrote—it was rejected no less than thirteen times. But, like all the rest, it finally landed."

It was while he was in New Orleans that he began to write under the name of O. Henry. He said that he picked out the name Henry because it was the first one he noticed in a society ball write-up. He took the initial "O" because, he said, it was the easiest of all the letters to write.

MARK TWAIN'S LOVE OF BOOKS

William Dean Howells writes in the July Harper's of Mark Twain's love of books. He says:

Mark Twain was always reading some vital book. It might be some out-of-the-way book, but it had the root of the human matter in it; a volume of great trials; one of the supreme autobiographies; a signal passage of history, a narrative of travel, a story of captivity, which gave him life at first hand. As I remember, he did not care much for fiction, and in that sort he had certain distinct loathings; there were certain authors whose names he seemed not so much to pronounce as to spew out of his mouth. Goldsmith was one of these, but his prime abhorrence was my dear and honored prime favorite, Jane Austen. He once said to me, I suppose after he had been reading some upsparring praises of her from me—"I am always praising her: 'You seem to think that woman could write,' and he forbore withering me with his scorn, apparently because we had been friends so long, and he more pitied than hated me for my bad taste. He seemed not to have any preferences among novelists; or at least I never heard him express any. He used to read the modern novels I praised, in or out of print; but I do not think he much liked reading fiction. As for plays, he loathed the theatre, and said he would as lief do a sum as follow a plot on the stage. He could not, or did not, give any reasons for his literary abhorrences, and perhaps he really had none. But he could have said very distinctly, if he had needed, why he liked the books he did. I was away at the time of his great Browning passion, and I know of it chiefly from hearsay; but at the time Tolstoi was doing what could be done to make me over, Clemens wrote, "That man seems to have been to you what Browning was to me." I do not know that he had other favorites among the poets, but he had favorite poems which he liked to read to you, and he read, of course, splendidly. Generally, I fancy his pleasure in poetry was not great, and I do not believe he cared much for the conventionally accepted masterpieces of literature. He liked to find out good things and great things for himself; sometimes he would discover these in a masterpiece new to him alone, and then, if you brought his ignorance home to him, he enjoyed it, and enjoyed it the more the more you rubbed it in. Of all the literary men I have known he was the most unliterary in his make and manner.

ALFRED NOYES AS A DRAMATIST

Alfred Noyes, the young English poet whose "Drake" and the "The Enchanted Island" have aroused great interest both in England and America, has written a verse drama which Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree is to produce at His Majesty's Theatre in London, the latter part of this year. Sir Herbert is very enthusiastic about the new play and its possibilities and intends to present it in America as well as in London. It is possible that Mr. Noyes will visit this country at the time of its presentation here. The manager announces that it is "an imaginative and fantastic play on very modern lines, with a fine fantastic part in it" for himself. It is learned from authoritative sources that the play is something quite new. It has a serious underlying basis as have some of Mr. Noyes' "fantastic" poems, and it aims as much at beauty as at fantasy. There is in it something of the same treatment of nature as in the archetype of all fantastic poetry—"A Midsummer Night's Dream."

PERSONALIA

Mme. Rejane, the creator of the role of Madame Sans-Gene, is about to give up her managerial career and will surrender the Theatre Rejane, always a favorite resort of Americans, into other hands. She will join the forces of the Theatre de la Porte Saint-Martin, where she will take the principal part in an important new piece to be produced next autumn.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's latest effort at dramatization proved the most emphatic sort of success. In "The Speckled Band" Sherlock Holmes is once more the hero of a play, while the villain he has to foil in three acts is a rock python whose general appearance gives the name to the piece.

James Ricalton of Maplewood, N. J., the photographer of the Russo-Japanese war, when 62 years of age walked from Cape Town to Cairo without an army of porters or any letters of introduction, hunted as he went, and on one day shot three rhinos.

MATERIALISTS' LECTURE

On Friday, July 15th, the San Francisco Materialists' Association will hear its weekly lecture. The subjects will be "Aims and Morals of Life," "A Religion of Impulse," by D. Rudolph and H. Gerber. A cello selection will be rendered by Mast Wolfson.

THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE

AN OLD LANDMARK BACK IN ITS OLD HOME

One of the oldest landmarks of San Francisco is now completing its long process of restoration. The Mechanics' Institute is moving back downtown. But instead of the little old three-story brick building that used to hark back to 1866, there now rises a marble-fronted skyscraper, nine stories high, equipped with elevators, fireproof, finished throughout in beautiful oak, one of the handsomest and most substantial buildings in New San Francisco.

Few institutions have been longer or more intimately or more usefully associated with the history of San Francisco than the Mechanics' Institute. Founded in 1855, it has been ever since prominently identified with the industrial and educational progress of the city. It was founded, as its name implies, to be useful primarily to students of the mechanical arts, and it has steadfastly clung to that purpose, although it has incidentally and in many other ways been useful. Among the first ideals set before themselves by its founders was to accumulate a technical library on mechanical subjects, and so well did they follow this ideal that by the time of the fire in 1906 the Institute had perhaps the best subscription library in the United States. As an example of the high rank the library had by virtue of its collection of books, the fact that it had a complete set of the reports of the British patent office back to the time of the reign of King James I may be cited. There were not over five sets of these reports in existence in the United States, and even the British patent office itself had not this complete file.

The first building of the Mechanics' Institute was on the west side of Montgomery street, between Post and Sutter, on the site of the present Lick building and of the old Lick House. This pavilion was erected in 1857. In 1860 it was superseded by another, erected on the southwest corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, adjoining the site of the first pavilion. An old print, made in 1859, shows the one-story building, built in an "L" radiating from a large dome, the corners of the building adorned with minarets.

The fourth building used by the Institute was erected on Union Square in 1868 and was used until 1871. This was also a frame structure, a combination, architecturally, of Moorish arches and Russian temple effects. In 1874 the Institute moved to the east side of Eighth street, between Market and Mission, into a larger and better looking building, which was used until 1881, when it was torn down. The sixth home—the one used until the fire of 1906—was the famous Mechanics' Pavilion on the block bounded by Larkin, Grove, Polk and Hayes streets, where all the conventions, fairs and great public gatherings of San Francisco were held for twenty-four years.

In 1906, before the fire, the Mechanics' Institute took over the entire assets and properties of the Mercantile Library, in consideration of making the members of the latter life members of the Institute and in further consideration of taking care of the depleted treasury and hopeless financial affairs of the Mercantile. By this consolidation the Mechanics' Institute acquired some land in the southern part of the city and a small sum in cash. But it acquired a much more valuable thing as well, viz., the magnificent collection of books owned by the Mercantile Library, which brought the stock of books of the Institute up to about 200,000 volumes. As the secretary once tersely remarked, "In 1906 we had one of the finest libraries in America. On the morning of April 19, 1906, we didn't have it."

But the Institute had courage and friends. On the evening of April 18th, when it was known that the library was gone, the trustees of the Institute met, and instructed the librarian, Mr. F. B. Graves, to gather a new library, and the secretary, Mr. Joseph M. Cumming, to build a new building to put it in. The following August saw the small building at the corner of Grove and Polk completed, and a library of 5,000 volumes on the shelves. Now the Institute is moving into its new $300,000 building and permanent home, and 35,000 books are being put into the cases. Before the fire the Institute had about 4,000 members. Now it has about 2,500, but with its return downtown will undoubtedly soon have its old membership.

In the old days, from 1857 to 1899, the Mechanics' Institute held every year an industrial fair that was an event of coastwide interest and importance. All the mechanical industries of the coast were represented in the exhibits, and thousands of people attended from all parts of California and elsewhere. These fairs were a large factor in stimulating the development of the mechanical arts in the state, and they also stimulated the whole business life of California by getting the people of the state together and getting them acquainted.

The Mechanics' Pavilion was in other ways an indispensable adjunct to the life of San Francisco. Not until the fire destroyed it did the public realize that it was the only place suitable or large enough to hold great public gatherings, or that it had been the means of attracting to the city many conventions and national assemblages. The pavilion was run at a loss, which was barely made good to the Institute by the rentals from stores at the corners of the building.

The Institute has long been a great aid in the educational life of the city. For years it has annually presented to its members a course of lectures on subjects of general interest, especially history. Notable among these courses were those delivered by Professor Henry Morse Stephens, professor of European and modern history in the University of California. These lecture courses have been so popular that, since the destruction of the Mechanics' Pavilion, the Institute has not been able to furnish floor space enough to accommodate the members who wished to attend, and has hence been compelled to rent public halls for their presentation.

The educational value of the Institute is, however, chiefly in the easy and absurdly cheap access it gives students of mechanics to an adequate reference library. The dues, which are only $1 for initiation and $1.50 a quarter, are so low that no one need be debarred from participating in the benefits of the library. That they are not is shown by the personnel of the membership, which includes people of practically every walk in life.

It should not be inferred that the library is devoted solely to mechanical books. The works of general literature, books on history and art and biography, and the general reference library are all of the best. And practically all the periodicals are on the tables, besides files of current and old San Francisco and Eastern newspapers.

In its business management the Mechanics' Institute is almost unique. It has paid its own way as it went, and has never solicited funds for its maintenance. Even the unsolicited contributions have been small, amounting altogether to not more than $20,000 in its entire history of fifty-five years. Ten thousand dollars of this was in one unsolicited donation, made many years ago by James Lick for the purchase of technical books. Many books and private libraries have, of course, come into the possession of the Institute by gift or bequest, though the bulk of the book accessions have always been by direct purchase.

The management of the Institute is vested in a board of trustees, elected by the members, who serve without compensation. The president of the Institute has always been some man prominent in the public or business life of the city, and he is, by the laws of California, ex-officio a member of the Board of Regents of the State University. The incumbent president is Rudolph J. Taussig, and the other officers are: Livingston Jenks, vice-president; James G. Spaulding, recording secretary; and James H. Lyons, corresponding secretary. The remaining trustees are: George Beanston, Tiley L. Ford, Byron Mauzy, Dr. A. W. Scott, Otto von Goldern, J. J. Dolan, E. P. Heald, Robert W. Neal, James Spiers and Luther Wagoner.

One of the most famous adjuncts of the Mechanics' Institute has long been its chess room. Here have daily foregathered for years the best players of San Francisco, whose championship matches have attracted wide attention. Every year the Institute holds a chess and checker tournament at which the winners are awarded gold medals. The Institute has brought chess players of international fame to San Francisco, and players from the Institute have participated, sometimes in person and sometimes by telegraphic communication, in famous games with players from all parts of the country. In the chess room in the new building are specially designed boards, inlaid into heavy tables, that are a unique innovation and a special pleasure to the devotees of the game. An added enjoyment to the members is the permission to smoke in the chess room.

The new building itself is a "Class A" structure, of steel frame, concrete floors, and fireproof construction. The second floor will contain the library in a room of nobly spacious proportions. The chess room is back of the library. The reference books will be on the third floor. The ground floor will be rented to merchants and the upper floors for offices.

To know that the Mechanics' Institute is at home again downtown is to assure old-timers that the physical rehabilitation of the city is near completion. This, one of the oldest and worthiest landmarks, is to be congratulated on its new home.

"DEUS EX MACHINA"

Quite frequently in dramatic criticism the expression, "deus ex machina" is used, and for the benefit of the layman its derivation and meaning is herewith given: In the ancient Greek theatre at the close of the play, the god, by a supernatural appearance, solved the highly complicated plot, says Lee Kugel of the Hudson Theatre, New York.

The word machine or machinery was derived from the scenic peculiarity of that period, and when the gods stepped out and moved among the heroes of the play, this situation gave birth to the expression above-mentioned. This situation finds its modern prototype where the villain is unmasked and is compelled to make restitution of his ill-gotten gains or forced to confess that he has maligned and injured the hero or heroine. Or where the thief is compelled to return the stolen property, this situation gives rise to the expression, "he acts as a deus ex machina."

Speaking again of the machine or the scenic peculiarity found in the ancient theatre, the different authorities are not unanimous as to what the machine consisted of. Some have said that there were cranes for lifting up the god and projecting him out onto the stage. Others said that it was a flying attachment in the nature of a rope, gathered around his waist, and by use of pulleys he was sent rapidly through mid-air across the stage. Another insists that the machine was a chariot or a simple platform resting on cylinders or wheels, which was moved on and off the stage by ropes, which could be pulled back again behind the "proscenion."

The Girls of Eld

The girls of eld, the girls who held
Your heart in Cupid's fetter;
The girls you kissed, and those you missed,
For mama taught them better;
The witty girls, the pretty girls
Whose charms did once undo you,
Would Cupid's flame yet burn the same
If they should come back to you?

The Evident Answer

Well, nixie, nay! If you got gay
You'd wish you hadn't fanned it.
You might feel queer, but, 'twixt us here,
Your wifie wouldn't stand it.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

"Let Him First Cast a Stone"

"So when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them, he that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her."—John 8-7.

A woman there was, and the woman fell
From the heights of love to the depths of hell.
Led by a passion that heeded naught,
At the price of her soul was her yielding bought.

And she walks where only the hopeless go,
In the murk of a night that is black with woe,
And the wage of her sin is the wage she knows,
And "Shame!" is the whisper where'er she goes.

Father of Mercy, shall mercy be shown?
"Let him that is sinless cast a stone."

She passes, this sinner, and women all pure
'Gainst the taint of her touch their garments secure,
With pride in their manner, contempt in their deed—

Though she dwell in a hell, should the virtuous heed?

Nay, is it not written, nor e'er is forgot,
That the man, he may sin, but the woman must not?

With pride in the manner, contempt in the eye—

Who knoweth how sins are recorded on high?
Shall hearts that are crushed for no error atone?

"Let him that is sinless cast a stone."

* * *

The Little Things

It is curious about the little things, Melchisedek. There was a little rift in the lute, and you have heard what happened to the lute. The little girl smiled a little, alluring smile, and you ought to be able to guess what happened to the young man. In the final analysis, brethren, these little things frequently turn out to be the biggest kind of things.

Take a nickel, for instance, for that is the biggest little thing and the littlest big thing of which I know. It is so extremely little that lots of us never learn how very big it is, and that is what ails us. We drop a nickel in any hole on any corner. Pshaw, what's a nickel? Nothing! And then how surprised we are when we learn that our five dollars has gone along the nickel route, and directly a twenty has followed, and—but you know how it is, Melchisedek.

I suppose that the individuals who naturally know the real size of a nickel and its capacity for swelling into dollars are not more than one in twenty of the population. The rest of us have to learn by hard knocks, and, ah me! they are terribly hard sometimes. If I break a dollar I don't have to spend more than six nickels before it is all gone, and many people are the same way. It is queer about nickels: Considering their size, they are so big.

The nickels make the dollars

Is a saying trite, but I

Would humbly add another word:

They make the dollars—fly.

* * *

Let's Be Grateful

Columns and columns of drivel,

Pages and pages of rot,

To prove that this pug is a winner,

To prove that that bruiser is not;

Uppercut, undercut, neither—

Oh, but their style is verbose,

The pug-fanning scribes of the papers,

And, Lord, but we did get a dose!

Never a moment of resting

From taking the prize-fighting pill;

They doubled the dose on the morrow,

That yesterday made us so ill,

Such deification of muscle

With cavemen might well make a hit,

But this is a paean of praising—

The prize fight at last has been "fit."

The Opinions of Rufus

Sometimes, Eliza, men are like fish. The more they see a girl's droppin' a bait fer 'em the more they hurry to git away.

When I meet a man that seems so good I 'most reckon he's perfect, on second thought I gener'ly advise my sister to stay home evenin's.

The foregoin' ain't sayin' that no men are reel good; it's only sayin' that they's no tellin' when they'll break out in spots.

Sometimes it most seems it's easier to attain the bad than the good. I've known lots of cows to give what wan't much better'n skim milk, but I never knew one to give butter.

The Almighty knows where to put the good people an' the bad people, but I should s'pose it must bother him some to know where to put them that ain't got backbone 'nough to be either.

The honeymoon's the blessed time in which young women learn to feed their husbands well 'fore askin' them fer a new bunnet.

Faith in Providence is a mighty good thing, but it takes hustlin' to pay off a mortgage.

If lots o' folks would pay es much 'tention to their conduct es they do to their 'pearance I reckon the straight gate an' narrer way would have to be widened some.

Their's such a thing es doin' good in vain, es the man said when the cow give ten quarts of milk an' then kicked the pail over.

Most philosophy consists in merely sayin' over again what somebody's said before you.

Josh Bings says in callin' some folks putty men he don't mean no reflexshun on putty, which sometimes is reel useful.

* * *

She Helped Him Out

For a long time he had been trying to screw his courage to the sticking point, and now, alone with her, he felt that the time was propitious.

"Henrietta," he murmured.

"Yes, Gawge," was the whispered reply.

"I—we—you must have saw—must have seen how my hurning tart yurns—"

He felt that something was wrong, and, after clearing his throat of a frog which was not there, began again:

"Dear Henrietta, I am sure that you must have seen how my turning yart hurns—my hurning yart turns—that is, I feel that you sust have meen how my tarning hurt yurns—how my yarning turt hurns—or—that is, mow hy hurning yart—how my—"

But gentle woman, when she is willing, is willing, and so she interrupted him to say that she did realize how his yearning heart turned, and, after that, with her kindly assistance, it was much easier.

As for the rest—but everybody knows how the rest of such stories goes.

* * *

Old Saws Refined and Reset

Art is long, but artists frequently are short. Truth crushed to earth will rise again, but frequently the audience will not wait to see whether she does or not.

Laugh, and the world laughs with you, but that which it really prefers is to laugh at you.

Slow but sure wins the race, but the young man who is the proud possessor of a written recommendation to that effect still is looking for an employer.

It takes nine tailors to make a man, and sometimes it takes more than nine to make a man—pay his bill.

The Law and Common Sense are brothers, but, as everybody knows, brothers sometimes are not on speaking terms.

Gray hairs and Wisdom should go together, but, Wisdom being particular about her associates, they frequently do not.

Leaves have their time to fall. So have woman's tears, but the time in the latter case is more uncertain.

One may smile and smile, but when he does it is well to have a headache powder on hand for the next morning.

The Philosopher on Society Journals

"I should feel more hopeful for the future welfare of the race," the Philosopher remarked, "if it were not for the so-called society journals."

"What have society journals to do with the welfare of the race?" I inquired.

"Why, they are published, you know."

"Yes, but—"

"And, as they are published, there must be people who read them, and if there are people who read that kind of slush—alas! what is the use of trying to be optimistic?"

The Philosopher paused for a few moments of apparently painful reflection, then he resumed:

"I will not discredit you by suggesting that you read that kind of journal, but probably you know how they go: First, a few pages of diseased editorial consisting of near-libel and lunar-caustic comment or ladylike satire concerning anything showing a tendency to be uplifting. Then may follow theatrical comment in which the fleshly charms of the alleged actresses are reviewed and green-room scandals are revived. Now turn to the social gossip if your stomach is strong, and read the allusions, hints or open comment concerning anything indecent that anybody indecent, but Smart, has indecently done for some time past. What joy to find your neighbor's name mired in that filth! and it is for that joy, I suppose, that people read these society journals. And their readers are numbered by hundreds which their advertisers, with child-like confidence, suppose to be thousands. Oh, it is enough to crush hope, to bury—"

The Philosopher broke down, and what could anyone say to comfort him?

Too Bad That It Ever Was Thus

The thing you most desire is the thing you are forbidden to have. Is it not so? Commune with yourself, and answer. It ever has been so.

Adam had heard that there were daughters of men living outside of the Garden, and had gone over to the fence on the east side to investigate the rumor—not, as he had explained to Eve, that he was interested in the daughters of men, but he was interested in the rumor. Eve, being thus left alone, soliloquized.

"I'm sick of these common, every-day fruits," she said. "Of course, the peaches are all right enough, and so are the plums, and the pears, and the rest. I am not complaining about their quality, but for a really delicious flavor I am confident that that ap—Oh, dear! I fancy I would better get Adam's supper," for already she had learned what Adam was when he had not been fed.

So Eve prepared the simple supper, and then, as Adam had not yet found the rumor, she seated herself and resumed her soliloquy.

"These cherries," she said, "are good, but somehow I am cloyed on cherries, and figs have become absolutely nauseating, and—My! how good that apple does look! I wish—"

Just then Adam returned, at the same time remarking that he hadn't seen any rumors east of the fence. So one can only infer what it was that Eve wished, but everybody knows what happened just a few days later, and—Ah me! don't you sometimes wish that we had selected somebody different for our first ancestors, and, anyway, that we did not so yearningly yearn for the thing we cannot have?

* * *

Its Best Deed Last

"Of course one praises the recent Congress with some mental reservation."

"Yes, indeed."

"But it did one splendid thing, a thing that everybody approves."

"What was that?"

"It adjourned."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

President and Ex-President Those who anticipated that the President and the former president would fall to wool-pulling at the instant of contact, if there were such, were in error. They fell into each other's arms, indulged in a feast of hilarity and a flow of soul, for they are jolly good fellows, know each other better than the public knows either of them, have faith in each other and will have more conferences than one. They are different, temperamentally and constitutionally, and will get on the better for that. If they were of the same type they would not get on together at all. They would clash at every point. It will take a great deal to make those two men break with each other, but they may do it. There is no human friendship that Theodore Roosevelt will suffer to stand betwixt his cherished policies and their fulfillment. The President stands for them as certainly as he does and the quarrel, if it comes, will not come because of any disagreement on that score, but on the character of those commissioned to carry out these policies. The President and the former president cannot continue political friends with the President choosing as his advisers Cannon and Aldrich, Elkins and Hale. The break will be there if anywhere.

Their First Fight For Party Control The President does not know how to be president except with a political party back of him. Party control is in the hands of the enemy. Therefore the President felt that he had to go to the enemies of his policies for help in carrying them out. It naturally follows that the first fight for reform must be to wrest party control from the enemies of the new policies, and vest that control in the friends to those policies. That fight is on in New York and Theodore Roosevelt is into it up to his elbows. Bourbonism, Republican and Democratic, delivered itself into his hands at the psychological moment in defeating the direct primary law by a combination of Republican reactionaries and Tammanyites. Appeal will now be made to the voters of New York. Into that contest Theodore Roosevelt, Governor Hughes and President Taft will throw themselves with all the strength they possess. The result cannot be doubted. A more far-reaching direct primary law than the one defeated will be added and a lot of "organization" politicians will be thrown on the woodpile to dry. For once New York will have a political leader instead of a boss. Once place the control of the Republican party of New York in possession of Republican insurgency, and insurgency will become "regular" and the "regulars" will become "insurgents," and the President may go on governing by party and yet govern right. The Republican party will again become the party of progress, of great moral purposes and will be fit to live and to command the suffrages of men.

The Strategic Point In the Coming Contest The fight now about to be precipitated in New York, for control of the Republican party in New York, has been waging in California for months and, here as there, it is a winning fight. The fight is within the Republican party for the purification of the Republican party, and is to the death of the old element that has dominated so long and so injuriously. And we Californians must not forget that the fight for party control centers in the selection of delegates to county conventions. That is the strategic point in the contest. If we are careless and allow the "organization" manipulators to name the delegates to the county conventions who, in turn, will name the delegates to the state convention, which state convention will select and elect the governing committee of the party—if we lose out there we shall not have won a complete victory even though we nominate and elect the whole Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican state ticket. The possession of that committee is not less important than the possession of the gubernatorial office. There was fear that, in Iowa, the people had slept while the "standpatters" had framed up the state convention to their taste, but the results of the primary, analyzed, disclose the encouraging fact that the "insurgents" were alive to their interests and that they will control the state convention by a majority of 155 votes. California can do as well if voters can be made to understand the necessity for sending only their very best men as delegates to what, on the surface, may seem to be a most perfunctory and inconsequential function—the naming of delegates to a state convention.

Forcing the Issue Of Conservation The visit of Theodore Roosevelt to Beverly may not have had anything to do with it, but it is interesting to note that, following fast upon it, the President has out-Roosevelted Roosevelt in withdrawing public lands from entry, oil lands, phosphate, timber, coal to the aggregate of nearly eight and a half million acres. That act will force the hands of congress. The public domain need not, must not, cannot remain bottled, but bottled it is and will remain until congress acts. We may expect the conservation measures proposed by the President to monopolize the attention of Congress as soon as it opens in December. Perfected bills will be ready, the President's message will be burdened with the theme, the insurgent element will have taken many states and, whether Republican or Democratic, will be for an enlightened policy of conservation. To be sure the newly elected congress will not come into power for a full year thereafter, but the moral effect of it will. None but the Bourbons will bow their necks to butt against the popular will as expressed in November. No one can question the sincerity of the President's conservation principles. Only his methods and the kind of people he has chosen to co-operate with him have been open to question. Now that he has the reinforcement of the most potent personality in the nation, if not on the globe, he should be able to make progress even with the ill-matched and ill-conditioned team he has harnessed for the task. It would be better, though, to turn some of the cripples out to grass. The President has done splendidly and the outlook for an enlightened land policy is encouraging.

What of California's Own Conservation? California probably ranks the first state in the Union in the possibilities of development of hydro-electrical energy. Our power lines are only less important than our lines of railroad, and yet neither in taxing, in regulating, in fixing rates for, nor preventing the monopolization of power privileges and the transportation of electrical energy has any legislation worthy of the name been attempted. In what predicament should we be if each county assessor assessed so much of the railroads as passed through his county, giving us fifty-eight differing scales of valuation, each assessor catching what property he could in his own county as it passed through? That would parallel California's method of assessing the power lines which, in fact, are one property from the origin of the water supply to the myriad buttons that are pressed to turn on lights or power. This is a subject which the coming legislature should deal with, and it stands the people in hand to send up to Sacramento legislators fit to deal with it. And in the public, not a special or corporate, interest. These issues must be met in a spirit of broad justice, liberality to capital and enterprise, but with an unyielding concern for the rights of consumers and the heritage of our children. Let us have a legislature fit to deal with these problems.

Parker Planning to Beat the Primary Walter F. X. Parker is reported as having made another trip to Washington to see Senator Flint with the suspected purpose of inducing Flint to join the "organization" in trying to Lorimer the California legislature after the manner of that of Illinois. The stench arising from Illinois, where the interests impounded their legislative cattle, being somewhat in excess of that arising from the Chicago stockyards, must be anything but agreeable to the not too sensitive olfactories of Senator Flint. He stomached Ruef and accessories in securing his first election and he may be able to gulp the probable Herrin-Parker program to ignore the advisory vote and throw the election into the legislature as if there had been no such expression of opinion, but it will be death to every legislator who gets caught in that dragnet. Of course the "organization" leaders do not care greatly for that. When their tools get worn out they have no hesitation in throwing them into the political scrap heap and finding more, but the carnage of reputations attendant upon any purpose to evade the advisory vote will discount anything California has witnessed in all her political history. And the man who is elected by that method will see the day when to be pilloried would be preferable!

The Case Of Nat. Ellery Politics is never without its humorous features and seldom without its pathetic. In this campaign it is given to Nathaniel Ellery to furnish the pathos. Mr. Ellery has been in office nearly twelve years at a fair salary, has been economical in his scale of expenditure, has probably saved up several thousand dollars which he, and the sitters and eaters by whom he has surrounded himself, are now devouring in as vain a campaign for anything except notoriety as was ever conducted. Ellery is a good fellow, although lacking in executive ability as his career as head of the office of State Engineer abundantly shows. The Watchman is of opinion that Ellery may be absolved from the charge of having been put into this contest by any schemer or with any ulterior purpose. His head is turned. He is suffering from a case of temporary megalomania. He is likely to be effectually cured by the time his cash is all paid out and he finds himself out of a job and without having received enough votes to raise his returns above being reported as "scattering." But for the pathos of it the figure he cuts would be the joke of the campaign, but when the consequences to him are considered the humor evaporates and only the pathos remains. Politically speaking he is a cat-in-a-fit and when he comes out of it he will have nothing left but a "wow."

The Fight to Hold Won At Los Angeles Last week The Watchman called attention to the fact that the forces of good government in Los Angeles had found that they not only had to fight to win, but that they had to fight just as hard to hold what they had won as they did to gain the initial victory. It is ever thus, but we are glad to say that the fight to hold, waged on Thursday of last week (our press day) gained the victory. The reactionary, irreconcilable, abominable Times was beaten at every point and the Express was at every point triumphant and deservedly so.

One of the issues was the determining by referendum vote that the electric power companies should furnish lights at 7 cents per kilowatt hour, the price heretofore charged being nine. The seven cent rate carried. If injustice has been done the electric companies they have only themselves to thank for it. It was because the people did not believe that what the officers of those companies said was true, and if they were not to be believed the fault was theirs and not that of the people.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

The people of Los Angeles would not knowingly vote to confiscate the property of any public service corporation. The sense of fair play is too strong in the American mind for that, but unfortunately it has come to be almost axiomatic that the word of a corporation officer, from railroad president to billing clerk, is to be accepted at par value at all times, except when the interests of the corporation are involved. Then their official consciences require them to lie like so many Japanese coolies. There is nothing so conducive to fair dealing as frank integrity on the part of the dealer.

Pinchot's Message To Californians

Through the Scripps papers Gifford Pinchot has sent this message to the People of California: "I expect to speak for William Kent in California on July 20, 21 and 22. The places of the meetings are being arranged for out there. I am deeply interested in his success and in that of Hiram Johnson. Both these men represent political progress as against political reaction, and both are standing for the right of the American people to govern themselves, and against the special interests in politics. That is reason enough why these men should have the earnest support and good wishes of every patriotic American. That is what all these fights in the various states are about. Business must get out of politics."

That is a good message and one that Californians will hear right gladly. There is not in our country a clearer mind or a truer heart than those possessed by Gifford Pinchot, and if he can help to get the affairs of government confided to such hands as those of Hiram Johnson and William Kent the public will be further in his debt than it now is. California's latch string will be out when Gifford Pinchot knocks at her door.

Pinchot To Kent Since writing the above, The Watchman has seen a copy of the following letter from Mr. Pinchot, dated at Milford, Pa., June 30th, and addressed to Mr. Kent: "Dear Will: It was thoroughly good news when the announcement came that you are a candidate against McKinlay. Men of your sort are needed in Washington. How badly they are needed few know more clearly than I. In my judgment the people of your district will render a good service of real importance to the nation if they send you to Congress. You and I have known each other and have worked together shoulder to shoulder for the last ten years and longer. I know where you stand on the great public questions that really make a difference to the American people, and I know that every good cause can count on your support. You have proved that. So I send my heartiest good wishes for your success. I am coming to California to do what I can to help. If there were more men like you in the House of Representatives and fewer stand-patters like your opponent, the American people would have more confidence in Congress. Yours as always, GIFFORD PINCHOT." Well spoken and to the point, and from a man whose words have weight.

What of This Test Of Republicanism?

The San Francisco Chronicle would read out of the Republican party, from Theodore Roosevelt to the humblest citizen, every one who attacks the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, as having repudiated Republican doctrine and by that means ceased to be a Republican. How lonesome editor John P. Young would be if that test were applied to the rank and file of the party!

There is a sense in which the Payne-Aldrich tariff law is accepted by those who detest it, detest the methods employed in the making and detest the men who were chiefly responsible for its being made. One of these is the President of the United States, and there are millions of other Republicans who go farther than he and are ashamed for him that he did not have the nerve to veto so unsatisfactory and ill-conceived a measure.

The law is accepted by those who detest it, good Republicans, too, in the expectation that it will have to be endured for some years, except as the accurate information to be gathered by the President's tariff board shall make it possible to revise the law, schedule by schedule, from a scientific and not a log-rolling point of view.

Biding that time the Payne-Aldrich tariff law is to be endured for the reason that it cannot be intelligently cured, but there is no obligation placed upon any person, or any voter, to defend the indefensible, and justify the unjust, or get out of the Republican party. If those who protest do go they will take the Republican party with them, and the Chronicle will come tagging after.

That General Understanding

The joke of last week keeps going this week in the form of the "organization" "general understanding" that Hiram Johnson is Mr. Herrin's second choice for the Republican nomination for governor. It started with Nat. Ellery, who is very sure that Mr. Herrin does not want him, and that he will be very well satisfied with Johnson. In part Ellery is right. Nobody but Ellery wants Ellery nominated for governor. He would have the state of California so scattered to the winds of heaven that his successor would be unable to find the pieces. It is characteristic of the "organization" to seek to make political capital of the unpopularity of the "organization's" chief. If they could make it appear that Mr. Herrin loves Mr. Johnson only less ardently than he loves Mr. Anderson, and more warmly than he adores Mr. Curry or Mr. Stanton—if they could tar Johnson with the same stick whereof they are themselves tarred—it would be an achievement not to be underrated in their present predicament. No one with a germ of sanity equal to a mustard seed can be fooled by any such pretense. Mr. Herrin would be as little satisfied with the nomination of Hiram Johnson for governor as with that of Francis J. Heney, Rudolph Spreckels, George C. Pardee, Chester H. Rowell, George H. Boke, Fremont Older or the Reverend Father Lathrop. He will put up with what cannot be helped with what philosophy he may, but no more than that is to be expected of him.

IT WON'T COME TRUE

Judge Dooling on Hiram W. Johnson Judge Martin T. Dooling, of the Superior Court of San Benito county, has a state-wide reputation for integrity and sober judgment that is respected far beyond the little barriers of county lines and the bigger barrier of partisan prejudice. When Hiram Johnson spoke recently at Hollister, which is Judge Dooling's home town, the judge was unavoidably absent, but he left a letter, to be read in public at the meeting, which indicates once more how clearly Hiram Johnson is recognized by the best men of all parties as the hope of California for a governor independent of all entangling machine alliances. In this letter Judge Dooling said: "I had hoped to be at home on the occasion of your visit to Hollister in order that I might have the privilege of introducing you to our people, not, indeed, as a Democrat or Republican, but as a friend whom I greatly esteem and admire and as a sincere, upright and untrammelled man."

Where Hiram Johnson Speaks

Hiram Johnson's meetings are arranged ahead to the 13th. He will speak on Friday, the 8th, at Ferndale at 8 p. m.; Saturday, the 9th, at Fortuna at 11 a. m., at Arcata at 3 p. m., and at Eureka at 8 p. m.; Monday, the 11th, at San Rafael at 8 p. m.; Tuesday, the 12th, at Calistoga at 11:15 a. m., at St. Helena at 1 p. m., at the Veterans' Home in Yountville at 3 p. m., and at Napa at 8 p. m.; Wednesday, the 13th, at Benicia in the daytime and at Vallejo at 8 p. m.

E. A. Luce Making A Manly Fight

Edgar A. Luce, formerly city prosecutor of San Diego, is making a campaign for the Republican nomination for district attorney of San Diego county that is a model of straightforward, fearless and proper political methods. Mr. Luce is a young man whose character and record lead one to expect just such methods as he is using. His statement of his candidacy, issued to the voters of San Diego county, is as forthright a piece of manly English as it has been the pleasure of The Watchman to read in a long time. It leaves nothing to the imagination, puts Mr. Luce's position squarely on record, and asks no quarter. It is as follows: "After careful consideration, I decided to become a candidate for the office of district attorney, on the Republican ticket. In politics, I have always been an independent Republican. I have been identified with the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League of this county since its organization, and its principles of political reform are my principles. If elected district attorney, I shall do my full duty honestly and courageously, and without fear of political destruction or hope of future political reward. I ask the support at the primary of all Republicans in the county who are in favor of good government, and an equal, honest and aggressive enforcement of the law." Mr. Luce here burns his bridges behind him and breasts the spears of the enemy unafraid. He deserves to be victorious.

E. J. Tyrell To Beat Leavitt

The voters of the Sixteenth Senatorial District have a chance at this primary election to defeat Frank Leavitt for re-election. Leavitt, above all the men in the senate—except Wolfe, with whom he has always worked hand in hand—should be defeated. He and Wolfe are the brains of the "machine" crowd in the senate, and their influence upon legislation has been invariably bad. He is as clever as sin and as adroit as Machiavelli and a temperamental analogue to the late Jim Jeffries. The man who is contesting the Republican nomination with him this year is Edward J. Tyrell, who has been for the past five years confidential clerk and secretary in the office of the mayor of Oakland. Mr. Tyrell's reputation for integrity and ability is vouched for to The Watchman by men whose judgment is sound and whose word is good. In the case of the Sixteenth District, The Watchman would support any man whose integrity alone was assured. An honest ass would do California infinitely less harm than Leavitt. To know that Mr. Tyrell is capable as well as honest is, in this case, to pile diamonds upon a golden reputation. The Watchman heartily urges upon all voters their duty to support Edward J. Tyrell at the primary election. That is where the votes count this year.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly:

I cannot restrain expressions of surprise regarding the proposed unionizing of Los Angeles, Seattle and Portland. It is not often I am compelled to differ from you. May I ask what eternal unity you bear those cities that you should wish them to be forced into the deplorable condition of San Francisco? You surely are aware that San Francisco's degradation and shame are due largely, if not entirely, to organized labor in politics.

It is all right for labor to organize for purpose of its betterment, if it will keep within its clear right; but it is all wrong for them to array class against class, or themselves against other classes. Class government always has been and always will be corrupt and infamous. To organized labor in politics we owe our Abe Ruef, our Gene Schmitz, our shameless briberies and sale of the birthright of the people to felons of greed. To it we also owe the present civic administration, the extension of the lines of the tenderloin, the return of a hideous night-life, and the wholesale debauchery of the youth of the city. A laboring man is just as good as a banker or professional man, if he is only honest and upright. But the trouble with organized labor in politics is that it is blind to every sense of right or justice; knows but one thing, and that is self. They follow flock-wise like sheep any chance leader who springs up to exploit the organization for his own profit or aggrandizement. Other members of the community have interests as dear and rights as sacred as those of organized labor; and the sacred rights of each should be recognized and respected. We are drifting rapidly to the maelstrom of destruction, and ruin will surely overtake the whole community unless there is an interposing hand of a kind providence to stem the tide of blind passion for self interest; to raise to a higher standard the ideals of business and the morality of the community.

H. M. HANSON.

Our correspondent appears to confuse organized labor as a means for protecting the wage earner against the downward pressure of the upper millstone and organized labor as a factor in local politics. For the one all men who love humanity can cherish no sentiments other than good will. For the other every thoughtful citizen must be profoundly concerned. Nowhere are voters grouped together for any purpose whatever that political schemers do not try to make use of those groups for political advantage. That San Francisco is now governed by a so-called labor government is not due to organized labor reaching out after political power, but to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, and allied interests, that adroitly made use of a labor party for delivering their grafting clients out of hard straits. In the days of Ruef and Schmitz the degradation of San Francisco was not chargeable to organized labor, but rather to that group of financiers who "wanted things" and conspired and voted to put these men in power in order that they might "get things" they wanted. Our ignominy was the result of organized scoundrelism that wears dress suits, silk hats and rides in automobiles. Organized labor will learn not to be used by schemers to the advantage of the schemers and to labor's hurt. There are splendid men in labor's ranks trying to teach them now. It was not organized labor that elected McCarthy mayor. It was the organized tenderloin, Royal Arch, the indicted grafters and their sympathizers, financed and marshaled by Big Business. The only way to defeat this form of conspiracy is to organize the decent element, in organized labor and out of it, into one opposing phalanx, not two. The Berkeley idea in elections will accomplish it.

downward pressure of the upper millstone of greed that is willing to transmute health and life, blood and bone, into gold at whatever cost to those who serve; an economic pressure that, unresisted, pounds wages down to the lowest scale at which the worker can do his work and live, even until another and more youthful victim can take his place.

This struggle upward meets the downward pressure and there is a strike. The employer stands on his legal rights to buy labor, as he may any other commodity, where he can buy it cheapest, and the cheapest are they whose necessities are direst. These necessitous ones, mindful only of their own needs, intervene, fill the employer's ranks and so help to crush that upward movement upon which all labor must depend for a betterment of condition. Need we wonder that the "scab" comes to be looked upon by the union labor enthusiast as a social menace, a pariah, a common enemy to be fought with whatever comes handy?

It is all very legal and very sound to insist upon the right of every individual man to work for whom he may at such wages as he can get without interference from any other worker. We cannot justify any other industrial creed and yet, being interpreted, it means in application the degradation of those who that they may live must toil to the ultimate point where life is barely worth the living.

History furnishes, outside the walks of labor, few parallels to the heroism, the self sacrifice, the brotherhood, the steadfastness of those who have gone on strike that their own condition, and that of their kindred, might be lifted up. Is it any wonder that a fanaticism that enables one to suffer all things for a common good should sometimes make the fingers itch to clutch the throat of one who, to satisfy his own needs, aligns himself with the enemy of his kind and brings all upward efforts to naught?

If such events as the one so graphically described above are not excusable, at least they are explicable and are certainly not of a parity with the thuggery of the footpad.

Editor The California Weekly:

Dear Sir: I am enclosing check for $2.00 to settle subscription to May 14, 1911.

I read each article in the Weekly with interest and appreciate greatly the efforts you are making toward clean politics and good government.

Very sincerely yours,

G. C. SIMMONS, M. D.

Sacramento, Cal., 1910.

Editor The California Weekly:

Dear Sir: Of all the many regular publications received by me, none interest me more deeply than yours and nothing that you furnish seems to me more worth while than "The Deeper Significance of Living" and "Our School for Citizenship."

Yours etc.,

R. S. GRAY.

Oakland, Cal., 1921 Telegraph Ave., June 18, 1910.

Editor California Weekly:

Dear Sir: Inclosed please find two dollars for one year's subscription to the Weekly—the best and about the only independent journal I know of published in San Francisco. Most like the old Argonaut, but a saner and better tempered paper, destined, I hope, to become the Collier's of the Pacific Coast.

I was one of your first subscribers, but predicted failure for the paper. I am now glad to admit my mistake—as the Weekly has passed the experimental stage and shows marked evidence of prosperity and permanent success. That a paper devoted to civic righteousness can live in San Francisco is a never ceasing wonder to me. To my mind you have exhibited great energy and ability, coupled with unusual courage and wisdom in conducting the paper, and with a refreshing good humor. Free from cant and muck-raking, you have waged a ceaseless warfare against corrupt men and vicious measures, and assuredly deserve the support of all the good people of the community. A great work of reform along the lines pursued by the Weekly is sorely needed in California, and rich results should follow serious and continuous effort, once the people are thoroughly awakened. I have spent the last ten months in Europe and the Orient—visiting perhaps a hundred cities, and in every place I made inquiry I found that the political rottenness of San Francisco is known to the intelligent people. They know our city well in Europe, and consider it a veritable "sink of corruption," and our people incapable of self government. Let us hope that through proper organization of the decent people (and they constitute a majority) and through such agencies as The California Weekly, our city can yet be redeemed and restored to good government.

Very respectfully,

HOMER T. BICKEL.

Cherbourg, France, June 19, 1910.

The way to cure an unfortunate reputation is to remove the cause of it, not try to prevent the truth leaking out. The truth will out and, if it be injurious, rides on swift wings and flies far.

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office, 30 Montgomery St. Phone Kearny 4491
Residence, 1297 McAllister St. Phone Park 4390
SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY The Complete Text of the REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

Have you ever seen a man after he has been mauled almost to death? I have. I saw one last week. "It" looked more like a bundle of rags than anything else. "It" didn't move! "It" made no sound! "It" had been a shoe maker! I thought the Divine Spark was out, gone forever! I thought, "It" was a looking crowd stood around "it" and I thought I could see malignant gleams in some eyes, as they looked at the shape in the gutter.

I remembered a bunch of wolves in the Wisconsin forests as they silently sat on their haunches and watched one of their number who was snarling at them, dragging his hind quarters around the circle through the ensanguined snow. My father had crimped him.

"It" was crimped, too, and into insensibility. "It" was a free laborer who had taken the place of a striking hand in a shoe factory across the bay. The mob looked on silently and then there was a rush from the sidewalk and an old woman with burning gray eyes and disheveled hair and two bright red spots glowing alarm signals on her cheeks, rushed out and grabbed the shape and begged it to speak. "It" didn't. "It" was almost dead. With unerring aim the four representatives of the shoe men's union had kicked him, as one of them said, where it would do him "the most good." Have you ever been kicked in the genital organs? If you have, you know what it is like! William McFarland, free working man, suffered. They took him home to 3421 25th street, where he lives, and the woman with the pathetic burning eyes is nursing him back to life.

Have the daily papers made any comment? No, they are the wolves, sitting silently by watching the crimped one dragging his hindquarters through the bloody snow. If he dies, they'll publish his death notice, but they will not tell what he died of, and he may not die for months and months. That kind of an injury reveals itself in strange troubles long after the brave men who have inflicted the torture have forgotten the incident.

The police? Oh, yes, the police. I have been so interested in telling the story that I forgot there was a police. I do not believe they figure in this story at all. Besides, this is a labor administration. We have police who do "what we tell them to do." Maybe, they weren't told about this attempt at murder.

This paper uses the foregoing understanding it to be a sample of Citizens' Alliance literature being sent out to such papers as will use it. The incident chronicled may be literally as chronicled. There have been thousands such. For not one of them was there ever justification, and yet there is another side to the shield, a side that is ever turned away from the Citizens' Alliance type of mind, a side that makes us have a sympathy for the criminal if not for his crime. Let us look at it.

A body of workmen unite for the bettering of their condition, for resistance to that

THE PEOPLE UNAFRAID

AN ORATION DELIVERED IN SAN FRANCISCO ON THE FOURTH OF JULY

By JOHN F. DAVIS

Fellow Citizens of San Francisco:

I deem it a high privilege to take part in this celebration today. I am but too conscious that I can add nothing to it that is worthy of the theme.

The scene which presents itself is repeated wherever an American heart beats or an American tongue can give utterance. From the peak of every American ship on the high seas, and on land from the flagstaff of every schoolhouse and home, from factory and workshop and mine, from the dome of our capitol at Washington to the farthest outpost on the strand of Luzon, the air is made radiant with the tender grace, the perfect beauty and the thrilling promise of the red, white and blue. Prayer and benediction, jubilation and song witness the people's glad acclaim. The look upon the faces of men, the smile on the lips of women, the glee in the shout of children, proclaim the natal day of the nation.

Other nations of eminence may indeed find anniversaries to celebrate from which they can draw inspiration, but few nations there are that can draw inspiration from the day of their birth. Most of them began in barbarism, in the twilight of fable. Their "history begins with the poet and ends with the policeman." Our national life, however, began 134 years ago, when at two o'clock in the afternoon fifty-six patriots, headed by John Hancock, banded together, and for the support of a declaration that astounded the political world, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor.

A Republic More Than a Name

Not every government that has called itself a republic represents what we understand by that term. The word republic signifies a commonwealth and is, etymologically considered, applicable to states founded on systems as far apart as the poles.

The republics of Greece recognized a distinction of helots and freemen. The republic of Rome recognized a distinction between patricians and plebeians and slaves. The republics of the middle ages recognized the feudal distinction of lord and vassal and bondman, while the little republics of Switzerland and San Marino and Andorra are in reality only so many county governments rather than states, pigmies not to be reckoned, among the giants. Our republic was founded upon principles and ideas of government fundamentally different from those which distinguish all of these.

The colonists that flocked to these shores from the old world laid the foundation of this government in a stern sincerity, and builded better than they knew. Their natural environment threw them back upon their own resources, and forced upon them the consciousness of their own measure and limit and capacity as men. Never in the history of mankind was an evolution of government more natural. "The seeds of freedom had long been sown; the spirit of liberty was in the grand rivers, the pathless woods, the far-stretching fields, in the very air they breathed," and there was needed but the heat of persecution to quicken it into life. Had there been no pressure from above they might have been content with some less radical makeshift of government. But the intolerant demands of parliament, the insane insistence of the crown, and the tyranny of Colonial governors in whose appointment they had no voice, conspired to force upon their attention the question of their rights as men, and, later on, wrung from their realization of those rights a promulgation of them. Thus, from their native bias of independence of mind, from the influence of their natural environment, and from the imperious necessity of circumstance, amid the jeers and sneers of an incredulous world, they came to proclaim as tenets of practical statesmanship that all men are created equal in their rights and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Struggle First for Political Rights

At that day what a grand and sublime political act of faith! Every man had equal rights with every other to work out his own civil destiny. He had certain inalienable rights, not because he was learned, not because he owned property, but because he was a man. Could society trust him with those rights and survive? That was the problem. In reply, they boldly asked what just rights has society that man has not given it. In the ultimate analysis, the eternal and immutable rights of man as man were at the bottom of all civil polity. Then from their own heroic belief in themselves they were led to believe in the capacity of humanity at large intelligently to avail itself of the rights that were undeniably its own. They would build a nation upon their faith and trust in what was best in human nature. Fateful as was the precedent, daring as was the experiment, awful as was the responsibility, they acted as men always act who have convictions to give them courage—they proclaimed that humanity should be re-enfranchised of every political right of which it had been shorn by the hand of power, and they invoked the consequences upon their own heads and upon those of their children's children. Humanity, with all its loves and hopes and fears, was to be free.

They made only one concession, they incurred only one debt, to human selfishness, and though payment of it nearly involved our national existence, still that debt has been paid. In giving a recognition to slavery in the federal constitution, our forefathers knew that they were sowing tares. Yet out of civil war the form of the Republic arose grander, purer, stronger than ever before. There was needed but that one crowning test to prove to the world that our fathers' faith in the strength and permanence of republican institutions had not been in vain. The one wrong that had been the stumbling-block of all other republics of the world's history—the legal recognition of class distinctions—had been removed, and the lie that had been given to the declaration that the rights of all men are equal, had been wiped from the statute book forever. That the nation had the conscience to recognize the evil and the power to eradicate it without self-destruction, is the highest guarantee of the stability of our political institutions that could be given to the all-hoping heart of man.

We Have Prospered

With an abiding faith in the political principles of 1776, and with an unfaltering trust in the constitution founded upon them, have we lived and prospered. From thirteen weak and disunited colonies we have developed into a nation of forty-seven incomparable states. In the increase of material wealth we have startled the imagination. In the multiplicity and ingenuity of mechanical invention we have outrivalled the world. Upon the sure foundation of political right what a nation has been builded! America is still yielding to the manifest destiny that makes her great. Today the flag is welcome to float in Hawaiian skies. No order from any monumental egotist at Washington to any paramount commissioner will ever cause it to be hauled down at Honolulu on any future Fourth of July. No hostile threat of any foreign power, nor grasping insolence of any domestic trust was able to defeat our hope that it would float triumphant from Newport News to Pearl Harbor, from Washington to Porto Rico, and from Manila to the Golden Gate.

In our present position no alien will lay a heavy hand upon us. We are free, unmolested of the world, to work out our own political salvation. Nations that once spoke patronizingly of our system of popular government now openly seek our alliance. We seek, however, no tangling alliance with any nation. Our attitude is one of cordial and friendly rivalry with them all. We have now no quarrel with England, even on the Fourth of July. As two college crews cheer each other at the beginning of the race in which they bend their every energy to win, so these two nations today pass on to grapple with the problems of human thought and action the future holds in store for them. Let England beat us in the race of civilization—if she can—and we stand ready, every mother's son, to doff our hats and cheer "the echo of the drum-beat of the English 'round the world." Into the international contest for the civilization and amelioration of humanity, we invite the nations of the world. We shall hope to do more than our full share, and shall have no fear of the result.

But New Problems Arise

At home, however, our problems have grown apace. "The past, at least, is secure;" the future is what we shall make it. For the last forty-five years men's minds in America seem to have turned away from politics. For nearly the last half century the best brain and nerve force of the country has been engaged not in politics, but in the production and accumulation of wealth. As a result, in many communities, political apathy and indifference rule the day, availability stands in the shoes of statesmanship, sycophancy kisses the feet of success, and in the resultant demoralization politics is often abandoned to a set of men who exploit it just as they would a "wild-cat" upon the stock exchange. Why? Because our ablest men are less honest, less sincere? Not at all. Simply because the nerve and force and brain of this country have been otherwise employed. With republican institutions we began by sweeping political tyranny from the face of the land, but since then we have turned our backs upon political life and confined our attention to material production, till on the horizon looms the threatening spectre of the plutocracy.

The insistence of public and political affairs as a portion of our experience is already making itself acutely felt in the national consciousness. We are realizing with a vengeance that in our neglect of all the great aspects of public life—legislative, judicial, executive—many of the expedients that sufficed in a former time are now in need of radical amendment to meet the changed conditions. "Never in the history of our country," it is said, "has there been greater need for intelligent public leadership than now."

Warnings Against Clamor

It has become the fashion of late, especially at the commencement season, to address the graduating classes of our colleges and universities and to maintain that "upon the educated men and women of this country there devolve public duties and civic responsibilities which they may not, without proving recreant to their trust, either ignore or evade." Appeals are made to them to do their utmost to secure the best government possible, and especially to oppose any innovations or tendencies which may be inconsistent with the principles of representative government, and upon which its stability and permanency must ultimately depend. It is pointed out that, in the last analysis, our government is based upon public opinion, and warning is issued that the "deliberate and reasoned judgment of the community" which constitutes legitimate public opinion must not be confounded with public clamor. Instances in our country's history are cited where public clamor, if it could have accomplished its object, would have proved disastrous, and emphasis is laid upon the wise planning of our governmental machinery not only to give expression to matured public opinion but especially to resist the mischief-producing power of public excitement. The danger of the demagogue and his newspaper is dwelt upon. All this is made the basis of admonitions against swift short-cut changes which to a certain extent undo our governmental system of checks and balances. In short, we are warned not to damage our compass or mutilate our charts when we put out on a political sea.

All this is true and timely, as an aid to legitimate conservatism and as a tonic to political sanity, and as such it is deserving of praise. If the fools who rush in where angels fear to tread are beginning to multiply, the public should be warned. We should not lightly throw away the legacies of the ages. But in the long run, after all, constitutions and charters are only makeshifts of government. They have no peculiar sanctity in and of themselves. The attitude of men toward them will, in the last analysis, depend not upon any virtue they are supposed to contain, but upon whether their working proves an aid or a hindrance to those great practical questions of immediate moment upon which men have convictions and in the solution of which they have a direct interest. Whether right or wrong, the contact between the ordinary citizen and governmental methods arises, even in the case of the educated man, whatever that phrase may mean, not out of any academic appreciation of their merits or demerits, but out of their relation to any great questions in which he takes a personal interest. No matter how salutary in the abstract the advice conservatism may give, as to the danger of allowing the ship of state to drag its moorings or drift into uncharted seas by "short cuts to political perfection," the warning is apt to fall upon unheeding ears, unless conservatism will grapple convincingly with the discussion of those immediate problems as a means to the solution of which the governmental change was attempted.

But Clamor Arises from New Problems

It must be understood, in the first place,

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES, AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00

Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00

Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,555,093.05

Deposits June 30th, 1910..... 40,384,727.21

Total Assets 43,108,907.82

Remittances may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Edl's, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS — N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

that the late tendency to political short cuts is of forced growth, and that for this tendency the apathy of conservatism, where it has not been guilty of worse, has been more than anything else to blame. The tendency to tinker with constitutions and charters, the drift toward pure democracy, if you will, has not arisen out of mere intellectual restlessness nor academic thirst for novelty, it has been created and sustained by the growth of abuses which have trampled upon the people's most sacred rights by making a mockery of the very guarantees under which these abuses were permitted. For instance, what American ever took an interest in the direct primary until the corruption of conventions and the pollution of legislatures became a demonstrated fact? When this country became conscious that corporate greed was reaching for an advantage through the machinery of political conventions and convention methods, then, and not till then, did it act. Not rashly was the change accomplished, but gradually, in state after state, after long campaigns of education, not as a result of public clamor, but as a result of "the deliberate and reasoned judgment of the community." And the men who finally accomplished the change and did the most effective work in its behalf, were those whose political instincts are conservative, who hesitate at innovations and appreciate their perils, and who move from the old moorings only when the anchorage has been proved unsafe.

True, the American political instinct is conservative. Fortunately, our people do not take readily to changes of constitutions or charters or governmental methods. And yet, our people are a people determined and unafraid. Their minds, too, are as alert as their hearts are courageous. You cannot lull them into insecurity as to their rights by burning incense to the efficacy of their political institutions. Men still alive remember how slavery was once defended on the ground that it was tolerated in the constitution, and that the stoutest defenders of the letter of the constitution were those who were interested in the "peculiar institution." In that day, men did not divide, in the first instance, upon whether they were for or against the constitution, but upon whether they were for or against slavery, and it was only as the result of a determination to abolish slavery that there came the determination to amend the constitution, even at the cost of civil war. And so now men will be listened to, or ignored, on questions of governmental changes, in great measure according to how their advice dovetails with the concrete problems whose existence and whose existence alone causes these changes to be mooted and discussed.

Conservatism Must Face Problems

Intelligent and patriotic conservatism is recreant to its trust if it merely issues a warning as to tendencies involved in governmental changes and then is still. If that is all it proposes to do, then no matter how true its utterance in the abstract, its voice will be that of a Cassandra in the community. It will not do to say that the concrete problems that have most to do with the dangerous expedients suggested for institutional changes are themselves too complex to discuss. If conservatism is to do its fair share in the formation of a legitimate public opinion, it must come into the open arena, and discuss the concrete problems that are challenging the national consciousness, or its protest will go unheeded. There is where the honest aid of all men is needed. If in its timidity it refuse to discuss them, or attempt to influence the discussion only by indirection, then even its sincerity will be doubted, and its influence will count for nothing. If it dominate our legislative councils and attempt to ignore them, sidetrack them, or smother them in committees, then men will advocate such institutional amendments as will provide a change of councillors, and if in so doing they incur the danger of placing an added strain upon our governmental machinery, they will shoulder that responsibility and will take that chance.

The first essential is to recognize that these concrete problems exist. Out of the many

(Concluded on Page 526)

HONOLULU and back first class from San Francisco

The splendid steamship SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, July 9, July 30th and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sales from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire

OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING

CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00

Paid-up Capital 300,000.00

Surplus and Undivided Profits.. 435,000.00

DIRECTORS James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy. Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper Mark L. Requa
Thomas Jennings J. H. Skinner
James K. Lynch Rudolph Spreckels
Walter S. Martin John W. Van Bergen
J. K. Moffitt Rolla V. Watt
S. G. Murphy Clinton E. Worden
George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

["Skid Puffer" is one of the most popular novels of the year. The California Weekly is, therefore, exceptionally fortunate in being able to present to its readers, through the kindness of its anonymous author, two more "Tales of the Kankakee Swamp," of which the following is the first, and of both of which "Skid Puffer" is the quaintly humorous narrator. All book and serial rights to the use of these sketches, after publication in The California Weekly, are expressly reserved by the author.—The Editor.]

W'EN pop an' me was out one day cuttin' fifteen inch stove wood, it bein' purty hot he set down sayin', "Skid, about here I shot the bigges' diviles' long winded bull turk as ever was." Nen he, kind o' chucklin' an' wipin' the sweat out of 'is hat, said agin, "Fer a fac' I guess it was this very ellum log we are sawin' up where I shot an' broke 'is wing."

"You know, Skid, nobody can slip up on a turk without it seein' you firs' less o' course you happen to know where they air roostin' an' wait all night. There's nothin' on this here earth as has a fine an eye 'cept a sparrer here earth as has as fine an eye 'cept a sparrer hawk under any circumstances. If you think you air you air fooled. It sees you an' knows all about yer slippin'."

"I have slipped up on one on'y in forty-nine year and I tell you it took int'lect to do it. Nobody ever done that but me. If it hadn't 'a' been fer a sparrer hawk I wouldn't a' caught the bigges' bull turk as ever run one hundred an' twenty-five miles in one day and ended up by steppin' right up on the kitchen table an' 'spired right on the spot with his laigs stickin' up to the ceilin'."

"That was leas' thirty-five year 'fore you was born. I was out huntin' an' there was no game nowhere. Suddenly I saw one down by th' edge o' the swamp on the finger p'int of a tree, jus' like they allus do, watchin' the lay o' the lan' fer vittals. I went down bol' not even lookin' to'ards it an' got 'mong the thick bresh w'ere nothin' can p'rambulate 'cept a swamp hog. I dove in a shoat hole, them reg'lar runs through the underbrush mebbly forty rod long an' dark as—as Cerubust, Dark? Why, Skid, you couldn't 'a' seen me with a microscope. W'en I come to th' en' I peeked out cautious as a weasel. I was 'bout an hour makin' that firs' sneak through that shoat tunnel. W'en I looked at the finger pint on the top, it was gone. I looked back an' there it was at th' ether en' settin' on the tip-top p'int of a tree not fur from where I got in the tunnel. Now Skid I leave it to you if that wasn't about the mos' provocat' thing as ever happened? I couldn't tell then w'ether it was monkeyin' with me er not. It looked mos' gosh dinged innocen' though."

"So I jooked down into the shoat tunnel agin an' comment to sneak back to where I started from. I went fast this time. But you neen to think I made any more noise 'an a cat walkin' on a blanket. Jus' as I got to the startin' place agin' I cocked my squirl rifle an' like as sly as a swamp fish otter I kind o' edged out. Sly Skid? 'Bout as slow as a snail a-crawlin'. Was it there? The sparrer hawk, oh, where was he?—the gee-danged, red rumped, concatenated mouse eater! He had flew back to his startin' place. Nen my blood was up, just a-bilin'."

"Did I tarry there, oh my brether, as the hymn says? W'y, Skid, I jus' lept in that hole agin an' run back a crawlin' faster 'n a monkey up a pole. I guess I cut through that run, 'bout forty rod long, in 'bout forty secon's. I didn't lose no time. I got to th' en', and looked out and I'll be gosh blimity an' thunderation if he hadn't flew back to my startin' place. But that sparrer hawk had jus' settled, so I knowed I was a-gainin' on him. Mad, Skid? That ain't no name fer my feelin's."

"O' course I jumped in the shoat run agin' an' slid through like greased lightnin'. W'en I come to th' en' I jumped out an' saw him flyin' back. He was 'bout ten rod from his 'riginal place. Nen what do think I done, Skid?"

"I just tore back an' w'en I looked out he was gone agin. Gone agin, by Sam Hill, thunderation an' Texas! I didn't wait, I rammed in agin on my home wire stretch. I looked out and there he was at th' ether en' sittin' like a cat asleep on a hay stack in the sun, specially as innocen' as if it'd been fightin' like a Bengawl tiger all night. You see it'd flew faster cause mebbly it's blood was bilin' too."

THE CHASE OF THE BULL TURK

BY

"SKID PUFFER"

"I tell you, son, I was tired. It went on that way fer two hours. The sweat was runnin' off my beard 'bout as fast as from a sugar tree spile on a sunny mornin' after a light fros'. My toes was worn down to the firs' knuckle an' my close was becomin' most gee danged ragedy."

"W'y pop, didn't you wear boots them days er jus' sence the hunters come?" I ast him. Pop got up an' went to the saw handle slow, thought some, nen went back to the log an' set down wipin' his sweatban' agin.

"Well, I sh'd snickernix. On this here swamp ridge, boots? W'y Skid in them early days th' riginal inhabitants hadn't evolved by Darwicks up to boots; I mean long the Kankakee swamp. I have been reliably tol' that there was n't a few lef' as had the reg'lar six fingers an' toes an' went a big part o' the time on all fours."

"Well, the long of it is me an' that sparrer hawk sashayed back an' forth nineteen times, takin' 'bout two hours I 'spect altogether. W'en I come out that nineteenth time an' looked down to where it was on its firs' perchin' place I said things. I jus' hate to say w'at out o' respect o' the famby. I admit I let loose an' the weeds 'roun' there jus' kind o' wilted. I c'n say to you private, Skid, that my language was sort o' hurried, mos' gal ding hurried. Says I t' myself, 'You gee daddly dod' slammed bloody backed, crooked nosed snoozen ol' mouse cannibawl, if cunnin' can't git you int'lect can.' 'Sir,' said I to a tall hazel bush, 'Sir-r int'lect ru-u-les the worl'—'cept 'ith wimmin'."

"So I slipped in the tunnel an' waited 'bout half an hour. Did that beas'ly cannibawl fly back agin? Not by a jugful, not by mebbly a thousan' million billion jugful. He knowed I was there tired out waitin' by the enterans with my gun. So d'rectly I rose up proud, went back 'bout fifty yard, stretched, yawned just as if I was feelin' gay as a spring squirl. I jus' knowed he was watchin' me out o' the lef' corner of his eye but not lettin' on. Nen, nen w'at? I spit on my 'han's an' fairly plunged, plu-n-ged in that shoat agin'. Fas? I fairly hummed as I shot in that hole. But wen in, I stopped sudden. W'y Skid, I nearly stove my arms in my shoulders bringin' up. That was int'lect workin' agin cunnin' Skid. Jus' as soon as I brought up, I backed out, whirled 'roun', grabbed my gun an' p'inted it right at the top of that tree not fur from the enterans. There I bent waitin' just as still as a stature. Jus' nen it lit. I could see the way it was gawkin' at th' ether en' that it was spectin' me there."

"Was I there er som'where's else. Was my rifle, carryin' sixty to the poun' p'intin' at that sparrer hawk's left eye? Was anybody else in the hist'ry 'o the worl' ever that clost before to a mouse eatin' Bengawl head hunter o' the cannibawl islan's? I jus' should snickernix."

"Just as my glowin' finger was a-tremblin' with joy on the trigger, I saw 'im cast a quick glancet down to the right. He saw sothin' that astonished him. At the same instans I saw jump up on a log, I guess Skid, mebbly, this very same ellum log we are cross-cuttin', by bing! saw the bigges' divilis' bull turk as ever predominated this worl' in the hist'ry o' mankind."

"I can never fergit how that turk looked. He was about as big as a yearlin' heifer an' shone like green an' yellor gol', slick, wil' an' graceful as a skinned onion. He turned his eye up to the sparrer hawk sayin' defian' 'Cut! Cut! Nen the sparrer hawk turned a gleamin' eye down on the turk an' screamed. Nen, Skid, Old Abe Puffer thought it 'bout time to mix in. I knowed nothin' but a tumble bug'd eat the sparrer hawk if I shot him; I knowed mos' 'fernal well if I shot the bull turk there'd be eatin' at our house a full month."

"Besides that Skid, I had been gittin' glances o' that big gobbler fer jus' eleven year. I had caught by trappin' 'leven droves of 'is hens fer that long o' time. I ust to build a rail pen an' throw bresh on top so's it'd kind o' let in the light on top. Nen I'd dig a hog hole under the lower rail an' sling corn along it into the pen. Nen them hens'd come along and eat thenselves right into the pen. O' course a turkey bein' in, air jus' sech i'juts that w'en they want to git out they look up to where it's light. They slam aroun' but never think o' bendin' their heads in prayer an' no trapper in this 'ere worl' ever saw a turkey come out in the way it went in. Jus' like swamp wimmin, turkeys aint got nuthin' in ther heads but instink. They was never 'spected to learn anything."

"So I let fly at the gobbler. I saw the way he flipped down I had broke his wing. I slammed my gun down an' ram-m-med after 'im. You got to be mighty quick 'ith a wil' turkey 'cause they streak away an' hide in the bresh jus' like quail. I come on him so quick that he broke straight away an' me after him."

"Skid, you know sothin' about my runnin', the speed as I can work up, ugh? He took to'ards the Store 'leven miles away an' I was so sudden he didn't have time to even dodge. Neither had I any more'n a shootin' star. Oh my, oh me-e! what a race was that my countrymen, as the 'Selexyuns' says. You see, Skid, a wil' turkey can run nachural 'bout as fast as a race horse, w'en it spurts about as fast as lightnin' along a cloud."

"'Bout to the store it was nip an' tuck in favor o' the gobbler, on'y w'en he spurted I jus' kep' in a straight line till I come up to 'im agin. We jus' ro-a-r-ed by the Store an' I c'd smell sothin' like scorched feathers son, jus' perfectly like scorchin' feathers. We was on the San'hill road there, but did that gee-danged bull turk keep to the road? Was he built that way? No; he kep' to the wildes' places, turnin' one red eye back at me sayin' 'Cut! Cut! w'enever I got clost an' he'd spurt."

"An' didn't I cut after 'im, though? I tell you, Skid, he mighty soon quit sayin' 'Cut! Cut!' 'Bout all he could do was to grunt. W'en we come to the place where the ridge rises up out o' the grazin' lan's, that's thirty-five mile, he took across to Reynol's on a steady lope. I saw it was a wear down jus' like a prize fight. He wasn't holdin' his head so thunderation stiff up in th' air now; he was gittin' mos' gee danged modes'. We got to Reynol' in 'bout two hour. He swept 'roun' the village and every dog, boy, man, woman an' chil' follered in behin', yellin', barkin', spittin' an' gruntin'. Nen the turk turned fer home and in ten minnits on'y me an' the bull turk was in sight er soun'."

"In' bout an hour we struck the ridge agin reg'lar, mebbly no faster now 'an a race horse c'd run. I was surprised 'at he took the road fer awhile. Twice by spurtin' I come 'ithin mebbly fifty foot o' him. W'en he'd run about ten mile along the San'hill Road an' comin' to the more miserabler lan' he suddenly swung down in the waste places 'mongst the beggar lice, spanish needles, vines, hazel bresh an' tangle."

"See what he was tryin' to do, son? Tryin' to lose me. Lo-o-o-se me-e? W'h, Skid, I know ev'ry bresh an' tree an' rock an' darnick from the house to Reynol's. I guess if you'd flirt over a niggerhead most anywheres, I'd be fairly well acquainted with most of the bugs and worms under it. In fifteen minits I had about seven bushels o' beggar lice and spanish needles taggin' me and ethers waitin' fer miles to giye me the happy hand o' greetin'."

"It made me all the madder to see he had plu-n-g-ed into the lousies' places 'long that allfired Ridge. My clothes was bein' ripped off an' the things stickin' to me kind o' obtruded my—my slerity. Slerity, Skid, means lightnin' fas'. He was pioneering, Skid, reglar road maker an' made a hole through the tangle 'bout as big as a large hog'd gimlet through. That is if the gimlet was 'bout three foot acrost.

"Big as that turk was I was bigger an' had to wear that hole bigger. The sorrowful part, Skid, was the damage the bull turk adone to himsef an' the damage wearin' that hole bigger adone to me. W'en we busted out that hole after 'bout two hours into the sunlight, both of us was nearly s'prised so's we c'd hardly breath. The bull turk didn't have a feather on him 'cept the long feathers of 'is wings an' tail; I had no shirt 'cept the neck ban, my hair was a perfec' mat o' beggarlice stuck full o' spanish needles like a pincushion. An' clo'es? Son, jus' one gallus, almos' one pant's laig gone an' th' ether just about. Both of us was red as a smallpox sign. But jus' don't fergit we still was whizzin'.

"Then that bull turk made a fatal mistake, he took up high on the ridge for the San'hill Road. That's where he had busted ideas. Mos' fellers o' course can't run up hill; that's my ace in the hole. I can run up hill jus' like —jus' like 'spect a kang'roo. By whing! Skid, I nearly caught him lopin' up the side o' the Ridge. Runnin' up hill is jus' my elemen'. Besides, I was just a-comin' to my third win'.

"W'en we struck that road, Skid, I fairly buzzed ravin' along. W'y I cert'ly throwed back gravel an' dirt like a race hoss, mebbly a hundred, mebbly five hundred foot. Never was sech runnin' o' red ghosts ever seen in this worl'. I got to fifty foot, nen forty, nen thirty, nen I suddenly spurted and I'll be diddy dinged if I didn't tetch his tail. Right then he spurted an' gained ten foot. Nen fer three mile to the schoolhouse it was nip an' tuck firs' me, nen the turk, but me gainin' a little all the time. 'Spect 'bout a ninch ev'ry forty rod.

"W'en we struck that home stretch from the Crossin's 'bout four mile to home, we both jus' joggin', my tongue hangin' down on my beard, my head wabblin' from side to side, and I c'd see the despairin' look in that ol' bull turk's red eye. We was goin' 'bout as fast as a sheep can trot, both makin' fer th' ol' homestead an' the sun jus' settin'.

"Nen I come to my fourth win', Skid, an' ramped as hard as I could. I had my arm stretched out to'ards his tail, my pintin' finger just a tetchin' but by gee whing! Skid, could I get any closter fer a mile? The nex' mile I spurted once more an' my pintin' finger an' thumb ju-u-us' nabbed his longes' tail feather an' I yanked it out an' stuck in into my neckban'.

"Fer the nex' two miles it was me ravin' by spurts an' just a-reachin' him an' yankin' out a feather an' stickin' it in my neckban'. Ev'ry time after yankin' he'd gain a little, nen I ram-med on agin. Just as we reached the barnyard gate I had 'bout forty feathers in my neckban' an' we was just a-movin', just a-movin', 'bout as fast as a baby can walk. Just a-tippin' along both red as blood, both just a-movin' an' headed fer the house. I yelled 'Angee-ee-a'. Yer mother come out and flung open the yard gate an' screamin' at the sight dodged into the burdocks waitin' fer death by Indians er sothin that looked like the devil.

"I must have looked awful, my hair all bunged up, my wiskers a streamin' blood, them feathers stickin' out o' my neck, mebbly two foot long, me chasin' a frightful Jaggo Lantern as that turk—w'y mom said afterwards that I looked like a man scalped alive by Indians er a runaway slaughterhouse mos'ly on fire.

"I got clost enough to firs' pat him on one side nen th' ether, both movin' like snails. I drove 'im right up to the kitchen door, drove 'im in an' he had just a-strength enough to lift one foot nen th' ether on the kitchen table. Nen he rolled over on 'his back 'ith his feet a-stickin' in th' air perfec'ly an' tetotally plumb dead.

"Skid, I had run one hundred an' twenty-five mile an' had jus' caught up to that gosh blamed bull turk at sunset, sence nine o'clock in the mornin'. 'Skid,' he said, thoughtful, an' he jammed on his hat, 'better drive a wedge in that crack fer this all-fired saw is pinchin' like sixty.'

Charles F. Southmayd of the celebrated law firm of Evarts, Southmayd & Choate, became a member of New York Law Institute in 1850. To be eligible he must have been a lawyer. Hence he has been at the bar for sixty years at least, and very probably is the dean of the profession.

("The People Unafraid"—Concluded)

let me name three: the increased cost and delay incident to the procedure of litigation, the ravages of corporate greed, the amelioration of the industrial lot of the common man. The first is pressing so hard that the President of the United States in a speech at Yale over a year ago called it a national scandal. The second is already engaging all the resourcefulness of the nation's best and most patriotic thought. The third has become world-wide, and may be summarized by the question whether the genius of the race is capable of devising no better adjustment of industrial conditions than that under which, within the law, one man may amass a fortune of a hundred million dollars at Kimberley, while another dies of exposure and starvation on Trafalgar Square. These problems press upon the consciousness of the man in the street. His university course has been gained in the storm and stress of experience, and has lasted a lifetime, and he will not be denied. They press upon the consciousness of every element of our community. The merits and demerits of the contentions with regard to them are topics of daily discussion. No element has a right to be considereed patriotic that withholds its aid to a proper solution of them. Let them, and others akin to them, be rationally settled, and there will be small need of warnings against innovations of governmental methods or sanctions.

Peace, then, has her problems as well as war. These we or our children will have to attack, just as our forefathers attacked the problem of political liberty in 1776. How soon some of those questions will compel practical solution we do not know. Their actual consideration is upon us now. But whether sooner or later, "the times that try men's souls" will come again. Great crises in history, however, have never failed to raise up great men for their mastery. In these contests America's sons will give their brain's best thought and their heart's best love. In their discussion they will turn in gratitude to the spirit of their fathers as we do today, to thank them for their reliance on Providence and their faith in themselves and in humanity. Then will each detail of the history of the Declaration of Independence and the revolution stand out in clear relief in the mind of the nation. Stronger and stronger will those heroic events loom forth as a background. As our history advances, little by little will all intervening events and scenes grow dim and fade. "Marching through Georgia," the tree at Appomatox, the Rough Riders' regiment at San Juan Hill will be forgotten; but Warren at Bunker Hill, the minutemen at Lexington, Mollie Stark at Bennington, Washington at Valley Forge and crossing the Delaware, will live forever.

We bow today in presence of the heroic spirit of those sublime events. We love the characters, we glory in the traditions, we admire the faith and the courage, we cherish the inspiration in the names of Hancock and Sam Adams and Henry and Lee, of Franklin and Jefferson and Washington—names of our immortals! To you, across the gulf of the dying years, we send careering the message of a gratitude and a love that will live, and will not die—

"Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars grow old,
And the leaves of the Judgment Book unfold."

Bacon—Did you ever try to lose a cat? Egbert—Oh, yes. I hit upon a plan which I thought would work. I wrote a note inclosing $10, and tied both about the cat's neck. The note read: "Finder may keep both the cat and the money." "And how did it work?" "The cat came back the next day, with another note tied to its neck. The note read: 'Don't need the cat, but can use the money. Please send $10 more.'"—Yonkers Statesman.

Will the sinner who is trying to get religion by borrowing the ecclesiastical sign from the front porch of the Unitarian church please return it to the Rev. R. S. Loring as soon as it works his conversion so that some other kleptomaniac may have a chance to associate with a good thing for the saving of his soul? —Iowa City Iowan.

"WE HOLD THEE SAFE"

Total Assets
Over Ninety-one
Million Dollars

Exclusively Fire
Funds Thirty-nine
Million Dollars

The World's Greatest Fire Insurance Company

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.

OF AMERICA

TOTAL ASSETS NEARLY NINE MILLION DOLLARS
POLICY HOLDERS' SURPLUS OVER FOUR MILLION DOLLARS
Agents In Every City, Town and Village

ROLLA V. WATT, Manager

ROYAL INSURANCE BUILDING

Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco

SHEAR WIT

Knicker—Is his home mortgaged? Bocker—Up to the auto.—New York Sun.

Little Edith was left to watch the baby. Presently she cried in great excitement. "Oh, mamma! Come quick! The baby has unswallowed her milk!"—New York Times.

"What're ye comin' home with your milk pail empty for?" demanded the farmer. "Didn't th' old cow give anything?" "Yep," replied his chore boy; "nine-quarts and one kick."—Metropolitan Magazine.

Yeast—I see there is a new brand of whisky on the market called Reading and the makers are offering a prize for a motto or slogan to advertise it. Crimsonbeak—Why not suggest, "Reading makes a full man"?—Yonkers Statesman.

"There's a fellow out in Chicago who has written a book to prove that a college education ruins a man's career." "He's an ass. Why, many of the best ball players we have were signed right out of college."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

When Wilberforce was a candidate for Hull his sister helped him electioneer. "Miss Wilberforce forever!" once shouted an enthusiastic crowd. "Oh, no, gentlemen," she replied smiling. "It is very good of you, but I really do not wish to be 'Miss Wilberforce' forever!"—Exchange.

Elsie, who is the youngest of the family, was entertaining me the other day. During the conversation she said, "All the folks who come to our house are so much older than I am." Giving a little sigh, she continued, "There seems to be awfully few people seven years old nowadays."—Hartford Post.

"The colored barber had only been in Springfield, Illinois, a few months when there was trouble between colored and white rowdies, and the so-called Springfield race riots broke out. After they were over a customer entered the colored barber's shop and found him packing in haste. Asked why, the barber said: 'Thar's too much lynching going on around hyar, I'm gwine back to Atlanta.' 'But,' said the customer, 'there's been race riots and lynchings worse than this in Atlanta.' 'I knows dat,' said the colored man solemnly, 'but if I's lynched hyar I won't know who's done it, but if I's lynched in Atlanta I'll know it's bein' done by my friends.'"—New York World.

In illustration of the futility of any person's being a democrat, President Taft is fond of telling this story as it was told to him by an Irish judge. A prisoner was brought before the judge on the charge of murder. He was convicted, but the jury recommended clemency because physicians who had gone on the stand testified that the murdered man would not have died from the blow he had received had he not had what is technically known as a "paper skull," this meaning that the skull was abnormally thin. The judge pointed this out to the prisoner and asked him if he had anything to say to modify his punishment. "Judge," said the convicted man, "this is Tipperary?" "Yes," said the Judge, "the county of Tipperary." "Well, your honor," concluded the prisoner, "all I can say is I wish you would tell me what business a man with a paper skull has got in Tipperary."—Popular Magazine.

SPECIAL MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS. NOTICE TO THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, duly held on the 1st day of July, 1910, at the office of said corporation in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for and will be held at the office of said corporation in the Foxcroft Building, Number 68 Post Street, in said City and County of San Francisco (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet), on Monday, the 12th day of September, 1910, at 2:00 o'clock, in the afternoon of that day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition of increasing the capital stock of said corporation from Seventy-five Thousand ($75,000.00) Dollars, divided into Fifteen Hundred (1500) shares of the par value of Fifty ($50.00) Dollars each, to Three Hundred Thousand ($300,000.00) Dollars, divided into Six Thousand (6,000) shares of the par value of Fifty ($50.00) Dollars each.

The amount of increase proposed in the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Twenty-five Thousand ($225,000.00) Dollars.

NOTICE IS FURTHER GIVEN that at the same time and place there will be submitted to said stockholders meeting the matter of increasing the number of Directors of said corporation from Three members to Five or more members to thereafter constitute its Board of Directors, and to elect such additional directors.

AND NOTICE IS FURTHER GIVEN that at the same time and place, there will be submitted to said Stockholders meeting the matter of repealing By-Laws, amending By-Laws, and adopting new By-Laws, and that said meeting is called for the purpose of considering and acting upon all of the propositions and matters hereinabove named and such other business as may properly come before such stockholders meeting.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Dated July 1st, 1910.

RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY.

By R. C. Shaw, President.

By L. W. McGlaulin, Secretary.

7-8-10t

NOTICE REDUCTION OF CAPITAL STOCK

A Special Meeting of the Stockholders of the PARKIN-HOWARD COMPANY will be held at the office of the Company, Room 1006 Metropolitan Bank Building, Market Street, San Francisco, on Thursday, September 15, 1910, at the hour of 12:30 P. M., for the purpose of diminishing the Capital Stock of the Corporation from 50,000 shares to 10,000 shares.

PARKIN-HOWARD COMPANY.

By John Parkin, Secretary.

7-8-10t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of JAMES CORCORAN, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, M. J. Hynes, Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of the Administrator, Room 858, Phelan Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

M. J. HYNES,

Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, June 30, 1910.

CULLINAN & HICKEY, Attorneys for Administrator.

ORPHAN NOTICE

THE BOYS AND GIRLS AID SOCIETY
The following have been received since the publication of the last notice:

Whole Orphans		Years	Months
Halstead, Andrew	14	10
Chrisholm, Louis	12	10
Half Orphans
Scofield, Olin	10	7
Reno, Willie	12	6
Reno, Peter	13	6
McGuire, Ignatius	11	7

7-8-4t

DIVIDEND NOTICE

FRENCH-AMERICAN BANK OF SAVINGS (savings department), formerly French Savings Bank, 108 Sutter street.—For the half year ending June 30, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1, 1910. Dividends not called for are added to and bear the same rate of interest as the principal from July 1, 1910.

A. LEGALLET, President.

7-1-2t

ANNUAL MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS

The regular annual meeting of the stockholders of NEPTUNE DREDGING COMPANY will be held at the office of the Company, Number 237 First street, between Howard and Folsom streets, in the City of San Francisco, State of California, on MONDAY, the 18th day of July, 1910, at two o'clock p. m., for the purpose of electing a board of directors to serve for the ensuing year, and for the consideration and transaction of any and all other business that may be brought before the meeting.

By order of the Board of Directors.

J. S. SPILMAN, Secretary.

7-1-2t

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

THE SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY (Member Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco), 101 Montgomery street, corner Sutter street.—For the half year ending June 30th, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1st, 1910.

Dividends not drawn become part of deposit accounts and earn dividends from July 1st.

Money deposited on or before July 11th will earn interest from July 1st.

WM. A. BOSTON, Cashier.

7-1-2t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF GEORGE CHILDS, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administrator, at the office of W. H. Payson, room 1700, Claus Spreckels Building, southeast corner Market and Third streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

RUFUS H. CHILDS,

Administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, June 10, 1910.

W. H. PAYSON, attorney for estate.

6-10 5t

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 1.

Action No. 21780.

ADOLPH ZEIS, as Administrator of the Estate) of AUGUSTE ZEIS, deceased, Plaintiff,

vs.

ALL persons claiming any interest in, or lien) upon, the real property described herein, or) any part thereof, Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of plaintiff filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Green street, distant one hundred and thirteen and nine-twelfths (113 9-12) feet westerly from the westerly line of Mason street, running thence westerly along said line of Green street twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23 9-12) feet, thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68 9-12) feet, thence at right angles easterly twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23 9-12) feet, and thence at right angles southerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68 9-12) feet to the place of beginning. Together with the improvements thereon and the appurtenances thereunto belonging.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 8th day of June, A. D. 1910.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By JAS P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

CAREY HOWARD, Attorney for Plaintiff.

NOTICE OF ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE OF THE REAL ESTATE AT PUBLIC SALE.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

* In the Matter of the Estate of JAMES BOLE, deceased.

No. 5905 New Series.

Notice is hereby given that under and pursuant to an order of sale of real estate duly given and made by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 9th day of June, 1910, in the matter of the estate of James Bole, deceased, the undersigned, David C. Bole, administrator of the estate of said deceased, will sell at public auction to the highest bidders, subject to the confirmation of said court, all the right, title, interest and estate of said James Bole, deceased, at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the estate of said deceased has acquired by operation of law or otherwise, other than or in addition to that of the deceased at the time of his death, in or to

All those certain lots of land situate near the Town of Colma, in San Mateo County, State of California, to-wit: Lots 48, 62, 64, 65, 66 and 67, as the same are delineated and so designated on that certain map marked "Map of the Property of the Villa Homestead Association, situated in San Mateo County Township 3 South, Range 5 West, surveyed September, 1872, George W. Doherty, Surveyor," which said map is on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said County of San Mateo in Book 4 of Miscellaneous Records at page 421.

Also all those certain lots of land situate in the said City and County of San Francisco, described as follows, to-wit:

1. Commencing at a point on the Northern line of Lobos Street, distant thereon 550 feet Easterly from the Eastern line of Plymouth Avenue, running thence Easterly along said Northern line of Lobos Street, 150 feet, thence at right angles Northern 125 feet, thence at right angles Westerly 150 feet, thence at right angles Southerly 125 feet to the point of commencement, the same being three lots, each with 50 feet frontage in Block "Q" as per map of Railroad Homestead Association on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco.

2. Lot 9 in Block 40, and Lot 3 in Block 41, as the said lots and block are delineated and so designated on that certain map known as the Map of Sunny Vale Homestead Association on file and of record in the office of the County Recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco.

That said real property situate in the said County of San Mateo will be sold in one parcel, and that said real property situate in the City and County of San Francisco will be sold either in one parcel or in subdivisions, as shall appear to the said administrator from the bids at the sale to be most advantageous to the estate.

That said sale will be made on Monday, the 11th day of July, 1910, at 11 o'clock a. m. of that day, at the street entrance to the Grant Building on the South-eastern corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco.

That the terms and conditions of sale are cash in Gold Coin of the United States, ten per cent of the purchase money to be paid to the said administrator on day of sale, and the balance thereof on confirmation of the sale by said court and the delivery of a conveyance. Deeds at expense of purchasers.

Dated June 10, 1910.

DAVID C. BOLE,

Administrator of the Estate of James Bole, deceased.
EDGAR M. WILSON and POWELL & DOW, Attorneys for Administrator, Mills Building, San Francisco.

6-14 4t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Surveyor General

California was once a very large land owner. It is not so large an owner now, and yet it may still possess something like a half million acres, a good deal of it standing on edge in inaccessible prices. The best of its domain is gone into private ownership.

This is how it came to be a landowner: By act of congress, passed as long ago as 1841, California came into possession, when it became a state, of 500,000 acres of public lands; by another act passed in September, 1850, all the swamp lands in the state were ceded to the state by the national government, on condition that they be reclaimed and made fit for cultivation; by act of March 3, 1853, ten sections of land were given the state that the proceeds might be used for erecting public buildings, and seventy-two sections, or 46,080 acres, for the establishment of a seminary of learning. Finally, there was given to the state the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township in the state to be used for the support of the public schools. These several grants made a very large aggregate acreage, but just how large the writer does not know.

Now the Surveyor General is made ex-officio Register of the state land office and that office has had in its charge the disposal of all of these lands. The methods of disposal are quite intricate and not necessary to be explained for the purposes of this article. In a general way it may be said that school lands are sold to the highest bidder and that auctions are held at the land office in Sacramento on the first Mondays in January, March, May, July, September and November, although this is a new arrangement which went into operation as late as 1909, very much to the advantage of the state treasury.

The state's swamp and overflowed lands have been sold at the uniform price of one dollar per acre, in installments of one-fifth cash, conditioned that when the lands sold have been fully reclaimed the purchase price shall be returned to the owner and he be given the lands for the service of having restored them to cultivation. This was a very generous arrangement on the part of the state, so generous that it would seem that no one would be prompted to commit a fraud upon the state in order to get the lands without reclaiming them, but in truth a large part of the state's swamp lands have gone into private ownership for nothing and still are subject to overflow and have not been reclaimed in any proper sense.

California's land laws have until recently been made with a view to depriving the state of its lands for a fraction of what they were worth, without giving actual settlers the advantage of the state's generosity. These land laws were often conceived and put through the legislature by and in the interests of speculators in league with one or more persons within the land office itself. These are hard things to say of an important branch of public business, but by common notoriety they are known to be true. Not until the legislative session of 1909, and then only after a hard contest, were our land laws shaped in the interests of the state and the actual settler instead of in the interests of land sharks and speculators.

Nevertheless, the state has received a tidy sum from the sale of its school lands and they are not all sold yet. During the fiscal year just closed (it ends on the 30th of June) the state has had invested in interest-bearing bonds, as proceeds of its sales of school lands, $6,432,225, which yielded an income of $314,805, distributed to the counties of the state for the benefit of the public schools. Besides this the state has in the treasury $225,000 of school land moneys not yet invested in bonds.

But what a huge sum would the state have had at interest if all its school lands had been sold to the highest bidder or, better still, if the state had not parted at all with the title in fee, but had leased the lands for ninety-nine years, with right of inheritance or transfer of lease, at a fair rental, in tracts suitable for homes. The income from those lands handled in that way might well have supported the common schools of the state, kept the price of land within reach of real settlers and forestalled that land monopoly that has so retarded the progress of California and made it so difficult for a young man to secure a farm of his own. It is easy now to see that our state and national land policies were all wrong, but it was not so apparent half a century ago.

Apart from his duties as custodian of state lands the law imposes duties upon the Surveyor General that have to do with such things as surveying county boundaries and establishing them, gathering statistics about the state's lands and publishing them and, when the state has been deprived of any of its lands by the creation of a forest reservation or national park, the Surveyor General must supervise the selection of other lands in lieu of those so lost and protect the state's interests in all such transactions.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of MARY GAFFNEY, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administratrix at the law office of Maurice Gradwohl, 81 Pacific Building, corner Front and Market streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased.

ELIZABETH HOLLAND,
Administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, July 7, 1910.
MAURICE GRADWOHL, Attorney at Law, Pacific Building, San Francisco.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander
ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL
ATTORNEYS AT LAW
Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

REAL ESTATE AND INSURANCE

Anything in the real estate line is our business

O. E. HOTLE & CO.

Agents for out-of-town owners; rents collected, etc.

1172 BROADWAY OAKLAND, CAL.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.
TAYLOR BROS. CO.
REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950 OAKLAND
Home A 3950 1236 Broadway

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary . . . $50.00
One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary . . . 65.00
One in Wholesale Firm, salary . . . 50.00
One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

This Week: "THE FRESNO JUNIOR COLLEGE"

—By C. L. McLane

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: JULY 15: '10

FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street: San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH-GOOD COURAGE-GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 34.

What If We Had No Navy?

REV. CHARLES R. BROWN, of Oakland, has just returned from Japan. While there he sought in all ways to ascertain the Japanese war attitude toward the United States. In all instances he found the sentiment to be for peace, sustained by the conviction that Japan is in no condition to fight the United States, and that the strengthening of the Japanese navy is against a time when Russia may be disposed to retry the old issue as to predominance in Manchuria and Korea. All of which shows that the Japanese are a discreet and prudent people. But suppose that the United States had no navy, no trained nucleus for an army, no fortifications and its manhood no "fighting edge"? In view of inevitable issues arising out of the rights of Japanese subjects in American territory what then would be the Japanese war sentiment toward the United States?

But Suppose They Don't?

IN AN INTERVIEW AT OYSTER BAY Colonel Roosevelt declared that he wished to meet regulars as well as insurgents, Democrats as well as Republicans. "But you do not wish to see the Democrats win, do you?" he was asked? "No," was his reply, "not if the Republicans do the Right Thing." But suppose they don't do the Right Thing, then what? Is there any question that the Colonel would say, "Out with 'em, by George 'em?" The Right Thing is The Thing now as never before in the history of this country. Party fealty counts for little against it.

Not Drastic

COMMISSIONER FRANKLIN K. LANE, at an international railway congress in Switzerland, has assured investors that the new American railway regulation law is not at all drastic. Chairman Knapp has given Wall street to understand that the law will not be drastically enforced. How much is to be hoped for from a non-drastic law non-drastically enforced is, to say the least, problematical and verging upon the disappointing. In whom have the people reposed a discretionary power to enforce or not to enforce the law?

Farmers On Strike

HERETOFORE THE FARMERS of America have shipped abroad enough of surplus products to pay all the bills of the globe trotters and leave a comfortable balance to discharge the interest obligations of the borrowing corporations. This year the farmers are on strike. At least, they are not sending abroad enough of surplus products to replace the "chink" scattered over Europe by American pleasure seekers, let alone paying interest obligations and buying articles of vertu. There is nothing to be done about it. If the American farmer won't he won't, and that's the end on't.

Uphold the Faith

AT THE RATE OF A MILLION A YEAR or more, people have been coming to our shores to whom Lexington means nothing and Bunker Hill no more; people who have not the faintest concept of the "spirit of '76," and to whom Appomattox is as meaningless as "squibblum." These all came here merely to better their condition. Is it any wonder that they fall easy victims to the arguments of those whose only concern is that business shall thrive? Those to the manor born shall lose no opportunity to uphold the political faiths of the fathers before the eyes of these stranger peoples that they also may rate manhood first and property second. Hold high the ideal of the higher law and the greater good. This is the burden of the sons and daughters of The Revolution.

Too Quick to Condemn

IT MAY BE THAT THE BANKS of San Francisco refuse to bid for the four-and-a-half per cent utility bonds of San Francisco because of a concerted desire to nip the municipal ownership impulse at the start, but let us be not too quick to jump to that conclusion. Our financial recovery from the panic of 1907 has long passed the stage when bonds are sought in preference to sound industrials that pay twice or thrice the income. This is a sign of health, not disease, and, besides, we are borrowing money of Europe to go to Europe on. The quality of the city administration that is to spend the bond money counts for something, too, and against, not for the bonds. Our banks are not sinners above others and, the country over, financial institutions are much straitened to meet the demands of a speculative mania, mainly in Middle Western farms. Our banks are entitled to the benefit of our doubts.

Is Satan Sick?

THIS RAIDING OF GAMBLING CLUBS, organized behind barred doors that they might be "within the law," disturbs the equanimity of the city and causes the reason to reel. Is Satan ill that he a saint would be? Are there those who are not "coming through" in a style befitting their station, or is a diversion being made to serve as palliative for the moral sense that the retreat from prosecution of graft may be made in good order? What will become of our promised "Paris of America" if such things continue? That they can be the result of a moral regeneration staggers credulity.

Will See To Them

IF THE LIBERAL BRITISH GOVERNMENT does not confer parliamentary suffrage upon land-owning women those women will see to that government. They have given fair warning of foul action. Windows will be smashed, parliament besieged and Honorable Gentlemen, representative of the government's inaction, will scarcely dare to venture out of doors or stay inside. Honestly, what would we American husbands do if our wives and sisters behaved that way? Why, we'd let them vote, of course, and our British cousins will have to. With so little open country to escape to what else can those poor men do?

All Of Them

A COMMISSION, EMPOWERED BY CONGRESS so to do, is charged with the duty of designating what postoffices shall be postal savings banks. The answer should be "all of them." If not, then all money order offices anyhow. The deposits will be mainly offered in congested foreign sections of big cities, and, again, in those outlying postoffices where there are no banks, and stockings in chimney flues, or knotted handkerchiefs in mattresses, are the family financial depositaries. Here are where the gleanings are and it is only that these may be fetched into activity that the postal savings system finds justification.

Fish or Cut Bait

It should be evident to our irresolute Uncle Sam that, whether Germany has or has not meddled with Nicaragua, he must soon reach a point where he must either "fish or cut bait," to use a form of expression inelegant but expressive. Either the South American and Central American states are under his sphere of influence or they are not. Either these countries are responsible to the United States before they are to the states of Europe or they are not. Either the United States is responsible for them to the countries of Europe or it is not. It were well for this country, well for the countries of South America and Central America, well for the world, to have this issue settled.

But this country is not going to be allowed to stand between the nations of Europe and the nations of this continent without being responsible to the one and for the other. It is not going to be permitted to protect the Latin-American states in a status of irreconcilable irresponsibility to God and man, to other nations and to their own people. Those nations that cannot, or will not, govern themselves must be governed by others. If this nation does not assume responsibility for such peoples some other nation will and must, for civilization abhors anarchy as nature abhors a vacuum.

Of South America this country would better wash its hands than fight to hold Europe at bay, but, down as far as the big ditch, we have, to speak with diplomatic forbearance, "particular interests" which Europe should recognize and the United States should conserve.

The situation suggested by the German false alarm would be interesting rather than critical. It should at least serve to bring the American People to a realization of their responsibilities toward the helpless and the downtrodden of our own continent. Our safety will not permit any extension of European influence in Central America, in Mexico or in the West Indies, and neither can the interests of the civilized world be sacrificed to the ambitious whims of Latin-American adventurers. We acquitted ourselves admirably in the Philippines and in Cuba, and we can do as well in Nicaragua and Guatemala, in Salvador and Coast Rica or Honduras.

It is time for our Uncle Samuel to speak his mind to Europe and to act a man's part in Nicaragua. To do so now will save worlds of trouble by and by.

Whether or not the Pan-American conference can do anything to afford stability and responsibility to Latin-American states is doubtful, Germany itself is held together by the certainty that any state in the empire, proving refractory, would be trounced out of its trousers. There are some powerful states growing up in South America. They should constitute the United States of South America and so relieve the United States of North America of all responsibility for the continent to the South. As for the continent of North America, this is our oyster from the north pole to the big ditch.

Johnson Standardized

The predicament of the Republican State Central Committee is unenviable. In undertaking to place Hiram Johnson outside the pale of Republicanism it has placed Anderson and Curry outside, and they must get in the best way they can. In undertaking to "standardize" Johnson, after the old style of extracting a promise to support the ticket whatever it may be, the committee has caused the forging of a standard of Republicanism with which Anderson and Curry, at least, will find it difficult to standardize themselves. That test is their willingness to kick the Political

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company out of the councils of the Republican party. Any candidate who will honestly and squarely pledge himself to do that, will, if nominated August 16th, receive the cordial support of Hiram W. Johnson. Any candidate who will not take such a pledge cannot standardize himself with that progressive Republicanism that is coming to the fore in all parts of the Union.

Mr. Anderson cannot so standardize himself because he is on record as having declared that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company is a myth, a declaration so absurd as to bring into question either Mr. Anderson's sanity or his political straightforwardness. His sanity is not a subject for doubt.

Mr. Curry cannot standardize himself by this test, for no one would take him at his word if he did. His political connection with the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company is of too long standing to admit of its being denied, and he has been the recipient of so many favors from it that it would brand him as an ingrate were he to break with it.

Mr. Stanton's spoken word qualifies him for accepting the Johnson test, but, unfortunately for him, his performance during the 1909 session of the legislature scarcely gives his mouth leave to speak.

The Johnson test is the true test of the Republicanism of California and any candidate who cannot standardize himself by that test will not receive the suffrages of self-respecting, patriotic Republicans.

And Mr. Johnson has as good a right to prescribe his test for the standardization of the other Republican candidates as had the alleged Republican State Central Committee, for, be it known, the Republican State Central Committee is in effect the executive committee thereof, and that executive committee is, and for nearly twenty years has been, named by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. The idea of that bureau prescribing tests of Republicanism is grotesque.

Business

Business is said to be doing a little quiet liquidating and furling of sails in fear of a squall. This has reference only to speculative business, not real business. The difference is not only fundamental but broad. Speculative business adds not one ton of food or yard of cloth to the store that must feed and clothe the world. It only seeks to reap where others sow. It is gambling. Real business, that business which has to do with supplying commodities and transporting them from where they are to where they are wanted, has seldom been more healthy and hopeful than it is now, and if speculative business will let it alone, it will remain both healthy and hopeful.

How speculative business comes by its opportunity is made clear by considering the highest and lowest points reached by a line of twenty leading stocks chiefly dealt in on Wall street. At the lowest point during 1907 these shares reached an average of $81.41 per share of the par value of $100. At the highest point during 1909 these same shares reached an average of $134.46, an advance of $53.05 per share. On July 1, these same shares averaged $113, a drop of $21.46. Inasmuch as the New York banks will carry seventy per cent of the market value of all these shares, and the brokers ten per cent more, it requires no great amount of capital for a speculator to gamble on the going up or down of large blocks of those shares, but the lending by the banks to the gamblers creates a veritable vortex for the moveable cash of the country to the great detriment of legitimate enterprise. That is where California's banking reserves were in 1907 when they were so much needed at home, and, probably, where they are now.

The Junior College

It is evident that something must be done to relieve our two big universities of the pressure of numbers. It is not possible to instruct so many and yet maintain a corps of instructors of sufficiently high character to constitute a real institution of learning. The best that any university graduate will ever gain from a college course will flow from having come into contact with first-class minds and first-class minds are not to be had for the pittance the state can afford to pay instructors. The elevation of high schools here and there, at principal trading points, into junior colleges, providing adequately for freshman and sophomore years, may solve the problem. If there are communities other than Fresno having such a plan in view, our "backbone" article for the week will tell them how to go about the work of establishing a junior college. In matters educational there has been no community more ready to lead, or better qualified for the task, than Fresno. What forty such colleges scattered over the state might do for higher education, and for the relief of our universities, is almost beyond calculation. This experiment will repay careful watching.

The Business Point of View

The divorce laws of Nevada are a reproach to the nation and a benefit only to Reno. There are perhaps three hundred candidates for divorce in Reno all the time. They spend an average of at least $1,000 each during the half year needful for acquiring citizenship and freedom from matrimonial bonds. That means $300,000 half-yearly, or $600,000 a year rung up by the cash registers of Reno, but the consensus of opinion is that it comes nearer to being a round million. There is talk of reforming the divorce laws of Nevada. Business interests in Reno are reported to be against it. It would cut off this revenue. It would hurt business. It counts for nothing in Reno that Nevada makes marriage a mockery; that it makes unclear that which should be holy; that it makes Reno anathema throughout the nation. If it pays that settles it. To what deeper degradation can the love of money bring any community or people? Harboring prize fighting is venial by comparison.

The Tariff Squall

The "organization" pack, from the San Francisco Chronicle down to the Placerville Nugget, are striving to make it appear that if Hiram Johnson should be nominated and elected governor, supported by a staff of state officers who are free men, congress must certainly repeal the Payne-Aldrich tariff and reenact something like the Wilson bill of a decade and a half ago. To all of which, bosh! The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League stand with the President except as to one point: League opinion probably is that the President would have done better to veto the tariff bill, and so force congress to revise the woolen and the cotton schedules, and take the jokers out of the steel provision. But that all relates to the past. As to the future the President, the League and the Republican congress all agree that tariff schedules should be framed after exhaustive research showing the difference in cost of production at home and abroad and not otherwise. Those researches have not been made, and there can be no revising the tariff until they shall have been made. A tariff board has been constituted by congress and the President, in conformity with the progressive Republican view, to make the needful investigations. There the issue will rest until that board makes report covering some one schedule, probably the woolen. When it reports it will report that which is true and that which is true neither the citrus industry in California, nor any other, has cause to fear. With the President, Congress and the League standing together, what grounds have the "organization" claqueurs for making complaint? If Progressive Republicanism has its way the tariff will be revised schedule by schedule, session by session, in conformity with ascertained facts and not all at once by log-rolling. On this issue the President and the League are agreed, and the President is reckoned a pretty fair Republican.

They That Do Fly

Only seventeen killed so far in seeking to prove that men may go up to the air as well as down to the sea in ships! The development of our railroads cost many times more lives. While the airship is slaying its thousands the automobile will slay its ten thousands. Experimentation will probably not be deterred through fear of death, but it need surprise no one if insurance companies are slow in assuming aviation risks. The materials out of which aeroplanes and dirigible balloons are as yet constructed are so light and flimsy, and the heavy engines carried must place so much strain upon the mechanism, that the imagination that sees regular lines of aerial transportation established in competition with railroads and steamships savors of delirium. As an engine of warfare aerial navigation will have a place, perhaps so important as to advance the cause of universal peace, but not in commerce and industry, until airships are made of materials less subject to hazard than the stuff that pocket handkerchiefs are made of.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Ticket

Unlike a general election, there will be no party circles, party columns or other devices whereby the voter at the primary election can tell whether he is voting for the "organization" candidates or for the candidates of the Lincoln-Roosevelt wing of the Republican party. Each voter will have to inform himself as to who is who, and charge his mind with the list or run the risk of voting for Herrin men when he would vote for free men. If Mr. Johnson goes into office he will need a progressive Republican legislature, and a staff of progressive Republican state officials back of him to support him and help to make his administration a success. On the other hand, if Republicans of California desire to continue to be governed by and through the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company they will be wise to throw the whole responsibility of government upon that bureau and give Mr. Anderson or Mr. Curry a legislature of "organization" men and a staff of "organization" state officers, lest the benevolent and patriotic Mr. Herrin be thwarted in some of his beneficent purposes for the well-being of the state and the people thereof. That the voters who see The California Weekly may know upon whom the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League are relying to sustain Mr. Johnson, if nominated and elected, the League state ticket will be found elsewhere in this paper. The voter should learn it by heart, that he may not unwittingly vote for the wrong kind of man.

Constitutions For the New States

Arizona and New Mexico have an opportunity to perform a great service for the other states in the Union by making their state constitutions more as state constitutions should be than as they are. It has proven most unfortunate that the constitutions of the first states were modeled after the charters of the old colonies rather than after the constitution of the United States, for the newer states followed the example of the older and copied mistakes more readily than improvements. Our national scheme of government, especially so far as the executive is concerned, furnishes a much better model than any state constitution offers. Our national ballot is short and our state ballots should be shortened by leaving off attorney general, surveyor general, superintendent of public instruction, clerk of the supreme court, perhaps secretary of state, and allowing the governor to appoint those officers and constitute them, in part at least, his cabinet or council, the remaining membership of that council or cabinet to be made of a superintendent of prisons and reformatories, a superintendent of state hospitals, a commissioner of agriculture, a state engineer, an overseer of public health and, possibly, other departments with bureaus under them, all responsible to the executive and the executive to the people. If New Mexico and Arizona are wise they will take thought along these lines and make constitutions that will be models for other states rather than accept the constitutions of other states as models for themselves.

McKinlay and Kent

Duncan McKinlay has challenged William Kent to debate the issues of the day before the Republican voters of the second congressional district. These two men do not belong to the same class. McKinlay is an orator, Kent is an essayist. McKinlay addresses himself to the emotions of men, Kent's appeal is to the intellect and the understanding. McKinlay has acquired an admirable facility for delivering sounding phrases and is in great demand as a stumper of congressional districts, like his own, wherein standpatters are in deep waters. Mr. Kent pushes one of the most trenchant pens in America. Mr. McKinlay is superficial in all things, Mr. Kent is a student and thinker. Mr. McKinlay has risen by the aid of those special interests that have controlled the political destinies of California for a generation. For something like a generation Mr. Kent has fought special interests wherever he has found them entrenched, although in order to do so he has had to "go back on his class," an offense which the higher-ups here and elsewhere hold to be unforgivable. In a forensic slugging match, pulled off before a gaping crowd, Mr. Kent might appear to as great a disadvantage as Mr. McKinlay would in a discussion with Mr. Kent through the columns of The California Weekly. They are both good mixers and good citizens and fine representatives, the one of the order of "organization" methods, the other of government by the free suffrages of free men. After all the issue in the second district is not so much between the men, both good in their respective offices, as between what they stand for, corporation control or government by The People. Judged by that test Duncan McKinlay limps while William Kent is unapproachable.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

They say that Old Gentleman Bradbury has come out of San Quentin prison in many respects a changed man. He is rather a spectacular figure, such events have a news value to the daily press, are susceptible of being "played up," and one cannot know how much credence to place in them. Anyhow, it is a matter chiefly between Old Gentleman Bradbury and the God who made him, and not to be inquired into too curiously by the gaping crowd. The point the writer wishes to make is that there is nothing inherently improbable in the report.

Ever since the Prodigal Son "came to himself," arose and went to his father's house, with no other thought than to be a servant in it, men by the millions, in all lands and of all ages from callow youth to three-score-and-ten, have been doing the same thing. It is a good thing to do.

And yet the chances are that the sort of man a man has been up to fifty he will continue to be, only more so, to the end of his days. The time to come to one's self is in early youth, if one can, and not wait until some tragedy, some awful disaster, some irremediable disgrace, some experience of being "hair hung and breeze shaken" over the abyss, brings one to himself. Those who wait for such a crisis to turn them about may wait in vain. The chances are all against them. The ordinary life is, so far as supreme crises go, uneventful. As they start, not alone the average man, but almost the ninety and nine, slide right on into eternity without a hitch.

Nor do these great crises, when they come, if come they do, invariably turn one face about and cause him to come to himself, that is, his better self, that self that was possible from the first, but grew more improbable as the years went by. The chances were more than even that Bradbury would come out of prison soul-embittered, rather than mellowed by his experience, that he would come forth a hater of his kind, feeling that the hand of every man is against him and that he would return buffet for buffet, blow for blow, as long as he could raise the hand to strike, as long as a shrewd and cunning brain could plan to die with accounts squared, not by erasing the whole score, but by exacting an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth until as much evil has been inflicted as has been endured. No, the chances were more than even that Bradbury's term of imprisonment would not prove a help to him in coming to that self that, away back in Maine, more than half a century ago, gave promise of strength and usefulness, of prosperity and sound citizenship. If it has proven such a help his fortunate star did not forsake him even when penned in by prison walls and sheltered by a prison roof.

But let us nevertheless not despair of the law as an instrument of grace. There are thousands whose first intimation that there is a "power, not of ourselves, that makes for righteousness," came when they felt the grip of the law upon the shoulder, a law that said to its transgressor: "Here, what is the matter with you? Do you feel that you are the only person in the world that you should consult the pleasure of no one except yourself? Look to yourself."

Being brought up with a short turn, just once, has brought many a vagrant wanderer to a realizing sense of his place in the social and moral order which makes life buoyantly worth while if it be preserved, but a bitterness and sorrow if that order be disturbed. We need laws to reach out the hand of authority when men get to going radically and headstrongly wrong, not in a spirit of retribution, but in a spirit of calm and reasonable justice that ever inclines to mercy, but never to weakness and sentimentalism. It is not every offense against the laws that should be punished with a brand of public infamy, but to let offenders off without at least the law's grip upon the shoulder is a wrong to the offender as certainly as to society.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Home To Their Promised Land

It required many generations of oppression, persecution and almost unceasing warfare to drive the Jews from their Promised Land, but the cruel work went steadily on until, in 1827, Sir Moses Montefiore estimated that hardly 500 Jews remained in all Palestine. Now, however, the work of re-peopling Palestine with its own people is on in earnest, and, although scarcely more than two generations have elapsed since the estimate by Sir Moses, the Holy Land again is largely populated by Jews. In the city of Jerusalem and its immediate vicinity there now are not less than 50,000 of these people, or, say, 100 times as many as there were in all of Palestine some eighty years ago. But this home-returning is by no means confined to Jerusalem. Throughout Galilee and Judea the decayed cities and towns whose names are familiar to Bible-readers are throbbing with a new life, and it is Jews, and almost Jews only, who have given to them this new life. After their long generations of wandering, the "chosen people" are returning to their one-time home, and again it will become "a land flowing with milk and honey." Withal, this homing people have resurrected their dead language, and again they are speaking the Hebrew of Moses, David and Solomon. Persecution in Russia has had much to do with this peopling of Palestine by Jews, and they, themselves, hold that it is fulfilment of prophecy.

Where the Atmosphere Is Coldest

There long has been entertained a theory that the coldness of the atmosphere constantly increases as distance from the earth grows greater. The observations of mountain-climbers had appeared to give credit to this theory, but scientific investigation by means of sounding balloons finally has discredited it. These balloons—each of which is made of rubber and is two or three feet in diameter—are fitted with thermometers, by means of which the temperature at any altitude may be ascertained. By them it is shown that the lowest temperature, in the temperate zone, is attained at a height somewhat less than seven miles above the sea level. Then comes what is termed the stratosphere, a great isothermal layer in which the temperature is somewhat warmer and is fairly constant as far as man's investigations have extended. That the stratosphere, although warmer than the layer of atmosphere immediately below it, is not at all torrid is indicated by the fact that its temperature nearly above the equator has been found to be 119.7 below zero, Fahrenheit. It is a rather curious fact that the altitude of the stratosphere varies inversely to the warmth of the earth's surface. That is, it is found higher above the sea level in the torrid than in the frigid regions.

Read This, And Know When You Are Safe

The French Academy of Medicine has been investigating the nature of the coloring matter which is introduced into foods, with the object of ascertaining what is, and what is not, harmful. After long and laborious effort, it has reported to the Ministry of the Interior the names of such coloring ingredients as are harmless, and as this is a matter of immense importance to all people who regard their health, and there are several such people, we hasten to give the list, in all its native French beauty, to our readers. Here it is:

"Chlorhydrate de l'amidotetramethylparadiamidophenilmethanol. Diethylidibenzylparaminotriphenylcarbinoltri-sulfonate de sodium. Tetramethyldiparamidometaoxytriphenylcarbinoldisulfonate de calcium. Dimethylaminodiethylidibenzylaminotriphenylcarbinoldisulfonate de sodium." It is not insisted that anyone need pronounce the above words in order to be safe. All one need do is to paste the list in one's hat, show it to the grocer, and ask him to guarantee that his goods have no other coloring matter in them.

Our Plethora of Physicians

Whatever other crop may know a shortage, there is no failure in the output of physicians. Medical colleges continue to grind out their grist, and there is no season when they add nothing to the world's stock of doctors. There are doctors of any pathies, some pathies, all pathies or no pathy, and still the mill grinds on. The writer does not know how many physicians there now are in San Francisco, for instance, but if the city has its share there should be no less than 700, for the proportion throughout the United States is one physician to every 568 inhabitants. Why continue sick and disabled when there probably is a doctor in the next block, if not closer at hand? America expects every man to do his duty and see that the medical colleges do not labor in vain. We have twice as many physicians, in proportion to population, as has England, four times as many as France, five times as many as Germany. Lawyers here are said to outnumber the physicians, but they are generously permitted to make laws insuring the good health of litigation, and the physicians labor under the handicap of having far less similar opportunity; they have to struggle along with only a modicum of legislative aid. We are not lacking in quantity of healers; as to quality, everybody has the privilege of making his own selection.

Where Our Shoes Are Made

A large proportion of the shoes worn in this country, not to mention a vast number that are exported, are manufactured in New England, and particularly in Massachusetts. In the latter state alone, in 1908, $42,000,000 was invested in the manufacture of boots, shoes and slippers, and the value of the product that year was about $170,000,000. In Boston there are more than 1200 concerns which either manufacture shoes or shoe machinery or deal in supplies for those who do. In Lynn the greater part of women's footwear is made, in Brockton that for men, while Haverhill makes a specialty of the manufacture of slippers. The output of these three cities alone is in the neighborhood of $133,000,000 annually. Since the close of the civil war, it is estimated, 4,000,000,000 pairs of shoes and slippers have been manufactured in cities and towns of New England, which would be sufficient to supply about 45 pairs apiece to every man, woman and child in this country at the present time. When the latter record was begun a large part of the work was done by hand; now it is almost all executed by machinery.

An Aerial Dash to the Pole

Preparations for the Zeppelin polar expedition already are fairly under way, although it is not expected that this aerial dash for the north pole will take place until 1912. A week or two ago the advance party, consisting of the kaiser's brother, Prince Henry of Prussia, and a number of aeronautic or polar experts, left Kiel for Spitzbergen, in which latter place all the arrangements will be made for the journey to the pole. The object of the expedition will be to reach the pole by means of one of Count Zeppelin's dirigibles, and it may be hoped that the great gas receptacle will act better than have some others of his construction, for a polar iceberg would not equal a Swiss mountain or German valley as a place for a sudden and unexpected descent.

A Wonderful New Metal

A new metal, as yet unnamed, has been discovered, and those who have investigated its qualities prophesy that it will prove of tremendous value, particularly in connection with the construction of aeroplanes. Here are some qualities of the metal, as they are described by the discoverer: It is eleven per cent lighter than aluminum, and is as hard as ordinary steel or wrought iron, neither sulphuric, nitric nor any other acid will affect it; it will not rust and has lain in sea water six weeks without tarnishing it. The metal, which contains an alloy of aluminum, is of the color of silver and never loses its brightness. Strength, lightness and all these qualities combined, it is easy to see that, if the discoverer's claims are justifiable, it will, if reasonably cheap, all but work a revolution in those manufactures wherein strength and lightness are prime requisites.

AN APPEAL TO FREEMEN

Delivered before the Essex Institute of Salem, Mass., by William W. Story, on the 250th anniversary of the landing of Gov. Endicott.

No! Things will never right themselves.
'Tis we must put them right,
Strip for the task, do the good work,
Labor with love unite, fall into line and fight—
While half the honest, wise, and strong
Apart in selfish silence stand,
Hating the vileness and the wrong,
And yet, too careless to uplift their hand
And do the duties that belong to those who would be free.
Let the bright spark of patriotic fire
Your hearts enlist, your warmest zeal inspire—
I call upon you noble men, and true,
High, low, young, old, wherever you may be,
Awake! Arise! cast off this lethargy—
Your ancient faith renew, and set your hearts
To do the tasks which freemen ought to do—
Cleanse the Augean stable of politics
Of its foul muck, of bribes and wiles, and tricks—
Break the base rings where commerce rules and rots,
Purge civic rule of its dark canker spots,—
Drive off the cruel incubus, that squats
Upon our sleeping country, 'till it rise Renewed in strength, with upward looking eyes
And forward goes upon the path to its high destiny—
If any love for liberty you bear, if any pride in this dear state you share,
By all that love and pride, I pray you, swear to set her free,
And make her record honest, white, and fair
in sight of all humanity.

Gov. Jared Y. Saunders of Louisiana, just elected United States senator, will be one of the young members of that body—he is 41 years old.

Union Square Hotel

POST STREET
At Stockton

Best Location in San Francisco; Faces Union Square
and the Victory Monument

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PLANS

Terms Moderate Cuisine Excellent

Take Sutter St. Cars to Stockton St.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES
AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St. San Francisco

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

JESALIE

By Lillian H. S. Bailey

(For the California Weekly)

In home's dear garden beauty-bright,
There blooms a precious flower for me,—
The fairest in God's tender sight,
My winsome little Jesalie!

As leaning lilies light the mere
Where erst the wind-blown showers whirl,
She brings exquisite glowing here,—
My summer-hearted baby girl!

The quiet home, all treasure-strewn,
Soft sounds and beauty everywhere!
I count an oft recurring tune,
I count the curling golden hair.

I touch my kisses to her face
My trembling love to free,
And marvel at high Heaven's grace,—
The perfect gift, my Jesalie.

What is the signet on her brow?
And what the mystery of her eyes?
I only dreamed of life, till now
It wears such grace from Paradise.

And as she sleeps, or on my breast,
The keeping is so sweet to me;
O, faultless flower of love, heart's rest!
My dainty, darling Jesalie!

PUCCINI'S NEW AMERICAN OPERA

Giacomo Puccini, the composer of the opera "Madam Butterfly," is now engaged in the final work upon another opera with an American subject, based upon Belasco's "The Girl of the Golden West," in which Blanche Bates starred successfully. The New York Times, of recent date, adds some interesting facts about Signor Puccini:

Giacomo Puccini likes to be present when any of his works are being performed for the first time. He does not mingle with the audience, he sits somewhere in the wings, far from the sight of the spectators, in a quiet and secluded spot, where, however, he can see how the performance is going on and where he can hear the roar of applause. He was seen the other night at the performances of "Manon Lescaut," smoking cigarettes furiously and very much excited.

"I am quite worn out," he exclaimed, throwing a cigarette stump away and lighting a new one. "I always am the night of a performance. Success or failure, it is all the same—I am just as wrought up."

Just then waves of applause were carried across the footlights.

"Oh, yes, of course I prefer this, but the excitement and worry is quite the same. An audience is always more or less an uncertain quantity—you can never be quite sure of what it will like. As a rule, however, I think that the public likes melody. Operas without melody are often gray and dull, it seems to me. Some parts of Wagner's operas are a strain on Latins, at least, but those parts are made up for by others truly sublime—for Wagner is a genius. But in Strauss you don't have the sublime—you merely have the bizarre. It is cacophonous, to my mind. And I do not think that can last, for to us Latins at least, harmony is one of the essentials in art. Look at Greek art, how full of repose and harmony it is! It seems to me that often the works of modern composers lack all rest and harmony."

"When I compose an opera I think of the public, of course, but first of all I must please myself. I have to have a subject that I can grow enthusiastic over. That is why I have never written a symphony or anything that does not centre around a definite subject. The music should express the actions and feelings of the characters, I think. When I find a subject that grips me I begin to compose, and then I work incessantly. I work best in the evening. I live in the country, near Milan, and I am extremely fond of sports—and I spend my days automobiling, hunting, fishing—as I feel inclined. In the evening I compose. Sometimes for a short time only, other times dawn breaks and I am still at the piano.

"The Girl of the Golden West" will be produced in New York in November. I intend to go to New York then. I was there when "Madam Butterfly" was performed. I never conduct my operas; in fact, I think I am the only composer who has never conducted his own work. I leave that to others, particularly to a man like Toscanini. He is marvelous in his understanding of the composer and the music.

"I saw 'The Girl of the Golden West' as a play when I was in America a few years ago. I was fascinated by it. Well, you know, the strength of the elemental passions, the health and vigor of the characters struck me. 'There is an opera in that,' I thought. And so I set to work. I have been working on it a long time now. I follow the play quite closely, although the third act is somewhat modified. The characters are the same, but I put more soul into them. I develop the psychological part more than in the play—homesickness, pathos, the growing love of the hero and heroine—"

The applause was deafening outside. Toscanini had been dragged on the stage, and there were wild clamors for Puccini. A couple of men came for him.

"If you know how I dislike showing myself," he murmured as he was being taken away. "I love peace and calm and quiet. I hate the noise and clamor." And thus fighting feebly he was brought before the audience.

Mme. Puccini and Signor Puccini, Jr. occupied a box near the stage. It is said, by the way, that Signor Puccini is the best looking composer of the present day.

THE RECKONING

By Will F. Griffin

(For the California Weekly)

You drained the cup to the very bottom,
You took the best that was in your soul
And cast it wild—like wind-blown ashes—
Heedless, forgetting the better goal.
Your eyes were bright, but, ah, so blinded,
For sweet was the gleam of the tempter,
Vice;

And you, in the flush of youth, warm-blooded—
You little knew of your sacrifice.

You little knew that the love and laughter,
And all of the joys in folly's mesh,
Were weighed in scales with the soul and paid for,

Pound for pound, by the blood and flesh.
You only heard what you thought was music,
Tinkling, sweet to your eager ears—

But the strains you heard have turned to dirges,
And now you bow to the wasted years.

The time must come when your soul must reckon,
Your soul with stains like the shades of night—

Will you go in peace, unblessed, unshriven,
Trusting that death will make you white?

Or will you go with fear and trembling,
Knowing the cost, to yonder sod,
And cringe, a coward, when you are standing

There in the light before your God?

SIENKIEWICZ'S NEW NOVEL

A new book by Henryk Sienkiewicz, the Polish author who wrote "Quo Vadis," is entitled "Whirlpools."

After reading "Children of the Soil" Charles Dudley Warner wrote: "I think him at the head of living novelists, both in range, grasp of a historical situation, intuition and knowledge of human nature."

As in "Children of the Soil," the great novelist in his latest book, "Whirlpools," deals with the conditions of modern life, and as in "Without Dogma," he has placed the soul of his hero under the microscope, but unlike that work, he has made him the central figure of a group of lifelike characters and an unusual love story. Brilliant dialogue, profound thought, and subtle analysis of human motives permeate the book, and the novelist shows that he has been a close observer of recent agrarian troubles and socialistic intrigues in Poland.

Marynia, the youthful violinist, is one of the author's most beautiful and lovable girl creations. "Whirlpools" is an unusual, remarkable book—one that will excite interest and provoke discussion. The translation is the work of Max A. Drezmal.

GEORGE ADE AS HOST

The annual outing of the Indiana Society of Chicago recently drew 500 members to Hazelton Farm, the summer residence of George Ade. A bright day permitted the carrying out of an elaborate program of field and aquatic events.

One was a horseshoe contest, in which former Vice-President Fairbanks and Senator Beveridge were pitted against John M. Studebaker of South Bend and Health Commissioner W. A. Evans of Chicago.

John C. Shaffer of Chicago was put off the field because he derided Mr. Studebaker for wearing a blue necktie and red socks. Mr. Studebaker asserted he lost four points thereby.

Before dinner was served in the shade of an elm grove Mr. Ade, his father, Mr. Fairbanks, Mr. Beveridge, and Mr. McCutcheon led a parade through the grounds about Hazelden Farm. In one of the jungles they encountered a moving picture machine and a battery of cameras.

Races for the women, a display of Japanese fireworks, and spectacular diving in a cement pool concluded the program.

Californian Poets' Corner

THE MINER'S BURIAL

By John Brayshaw Kaye

Far up the mountain's craggy side,
Upon a rudely fashioned bier,
They bore him out from where he died
(His cabin near the rocky slide),
With scarce a word, without a tear.

They hollowed out a fitting grave,
Close by the summit's granite rim,
Then gathered round and sung a hymn,
And placed him in the narrow cave.
"To ashes, ashes; dust to dust";
Thus was performed the sacred trust
That man assumes upon his birth,
To give the dead again to earth.

Up to his tomb will clamber still
The sounds he was so used to hear,—
The music of the gad and drill
Beneath the hammer, sharp and clear;
The deep-toned thunder of the blast,
A tidal wave of echo cast
Off from the mountain's rocky crest,
Shall bear his spirit off to rest.

There in his lofty sepulchre,
A league above the distant plain,
His ashes sleep the final sleep;
And passing clouds which floating skirt
Across the vast aerial deep,
In shapes of rugged majesty,
Oft kiss his tomb in passing by.
Or, when a calm is in the air,
Like snowy galleons at rest,
They peaceful lie at anchor there,
To shut the lower world from view,
And point aloft to heaven's deep blue,
The promised haven of the blest.

DR. W. R. CLUNESS

AND REMINISCENCES OF EARLY DAYS IN CALIFORNIA

All the events of California history since the first ten years after the gold rush of '49 have been within the personal recollection—many of them under the personal observation—of Dr. W. R. Cluness of San Francisco. Coming to California in 1859 and engaging in the active practice of medicine until seventeen years ago, Dr. Cluness has had an extraordinary opportunity to know, at first hand, the interesting events in that history. And, on the other hand, probably no one man is known to a wider circle of the public than he. A brief record of his life cannot be without interest.

Dr. Cluness was born in Williams, Ontario, December 29th, 1835, of Scotch parents. When he was twenty years of age he graduated with the degree of A. B. from Queen's College, Kingston, Ontario. Four years later, on April 28th, 1859, he received his M. D. When he returned to Ontario, twelve years later, he received his master's degree, and also his fellowship, from Queen's, which is affiliated with the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh.

In 1859 he prepared to accept an invitation of a classmate to join him in Valparaiso, Chile, to practice medicine there. He bought his ticket to New York, whence he was to sail. But after leaving home he received word from his classmate that the laws of Chile required at least a year's study at a native medical school before permission could be had to practice.

Though his funds did not permit such an additional preparation, Dr. Cluness decided to go ahead anyway and take his chances of finding a way to enter practice after reaching Chile, so he bought his ticket to Aspinwall, on the Isthmus of Panama, and began the voyage. On the boat he met several other young doctors who had heard of his family, and who were then on their way to Alaska to join the Fraser River gold rush. These young men persuaded him to join them on the voyage north instead of south from Panama. This voyage was made in the old steamer Golden Age. Coming up the coast of California, the ship's surgeon, a Dr. McNaughton, informed Dr. Cluness that the Fraser River fields had proved a delusion and that he had better end his voyage at San Francisco. He added that there was a small city a short distance north of San Francisco, called Petaluma, which gave promise of growing importance, and in which there was only one physician. Dr. Cluness decided to locate in Petaluma.

His recollection of San Francisco in 1859 is of a small city of frame houses built on the flat centering around Montgomery and Sansome streets, between Bush and Telegraph Hill. South of Bush street there were practically no buildings. One of the few that were there was a house on the site later occupied by the old Lick House. This house, at that time, was a frame structure, in one corner of which was a bundle of wheat stalks and two sacks of threshed wheat from Solano county to illustrate the fact that wheat could really be grown in California.

The one night he spent in the city before proceeding to Petaluma was spent in the famous old What Cheer House, owned and managed by Woodward.

After spending a day in San Francisco, Dr. Cluness took a boat which ran up within a mile and a half of Petaluma, the latter part of the trip being made by stage. One day, soon after settling in Petaluma, Dr. Cluness was sitting on the porch of the hotel, watching a man with a pick and shovel excavating a basement next door. The proprietor of the hotel stepped to the edge of the porch and, looking down into the hole, called out "Doc" to the man below. After finishing his conversation with the man, Dr. Cluness asked the proprietor if he meant to say "doctor" when he had called out "Doc." The proprietor replied that he had.

"Good heavens!" said Dr. Cluness, "do doctors have to do that out here?"

"Oh, yes," the proprietor replied, "some of them have to do worse than that."

In all, Dr. Cluness spent four years in Petaluma, leaving that town to go to Sacramento at the invitation of Dr. John F. Morse, the elder, who was called to the faculty of the University of the Pacific, and who wished first to install a successor. Soon after settling in Sacramento Dr. Cluness returned to Petaluma to marry Miss Mary Laird of Utica, New York.

When Dr. Cluness went to Sacramento, it was a very busy town of perhaps ten thousand people (and claiming twenty thousand), the outfitting point for most of the mining districts, and the center of practically all the trade of interior California. This was before the railroads were built, when all passenger service was by stage, and all freight service by ox and mule teams. Connection with San Francisco, was, of course, by water. Sacramento, as Dr. Cluness recalls it, was then very much the sort of town that people associate with the idea of the frontier mining camp. Directly across the street from his office was a large faro gambling house—one of the very many running in the town.

DR. W. R. CLUNESS

Teamsters laying over between long hauls drank and gambled their wages with careless prodigality. The miners would enter, walk up to the faro dealer, throw down a buckskin bag of gold and say, "There are so many hundreds of dollars of dust; give me checks for it." The dealer would never weigh the gold, but accepted the miner's word for its value, and handed out the checks with which the miner played until he or the bank was broke. Usually, of course, it was he.

The year that Dr. Cluness moved to Sacramento was the year in which the Central Pacific Railroad was launched. He saw the first spadeful of earth turned for the road at Front and K streets, Sacramento, in 1863. He also knew personally all of the men who originated the enterprise. Dr. Cluness' office was at the corner of Second and K. Huntington and Hopkins ran their hardware store in the middle of the block on K street on the opposite side of the street. Next door to them was the grocery store of E. H. Miller, who became secretary of the Central Pacific. And on J street, near 8th, Charles Crocker ran a dry goods store. Leland Stanford was then the governor. All of these men were patients of Dr. Cluness as long as they lived in Sacramento, and friends until their death.

Dr. Cluness soon achieved a very large practice. Besides an extraordinary skill as a diagnostician and as a physician, Dr. Cluness had, as he has today, that indescribable human quality which not only attracts, but which endears a man to all who know him. He became, to a large portion of the population of the Sacramento valley, what Dr. Maclure became to his patients in San MacLaren's "Beside the Bonnie Briar Bush." In at least one family, indeed, he is really known as Dr. Maclure, but that comes later in the story.

In fifty years of active practice, Dr. Cluness never refused to answer a call, no matter who the patient, what the hour or what the weather. For years in Sacramento, he kept four horses busy making his rounds, and once, in one day, he visited a hundred patients in their homes, a record that has probably never been equaled in the practice of medicine, and one that would have been impossible in almost any place except on the level plains of California.

Dr. Cluness was one of the founders of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, which was organized in Sacramento in 1868, and for thirty-seven years he was its medical director. He resigned in 1907, because the company moved to Los Angeles, while he wished to live in the bay district. During these years as medical director he was the friend and confidant of all the many young people in the employ of the company, who came to him with their perplexities and troubles.

The first president of the Pacific Mutual was Governor Leland Stanford, who took the first policy issued by the company, for $10,000 insurance. Dr. Cluness recalls an interesting story in connection with this policy. Stanford died in the panic years of the early nineties, when money was so scarce that even the richest men could with difficulty get ready money enough for their personal expenses. When he died he left Mrs. Stanford a very wealthy woman, but with so little cash that there was literally not enough to pay his funeral expenses. Years afterward, Mrs. Stanford told Dr. Cluness that shortly after her husband's death she had written to C. P. Huntington, the then president of the Southern Pacific Company, asking, "What can you do for me now?" and received the reply that "We can do nothing. There is no ready money to be had anywhere." But a few days later three boxes of papers were delivered to Mrs. Stanford's residence from the railroad office. Going through them, Mrs. Stanford's secretary held up a large envelope, saying that it looked like a life insurance policy. Mrs. Stanford said no, she was sure her husband had no insurance. Closer examination proved, however, that it really was an insurance policy, Policy No. 1 in the Pacific Mutual. She called in her attorney, the late Russell Wilson. He looked it over and said, "Why, here is ready money for you, Mrs. Stanford, cash in hand." The next day Mrs. Stanford received a check for $11,784. "And," said Mrs. Stanford, in concluding her account, "I sent that day a check for $1,500 to President Jordan of Stanford, and that check was the money that kept the doors of the university open."

In 1893, Dr. Cluness moved his home to Alameda and his office to San Francisco. Since 1907, when he closed his connection with the Pacific Mutual, Dr. Cluness has retired. He has enjoyed these later years. Among other pleasures have been travels, especially one trip to China, Japan and the Philippines—and here is the place for the "Doctor Maclure" incident.

While traveling in Japan, Dr. Cluness received a cablegram from an old Sacramento friend, asking for the particulars of his route. He replied, and a few days later he received another message, telling him that one of his "babies"—hundreds of California men and women are his "babies" yet to him—was dangerously ill in Tokyo, and asking him to come. He interrupted his own plans, as he had done all his life, to answer the call, and made the long trip to Tokyo. There he found the little girl who was ill. She was attended by two American physicians, but her parents were not

(Concluded on Page 543)

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Universal Cry

It isn't so long, my dearie,

The way that we journey below;

The days are more cheery than dreary,

The world is with sunshine aglow.

But, oh, it's the thought of the mist-hid end
That holdeth my soul in its spell, my friend

The bird in the maple with melody fills

The earth for his mate in the skies.

"I love you, I love you," forever he trills,

And, "Love me, my love," she replies.

But all that I hear, and my soul is downcast,
Is, "Whither—and whither—and whither at last?"

I wake in the night, and the stars are afloat

On an ocean of silvery gray,

And I fancy that each is a gossamer boat

That beareth some spirit away;

And my soul crieth out—If our God would but speak!—

"Where, where is the haven afar that you seek?"

It isn't so long, my dearie,

The way that we journey below,

But, oh, for the eyes that are teary

To know where our voyagers go,

And it's hard for the spirit to whisper: "I trust.

Yea, surely I'll know when the body is dust."

* * *

The World Moves Upward

A long time ago, Willie, when I was a little boy—oh, a very, very long time ago, I assure you—the good people of the small village in which was my childhood home used to have what they called "revivals," or "seasons of grace," pretty nearly every year. The object of these revivals was to snatch souls "like brands from the burning," and the season selected usually was mid-winter, because little was doing then in that cold climate and time for snatching a few souls could be spared just as well as not. A good many souls would be saved from the wrath of the avenging God whom the revivalists described; then the season of grace would end, things would quiet down, the backsliders would begin to register at the sinful headquarters, and the rest of us would strike about our general average of wickedness. It used to puzzle my small-boyish intellect to decide why souls were worth so much more effort in mid-winter than at any other time, but I always had to give it up.

Among other professional "revivalists," I remember, came one named Potter, and he was an artist in his line. He could paint a hell, seething with raging flames and smelling awfully of sulphur, which was the hottest place I ever looked at. And the worst of it was that he could prove to you that you had only one chance in several million of going to any other place. To me the prospect looked very gloomy and over-heated, and it took all my faith in Brother Potter to make me believe that the Almighty ran that sort of an institution because He loved his children so much.

That was a long time ago, as I have said, Willie, and I think that the change since then in man's belief in reference to this sizzling hell is enough to breed optimism in the most pessimistic soul. There are not many of us now who live in life-long dread of a vengeful deity who may, and not improbably will, doom us to eternal torment. We know our faults, and the scars of much wrong-doing are upon us, nor do we expect to escape the penalty of our evil, but we are willing to trust ourselves to the One who placed us here, weak, faltering and half-blinded, yet with the capacity to know and to creep upward. We err, and will pay the price, but we are not afraid to await that Infinite Justice which, we feel, also is Infinite Knowledge and Infinite Love.

And this, as I said, Willie, is so mighty a step onward and upward that even pessimism, in considering it, well might lose itself in splendid optimism.

The Opinions of Rufus

Ever pause to reflect, Ephr'im, that if all of us was es bright es we think we are 'rangements would have to be made fer 'bout fifteen million Pres'dents of this country—the rest bein' women or under age?

A good many people are like the late comet's tail—ain't there when they're announced to be.

"Right wrongs no man"—but if you don't b'lieve it's l'ible to hurt the feelin's of consider'ble many, ask any of the boodlin' Higher-ups.

"A burnt child dreads the fire"—but 'tain't on that 'coun't we have a "safe an' sane" Fourth; it's 'cause his pa an' ma dread noise.

The man that's eddicated to think by books gener'ly ain't able to think any outside of books.

"A fool an' his money is soon parted"—es the dead game sport that bet 10 to 6 on Jeffries confidentially admitted to a sympathizin' friend.

'Mongst the pathetic scenes of life they's none much patheticker than a girl with a No. 3 shoe on a No. 5 foot complainin' that the dealers alwuz sell her shoes so big they hurt her feet.

Josh Bings says he despises lyin', but can't help havin' a sympathizin' feller-feelin' fer liars.

The Scripchers says to honor your father an' mother, but if some folks did they'd do somethin' that nobody else could.

Es fer es I've seen, all Prodigal Sons are divided into two classes: Them that return to their father, an' them that ain't got decency an' backbone 'nough to take the trouble.

I reckon platonic love is all right, but folks can't be any too keerful 'bout how they mix the ingredients.

* * *

A Lyric to Straight English

I like the men who straightest English speak,
Nor mix it with the jargon of all tongues,
With Spanish, French, Italian or Greek,
Or hissed from lips or grumbled from the lungs.

Of course, 'tis neat to prove you're erudite
By conning "foreign phrases" in the lex.,
As fools may do, and be successful, quite,
But, oh, the plan my tortured soul doth vex.

He says not, "It is so," but "factum est."
His speech a jangle of discordant sounds;
His stolen phrases shallow lore attest;
The mongrel mixture all your spirit wounds.
His mind not sane—'tis "mens sana," you know—

His speech is graced (disgraced) by gems to strew
From every language known on earth, below
And some, indeed, that no one ever knew.

Oh, English undefiled! This jabb'ring crew
Do mire you in all language 'neath the sun,
And in one sentence from their mouths they spew

The phrases culled from speeches twenty-one.

And so they prove their learning is profound,
And erudition's their accustomed gait,
But as for me, while sense is more than sound,
Give me the man who talks his language straight.

* * *

Only One Change of Many

"I dreamed that I was in a country where everybody's name was changed to fit his character and capacity."

"Do you remember the changes?"

"Only one."

"What was it?"

"They called him Uncle Joseph G. Popgun."

* * *

A More or Less Timely Suggestion

"Did you hear the latest suggestion in connection with these big hats the women wear?"

"Don't know that I did. What is it?"

"They are talking of putting a motor under them and using them as aeroplanes."

The Everyday Philosopher Is Heard

"The beauty of the Republican Party," said the Everyday Philosopher, "is that no matter what it swallows, it turns up smiling and healthy. You remember the Populists of fifteen years ago, do you not? 'They are cranks!' says the Republican sages. 'They're freaks, they're crazies!' says they. 'They don't come in when it rains,' says they, 'and the worst of it is they don't know enough to come in when they're called. Co' boss, co' boss; we call, but call in vain,' says they. 'A bas the initiative and the referendum! Death to the recall!' says they.

"Will you listen to the same sages now. 'Cut, cut, cut!' says they. 'We have laid it, the glorious and peerless recall egg, and also the magnificent and unspotted referendum and initiative eggs. The splendor of our achievement is unexampled, and only great intellects like ours could have thought of it.' So they continue congratulating themselves, and nothing interrupts them save the low, sad sigh of the wind over the Populist cemetery.

Four years ago the Democrats of California got out and made the welkin ring with denunciations of the Southern Pacific in politics. All the Republican statesmen did in response was to urge the people to close their eyes to the Santa Cruz convention, hold their noses and vote a straight ticket, and enough did so to vote the Southern Pacific in for another four years of office. The four years have passed, good Republicans are yelling, 'Death to the S. P. in politics!' and it will be death. Someway, the Republican Party has to do it.

"I believe firmly in the Republican Party—a few years from now," the Everyday Philosopher concluded, "and in the meantime I am hoping."

* * *

Everybody Has Something

Willie has a glider
That o'er the treetops slides,
And mama has an auto,
And every day she rides,
And papa has an aero
That goes up like a shot,
And Squeezem has a mortgage
On the whole swift lot.

* * *

"The Negro No Longer Inferior"

It was Professor Hamilton of the University of California who, lecturing at the summer school of the Northwestern University, Chicago, expressed the following opinion: "The negro has made wonderful progress in the last fifty years, and no longer can be called the white man's inferior."

Yes? Then, of course, if he is not the white man's inferior, the black stands as high as he in the world of intellectual achievement. Taking it for granted that he does, would Professor Hamilton kindly mention just where the black Edison is to be found? Also, to what place should a note to the negro Mark Twain be addressed, and what unrecognized community does an Ethiopian Tennyson grace by his ebony presence? These are but two or three samples of a variety of questions that might be continued almost indefinitely, and it strikes the writer that they might be difficult to answer.

I should like to hold myself above race prejudice; it is my earnest desire—perhaps weakly lived—to judge men, not by their color, but by their deeds. But while this is the case, I will not so proclaim my mental stultification as to hold that the black race is the equal of the white. One needs no prejudice to recognize that such is not the case; an inspection of the average specimen of each race suffices.

What the long swing of the generations may do for the black man none may know. Perhaps it will put him on a plane equal to that of the white man—let us hope so—but certainly as yet he is not there, and he has unfathomed gulfs of self-development to pass before he attains it.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

CANDIDATES FOR REPUBLICAN NOMINATION

Governor:
Hiram W. Johnson.....	San Francisco
Lieutenant Governor:
A. J. Wallace.....	Los Angeles
U. S. Senator:
John D. Works.....	Los Angeles
Associate Justice Supreme Court:
M. C. Sloss.....	San Francisco
Curtis D. Wilbur.....	Los Angeles
District Court of Appeals (First District):
Thomas J. Lennon.....	San Rafael
Secretary of State:
Florence J. O'Brien.....	Chico
Controller:
A. B. Nye.....	Oakland
Treasurer:
William R. Williams.....	Fresno
Attorney General:
U. S. Webb.....	San Francisco
Surveyor General:
W. S. Kingsbury.....	Los Angeles
Clerk of Supreme Court:
B. Grant Taylor.....	Santa Clara County
Superintendent of Public Instruction:
Allison B. Ware.....	San Francisco
Superintendent of State Printing:
Friend W. Richardson.....	Berkeley
Railroad Commissioner (First District):
Alex. Gordon.....	Sacramento
Railroad Commissioner (Third District):
John M. Eshleman.....	Imperial

The Republican candidates above have all been endorsed by the Independent Republican Clubs of California and the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League.

If Alden Anderson Should Be Elected If Alden Anderson should be nominated in August he would be quite likely to be elected in November, although any surety company would demand a heavy premium for accepting that risk. The fifty thousand Republicans who voted for Bell instead of Gillett might, for a similar reason, be re-enforced by enough more of the same sort to make Bell's election sure, but, assuming that Mr. Anderson is both nominated and elected, what sort of administration have we a right to expect from him?

Frankly, very much the same sort as we have had the last four years, lacking half a year. Mr. Anderson will be less subject to fits and starts than Governor Gillett. The tenor of his way will be more even. The new governor will be glad to see friends and foes alike. Democrats will receive the same sort of treatment that is accorded to Republicans, for Alden Anderson is a jolly good fellow, clean and wholesome. His administration will be marked by no scandal, as it will be marked by no pronounced virtue. It will be to California what the administrations of Monroe, Fillmore, Van Buren, Hayes and Arthur were to the United States, periods of placidity with nothing doing worth mentioning.

And Walter F. X. Parker, Jere Burke, Frank Hatton, and the other mercenaries attached to the Southern Pacific Political Bureau, will be as much in evidence as ever and will report as regularly to their chief at Powell and Market streets in San Francisco and transmit the orders of that chief to the governor he has made as regularly as in past years. That is the shame and humiliation of it. But for that California could stand Anderson and not lose its self respect. If elected he will make as good a governor as he can be with the handicaps of Parker, Burke and Hatton and the taint of Southern Pacific domination about his clothes that no amount of aring will drive out.

What If It Should Be If Mr. Curry should be nominated in August there would follow an almost entire obliteration of party lines in the election. There are tens of thousands of Republicans who will not vote for Mr. Curry; and at least other thousands of Democrats, Union Labor party men and men of no party, who will vote for him in preference to all other candidates, and the November result cannot be predicted with certainty, though it would seem that Theodore Bell should defeat Curry.

But if he were elected what sort of an administration may we expect? It would be unjust to Curry to say that his administration would be to the state what that of Mayor McCarthy is to San Francisco, for Curry has better sense than McCarthy and a finer regard for the proprieties, but, underneath a more decent seeming, it would be exactly such an administration of the state as San Francisco is getting at the hands of Mayor McCarthy. The groundhogs would come out of their holes and stay out. The unmoral, if not the immoral, would be in evidence. There would be no forward step. The "interests" would govern in the interests of the interests as certainly as if Anderson were nominated and elected. Reform influences would take a furlough for four years and the people of California would have to get busy making money wherewith to pay taxes wherever a tax can be made to support a Curry man.

And Walter F. X. Parker, Jere Burke and George Hatton would be at the old stand, conducting negotiations between the corner of Market and Powell streets in San Francisco and the gubernatorial mansion in Sacramento, mainly in the lone watches of the night, for Curry's big feet make few tracks. "Politics for patronage only" would typify the administration of Charles F. Curry as governor and to the victor the spoils would belong.

If Hiram Johnson Should Be Elected If Hiram Johnson is nominated, as all signs point to his being, the election in November will be a mere ratification of the nomination. There will follow an era of party good feeling and a feeling of hopefulness will reach out through the uttermost districts of the state. Men will instinctively turn their faces toward the sunrise rather than the sunset. They will bid adieu to the old order without a pang and welcome the new with acclaim. Legislators elect will address themselves to the task of formulating remedial measures. Organizations of public spirited citizens, like the Commonwealth Club and the State Bar Association, will whip needed legislation into shape preparatory to offering it to the legislature. Not all will be accomplished during the first legislative session that will be hoped for because of the very volume of good things that the state has been waiting forty years to get a chance to do, but the first session of the Johnson administration will be productive of important results within itself, and more productive still in making ready for a record-breaking second session. Many important reforms will be threshed out and taken to the people for ratification, or taken to them for a fuller and more thoughtful discussion. It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that a constitutional convention might be called. Anyhow there will be plenty for the people to think of against the second session which will be a history maker.

And during all this time the head of the legal department of the Southern Pacific Company in San Francisco will be free to address himself to the legal business of his office. If the interests of the railroads shall be involved in pending legislation the companies interested will be represented before the committees of the legislature, and before the governor, by men of the most reputable standing those companies can find, and the Parkers, Burkes and Hattons will be conspicuously and beneficially absent from their accustomed haunts. This alone will be a consummation worth all the effort that is putting forth on behalf of Johnson and his associates.

The Story of the Year So far as California Nineteen Hundred Nine is concerned the book of the year 1909 was Franklin Hichborn's Story of the California Legislature. There will be many another state that will have such a story written after every legislature that the truth may be told and the records made, whether for good or ill, may be laid before the people at home. When a legislator makes a good record he deserves to have that made as widely known. Hichborn's book has done this for the legislators of California. He has treated them fairly and the records he gives are in the legislative histories, in black and white, and cannot be gotten away from. No citizen of character should be without this book. If the reader of this hasn't it let him send to The California Weekly for it. All it costs is $1.25. That others think well of it, and well of imitating Hichborn's example, the following letter shows: "Dear Mr. Hichborn: I am delighted with the copy of your Story of the Legislature of 1909, which you have sent me. What interests me as much as the book is the idea embodied in getting out such a book following each legislature. It is just splendid, and I am going to bring it to the attention of our City Club and some of our reform organizations here with the hope that your good example may be imitated in other places. You are rendering a genuine service to the cause of democracy in this country. With kindest regards, I am, Ben B. Lindsey, Denver, October 4, 1909"

C. C. Young Is the Man

It is not good that anyone, least of all a Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican Leaguer, should enter the race against C. C. Young for nomination and election to the assembly from the fifty-second district. It is not that there is any material risk of Redmond C. Staats defeating Mr. Young at the primary election, but Mr. Young's record was so perfectly satisfactory that there is not the faintest glimmer of a reason for changing to another candidate. Mr. Young's nomination should be by acclamation and his election the same. He should be saved the annoyance of having to compete for the nomination with anyone, especially with one who professes the same enthusiasms that he does. Berkeley Republicans should make it plain to Mr. Staats that his plain duty is to wait until Mr. Young shall have been called to the upper house in due course of promotion and then shy his castor for Mr. Young's place. That would be a bit of patriotism to be proud of.

Mr. Dick Ferris Now Doing the Comet Act

Mr. Dick Ferris, of Los Angeles, and elsewhere, whilom newsboy, page, railroader, actor, theatrical manager and general all-around promoter and booster, has some money and made a success of the Los Angeles aviation meet. Now he has turned his attention to politics and gone in for the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor with something of the quality of the aerial meteor, but evidently proposes to be a full fledged comet before he has done with that stunt. Of course he knows nothing about statecraft, disclaims being the candidate of any faction (another way of saying that he is the candidate of the "organization" element) and he thinks that Curry's platform is good enough for him. Very likely. Mr. Curry was never known to make a platform that would not fit anybody and everybody. Mr. Dick Ferris is a hearty good fellow and exactly the kind of good fellow whom the State of California does not require in the office of lieutenant governor. Newsboys, railroaders, actors and theatrical managers, promoters and boosters, meteors and comets, all have their uses, but not in such an administration of the affairs of a commonwealth as will make that commonwealth free, sane and well governed. For once Mr. Dick Ferris is out of his proper sphere.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

The Ghost Of Graft Anyone who watches closely the symptoms as they manifest themselves in this campaign can not but be impressed with its likeness to the campaign which the whole grafting confraternity waged in San Francisco last fall in the interests of McCarthy and Fickert. The Shasta Courier, for instance, declares that, "When the Republican State Central Committee sent a request to vice-president Sherman to deliver two addresses before the primary, the purpose of the committee was to prove to the Republicans of the state that the Spreckels-Phelan conspiracy in California has absolutely no standing within the Republican party and that the national administration looks upon it solely as a campaign trick."

Now the only movement that Messrs. Spreckels and Phelan have had anything to do with was the movement to bring Patrick Calhoun and a lot of other malefactors of great wealth to book for crimes committed here in San Francisco, and if the Republican State Committee has gone to any trouble to show to the world that the Republican party in California has no sympathy with the late graft prosecutions in San Francisco that committee is going out of its way to injure the Republican party in California.

And yet the men who are pushing the candidacies of Anderson or Curry are, with few exceptions, the men who, no long time since, were denouncing Heney, berating Spreckels and Phelan and extending their sympathies to Pat Calhoun in his affliction. The ghost of graft still walks the earth.

Dennett Out Against "Constitutional John" The Watchman is glad to be able to announce that L. L. Dennett has concluded to take the field against John B. Curtin in the twelfth senatorial district, composed of Tuolumne, Mariposa, Madera, Stanislaus and Merced counties. Curtin is an able man and his record in the legislature has been far from disreputable, but he has made himself so satisfactory to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company as to have had that bureau's active support in the Republican ranks, notwithstanding that Curtin classes himself as a Democrat. He will probably have the same support this time.

But L. L. Dennett should make the race mighty interesting for Curtin and will beat him if he will make a thorough canvass of the district. He must go into the mountains and make his errand known, and he must not overlook the valley counties where he is so well known. Mr. Dennett also is able and he is likewise a free man, just such a man as Governor Johnson will need in the senate when the legislature convenes next January. His thorough acquaintance in Stanislaus, Merced and Madera counties should yield him a big vote in those counties, and with little distinction with regard to party, for John B. Curtin only observes party lines when and where they are useful to himself. The issue this time is not between Republicans and Democrats, but between those who owe allegiance to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company and those who do not. Mr. Dennett does not.

E. A. Meserve In the Fight Nothing else has so contributed to the humor of the pending campaign as the antics cut by the "organization" crowd with reference to a candidate for the United States senate. They first moved heaven and earth to "queer" the direct primary law in the interests of Senator Flint and then Flint wouldn't run. Then they spitted Governor Gillett on a delectable hook and dropped him down in the roiled waters of Southern California, but did not get so much as a nibble for their pains. Then they combed Southern California for a candidate to run against Judge Works, but the tarred statesmen either "lit out" for Europe, hit the trail for the desert or crawled into their holes and pulled the holes in after them. Then Mr. Herrin went south. At that moment E. A. Meserve announced his candidacy. Some say that Mr. Herrin induced him to do it, some say that Meserve suffers periodically from the exaggerated ego and did it all himself. Some say that Parker was much put out with his boss, others that it was only at Meserve. Anyhow Parker made another trip to Washington to see Flint and Flint went to Europe to be delivered from temptation. Meantime, Mr. Herrin's state committee refused to go on record as regarding the senatorial advisory vote as morally binding on legislators, which made it look as though the "organization" intended to ignore that vote and carry the fight for Flint into the legislature as though there had been no expression of public opinion whatever and, just as we all got settled to that point of view, up jumps Meserve again and files his nomination papers. The consensus of southern opinion seems to be that Meserve did it all himself, literally forced himself onto the "organization" slate and, being there, for better or for worse, has been accepted as the "organization" candidate and will receive all the strength the "organization" can give him in his efforts to get more votes than Judge Works. With all of which no one has any right to find fault. He is clearly within his rights, but his butting in serves to show that Mr. Herrin also has his troubles. By now Judge Works is so far ahead that Meserve will be reported as "scattering" when the votes are counted out.

AFTER AUGUST 16TH

Charles A. Bliss Or Grove L. Johnson Of course a legislative session without Grove L. Johnson would be devoid of a certain interest that old timers will miss, but there are many who will willingly forego that source of zest for the sake of having fewer jacks turned up from the bottom of the deck upon unlooked for occasions. Charles A. Bliss, a reputable young attorney of Sacramento, is candidate for the Republican nomination from the seventeenth district. Mr. Bliss is habitually well spoken of. Mr. Johnson is not always. Mr. Bliss may prove a delusion, as so many other Sacramentan legislators have proven, but that Mr. Johnson will prove a snare to many legislative feet is borne out by long legislative experience. Voters in the seventeenth district cannot possibly make any mistake in giving their votes to Charles A. Bliss. Grove L. Johnson is simply too astute to be trusted anywhere where there is mischief that might be done. His legislative career should be hermetically sealed.

The Chronicle Takes a Hand When the primary campaign opened the San Francisco Chronicle ostentatiously declined to take sides in order, as its responsible editor declared, that it might be free to support the winning candidate, whoever he may be, in the general election. Which reminds one of the case of the editor-owner of the old Manchester (New Hampshire) Mirror and Farmer. A certain campaign had run some weeks without a word pro or con appearing in the Mirror and Farmer, but there were columns and columns of fine stuff on the agricultural interests of the state of New Hampshire. One day, however, just after a Republican committee had taken its departure from the business office of the Mirror and Farmer, the editor-owner burst into the editorial rooms, all the pockets of his long tailed duster overflowing with wads of crisp bills, and yelled, "Boys, whoop her up for the grand old party. The agricultural interests of New Hampshire can wait." Somebody from Market and Powell streets apparently has called at the northeast corner of Market and Kearny abundantly supplied with the particular species of argument notoriously so convincing to the huckster-owner of the San Francisco Chronicle. The agricultural interests of California can wait.

Champ Clark And His Troubles Champ Clark, Democratic leader of the House at Washington, is not finding it easy to make all those who affect the Democratic banner walk in the procession as he has ordered it to form in line. He has full forty kickers to contend with. The trouble with them is that their Democracy is only skin deep. Uncle Joe knew where to go for the requisite number of alleged Democratic voters when he needed them, and so did Nelson A. Aldrich, and so, also, did those at Albany who stood out to defeat direct primary legislation. In short, the "interests" have their men staked out in both political parties, some in action and some in reserve to be called into action at the psychological moment. Why should The People permit their partisanship to blind them when the "interests" never do?

The Prospective Demotion of Loeb It will be no promotion for William Loeb Jr. to be taken from the office of collector of the port at New York to be made governor of New York. The custom house job pays a good salary and the expense of living is as the collector chooses to make it. The office of governor of New York costs even as prudent a man as Charles E. Hughes so much more than his salary that two terms of it have nearly eaten up all that Governor Hughes had accumulated. Loeb is not a rich man, but it is possible that he may be forced into the fight as the likeliest man to win, and, with Roosevelt as party leader, the winning of New York by a man who represents progressive policies may mean much to those policies throughout the nation.

The Best Man They Can Use A noted business manager of a noted Sacramento brewing interest, in conversation with a friend of The Watchman had, in substance, this to say of the attitude of the brewing interests toward Curry and Anderson: "It is true that the saloons are now generally with Curry, but they are making a mistake, as the brewing and wholesale liquor interests will make them see before the campaign ends. Curry's following can't help us much where we need help, that is among high-class people. Anderson has the respect and confidence of high-class men, while Curry has not and cannot help us where we need help, and so it will be found that the liquor interests that count will be on the side of Anderson and not Curry in this contest. The saloons will be made to see where their interests lie before the campaign closes." This is not a verbatim quotation, but contains the gist of what was said by a man who is in a position to know exactly what is doing in the upper stratum of liquordom. Mr. Anderson himself is not bibulously inclined, nor is he hostile to the liquor interests. As with the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, so with the upper-class liquor interests, their desire is to be represented by the very best man that they can use to subserve their ends, which ends are always selfish if not corrupt, immoral if not immoral.

Plutocracy Embattled Duncan E. McKinlay recognizes that he has a fight on his hands, but he manifests a cheerful confidence in being able to win the nomination and the election. But when it comes to the candidacies of Anderson and Johnson he is cock-sure of the triumph of Anderson, and for this reason: There have gotten in behind Anderson, Duncan has declared, political powers that never have been beaten in California and that are not likely to be beaten even by Johnson. How much of this is bluff and how much is truth cannot be stated with exactness, but there is no question that plutocracy is embattled in California as never before, except in San Francisco for the crushing of the graft trials. Exactly what took place in San Francisco is now taking place, with the state, instead of this city, as a theatre. The Watchman has been forced to change his opinion somewhat as to the relative status of Anderson and Curry. He has, until recently, believed that Curry was as certainly the man the Political Bureau wanted in the state campaign as that McCarthy was its man in the campaign in San Francisco, but it now looks as though Anderson were to be stayed with to the end and that the power of Curry is to be broken if the power of money can break it. The success of an embattled plutocracy in crushing the graft prosecutions in San Francisco has convinced it that the power of money is not to be withstood and that, with all the strength that Anderson can muster, and the strength that will come to Anderson with the crushing of Curry, Johnson can be beaten. Pitted against this embattled plutocracy is only the desire of a people to be free, and yet, in the world's history, that simple desire has been puissant to overthrow princes, potentates and powers; aristocracies, monarchies and dynasties. The pending contest is no child's play, but, despite that marshalling of hosts which Duncan McKinlay views with so much confidence and satisfaction, there is reason to hope for the triumph of liberty over that plutocratic mastery that would mean death to free government.

In Mendocino And Humboldt The work of organizing the Johnson campaign in Mendocino and Humboldt counties is an excellent example of the possibilities of effective clean politics. These two counties were on the doubtful list. There was a good deal of Curry strength in many places and the "organization" fetish held many voters in others. But the spirit of insurgency was lying fallow, too, and it proved to be fertile ground for sensible cultivation. W. R. Ellis, organizer for the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, attacked the problem, organized clubs where he could, and in places that were too hard for the first attack, put up Johnson pictures and Johnson arguments and went away—to return. When he came back, he found hard places easy. Men, clubs and newspapers that had been shy gunning at first, felt the effect of a crystallizing public sentiment all around them, and came into camp. By the time Hiram Johnson entered the district the towns were all ready to hear him, and his personality and eloquence sealed the work of the preceding weeks. It may be confidently predicted that he will carry these counties. And frankness and clean methods and earnestness did it. This is the sort of work that can be done by local leaders in the next four weeks all over the state. Organized effort is what is needed. Here is a chance for young men to win their spurs.

A GENUINE SURPRISE

One of the funniest stories we have read in years appears in the July Lippincott's, its authorship credited to R. O. Eastman. It is short, but—here it is:

"We have the surprise beautifully planned," said young Mrs. Westerleigh to the guests, "and Frank doesn't suspect a thing. I think he has even forgotten that today's his birthday. He will get home from the office at about seven o'clock. Then he always goes upstairs to take off his coat and put on his smoking jacket for the evening. When he is upstairs I will call out suddenly, 'Oh, Frank, come down quick! The gas is escaping.' Then he will rush down here, unsuspecting, to find the crowd of friends waiting for him."

It went off exactly as planned. Westerleigh came home at the regular hour and went directly upstairs. The guests held their breath while Mrs. Westerleigh called out excitedly, "Oh, Frank, come down quick. The gas is escaping in the parlor."

Every light had been turned out, and the parlor was in perfect darkness. There was a rapid rush of feet down the stairway, then a voice said, "I don't smell any gas."

"Better light the jet," Mrs. Westerleigh suggested tremulously. "Here's a match."

There was a sputter, and suddenly the room was flooded with light. Everybody screamed. The hostess fainted.

For there in the center of the room stood Westerleigh, attired only in a natty union suit, with a fresh pair of trousers carried over his arm.

Birthday parties still form a forbidden subject of conversation at the Westerleighs'.

BOOK, MUSIC AND PLAYER FOLK

Maestro Mascagni is going to appear before the American public next fall in what is considered to be his strongest role, that of the conductor of a symphonic orchestra. He has just signed in Milan with George Tyler of New York a separate contract to give sixteen concerts of a symphonic and popular character every month he remains in the United States. In the contract he binds himself to rehearse with the orchestras and conduct them, making also a tour of the principal American cities.

Signor Illica, the poet, is considered the cleverest librettist now living. He is coming to America this fall to watch the presentation of Mascagni's opera "Ysobel," of which he wrote the book. He will, however, remain in America only for the New York opening and will afterward return to Italy, where the publisher, Signor Sonzogno, and several composers need his services to complete their works.

Marc Klaw, the theatrical manager, recently returned to New York from Europe after arranging for the American rights for "The Count of Luxemburg," by Franz Lehar, the composer of "The Merry Widow."

The American rights of "Typhoon," a play of the conflict between the white and yellow races, now having a tremendous vogue in Berlin, are claimed by two New Yorkers, Alexander Konta, the lawyer who was responsible for Mr. Fiske's production of "The Devil," and Stephen Ivor Szinney. Each of them has perfected his own translated version of the play, and claims priority of possession for performance on the American stage. Mr. Szinney, as has already been reported in these dispatches, has Americanized his version and will call it "Yellow Men." It is not known in Berlin, where "Typhoon" is still in the midst of a record-breaking run, in what form Mr. Konta's version will be produced.

Grace MacGowan Cooke has placed her manuscript, "The Power and the Glory," in the hands of her publishers, Doubleday, Page & Co., who will publish the book on August 1. It will be illustrated by A. I. Keller. Mrs. Cooke is now in California.

Engelbert Humperdinck, the composer of the new opera, "The King's Children," which will be produced for the first time on any stage at the Metropolitan in New York shortly before next Christmas, announces that his work is now completed. The composer is leaving Berlin next week for an extended outing at the North Cape. In November he will go to New York to conduct the final rehearsals and the first performance. Herr Humperdinck calls "The King's Children," which consists of three acts, "a fairy-tale opera." The book is by Ernst Rosmer. Geraldine Farrar will create the prima donna role of the Gooseherd, and Karl Jörn will portray the King's son. Louise Homer will also have a leading part.

LAWYER WIT

(From "Recollections of a K. C.")

"Of base fees and simple fees,

And all the fees-in-tail

There's nothing can compare with thee,

Thou best of fees—fe(e) male."

Long before the Thames embankment was built the river could be approached by the stairs under a remarkable house arch in Essex street, Strand. A client visiting his lawyers, a firm of three, was invited in their absence to write his name in the call book. He did more and indited the following lines:

"At the top of the street three lawyers reside,
At the bottom of the street three coal barges glide.

Fly, honesty, fly to some safer retreat,
For there's craft in the river and craft in the street."

Another client who paid a similar visit in the absence of the legal trio added the following rejoinder:

"Why should honesty fly to some safer retreat?

There's no truth in your maxims, odd rot 'em!

For the lawyers are just at the top of the street,
And the barges are just at the bottom."

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office, 30 Montgomery St. Phone Kearny 4491
Residence, 1297 McAllister St. Phone Park 4598
SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY The Complete Text of the REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

THE FRESNO JUNIOR COLLEGE

BRINGING THE FIRST TWO YEARS OF THE UNIVERSITY TO THE STUDENT'S DOOR

By C. L. McLANE, City Superintendent of the Fresno Schools

[The addition of a two years' post-graduate course to high schools, which amounts to bringing the first two years of college to the students' home district, is one of the most interesting and probably one of the most important departures in public school education undertaken in recent years. The first city in California to attempt this experiment is Fresno, which is peculiarly suited to give it a fair trial by reason of its distance from the universities, its already excellent school facilities and its central location in the heart of a populous agricultural district. The result of this experiment, whose outline is here described, will be watched with great interest.—The Editor.]

The above title may appear rather high sounding; yet when one contemplates the purpose of the act of the legislature of 1907 authorizing the establishment of Post Graduate High School Courses "which shall approximate the studies prescribed for the first two years of University Courses," the title, "Junior College," may not seem inappropriate. The purpose of this act, like that of much of our school legislation, is to encourage boards to undertake something that was already within their powers. Many California high schools have been doing post graduate work for years, and no one has ever questioned their authority to do so. The high school laws imply that more than four years' work may be prescribed in stating that high school courses of study "shall embrace a period of not less than four years." This new act, however, specifically authorizing this post graduate work will serve to encourage high school boards to undertake it, and give them a greater degree of security from a legal standpoint.

Supported by Local Taxes

The most serious problem facing a board of education in undertaking this work is the question of finance. In this country it has been the general practice for the state at large to supply the funds for maintaining the higher institutions of learning, at least one in each state, and in many instances the major part of the funds for elementary schools. Secondary or high schools have been supported, in the main, from local taxation.

The State of Massachusetts has recently taken a step far in advance of California in the movement to bring the advantages of higher education to the very doors of the people. Some twenty-eight centers for higher education have been provided for, throughout the state, using the high school and normal school equipment, in the main, as the basis for operations. What the result of this movement will be is yet to be determined; but these two projects along somewhat different lines, on the extreme eastern and western shores of our country, are certainly significant of the awakening of the people to the possibilities of higher education for the masses—and at less expense—"Bargains in College Education," as one writer puts it.

Bringing College Nearer

The time has evidently come in the progress of education in this state when one or two centralized institutions cannot meet the demands of our high school graduates for further educational training. Even though these institutions could increase their facilities indefinitely, it is neither advisable nor expedient to do so. Expense, distance from centers of population, the congregating of large numbers of students and many other conditions stand in the way of popularizing college education in California under present conditions. It would seem that the state has met but a small part of its obligation in merely permitting local authorities to go beyond the traditional high school courses. Surely the least that should be expected of the state is to supply a part of the funds necessary to carry on this advanced work, even though it might be deemed expedient to place the management of it under the State University authorities, so far as the planning of the courses is concerned, as well as judging the quality of work done.

While Fresno has been among the foremost cities in the state in the liberal support of its public schools, it will certainly stand at the head, for the present at least, in assuming this additional burden. With a school enrollment of more than five thousand and an assessed valuation of fourteen million only, our tax rate runs pretty high, although the cost per pupil for school maintenance is below the average for cities of the state.

Hearty Public Support

Before taking any steps toward the introduction of this post graduate work in Fresno, a thorough sounding of public sentiment was made through the press and through circulars sent to parents of pupils attending the various high schools throughout this section of the state. From almost every school came some sort of response. It seems remarkable that not a single adverse opinion has been received. On the contrary, every sentiment so far expressed has been heartily in favor of the movement. Under the stimulation of this encouragement the superintendent brought the matter before the Board of Education, and was authorized to prepare a report, covering the needs of such a course as contemplated, and a general plan of procedure. The following report was soon after presented and unanimously adopted:

"Fresno, Cal., May 6, 1910.

"To the Honorable Board of Education:

"Gentlemen: Pursuant to a resolution adopted by you at a meeting held on April 18th, I herewith submit the following report on the needs for a post graduate course for our high school under the provisions of Section 1750 of the Political Code, also plans and methods of carrying the same into effect:

"There is no institution of higher education within two hundred miles of Fresno where students may continue their studies beyond the regular high school courses. Many of our high school graduates are but seventeen or eighteen years of age, and parents are frequently loth to send these young people so far from home. Many who desire to continue their studies cannot afford the expense necessary to college or university attendance. Some desire to take up one or more special studies, and at the same time continue in some sort of remunerative employment.

The Universities Approve

"Authorities in the University of California and Stanford University have been consulted in this matter and seem much interested in the project. Both have promised such assistance as they may be able to render in planning courses and in securing able instructors. I have no doubt that we may be able to do work of such merit as will command recognition from both these institutions.

"About the first of the year the following circular was distributed to the students in the Fresno High School and sent to the principals of several other near-by high schools:

Fresno, Cal., Jan. 1, 1910.

To Patrons of the Public Schools throughout the San Joaquin Valley:

By an act of legislature passed in 1907, high schools may prescribe post-graduate courses of study. Such courses must "approximate the studies prescribed in the first two years of university courses."

A movement is under way looking toward the establishment of such courses in the Fresno High School. The completion and equipment of the new High School Polytechnic Annex will afford ample means of carrying out such advanced work. The general aims of such courses will be:

1. To give to young people who cannot afford the time and expense of actual university attendance the opportunity of continuing their education at home.
2. To provide practical courses in Agriculture, Manual and Domestic Arts, and other technical work, in addition to the regular high school courses.
3. To carry students through the first two years of college or university work, thus enabling them to complete a four year's course with but two years' actual university attendance.

If this movement appeals to you, and you feel that it might be used to promote the educational interests of those under your charge, please sign below.

The object in sending out this circular is to ascertain the sentiment of those most directly interested, and the signing of it in no way carries with it any obligation.

Respectfully,

C. L. McLANE,
City Superintendent of Schools.

"Something like two hundred parents have expressed a desire to take advantage of such contemplated higher work. Many inquiries have recently been made as to when such courses might be started and questions asked as to details of same. In consequence of this interest shown, I would respectfully make the following recommendations:

"1. That the Board of Education authorize the establishment of post graduate work in our high school as contemplated in the above mentioned act.

"2. That a competent man be employed to take charge as head or dean of such department, to teach such subjects as might be agreed upon with the school management.

"3. That the courses offered for the first year be along the following general lines: Mathematics, Science, Agriculture, English, Foreign Languages, History, Economics and Technical work; having in view preparation both for further college work and for practical life.

"4. That a tuition fee of $40.00 per year, payable in advance, or $5.00 per month, be charged for non-resident students.

"5. That the superintendent be authorized to prepare and send to the various high schools in this section of the state, a circular setting forth the general plans and advantages of such courses, and endeavor to ascertain how many students will enter next fall.

"The new department is to be known as the Fresno Junior College, or post graduate courses for the high school.

"Respectfully submitted,
"City Superintendent of Schools."

The circular referred to above gives additional details and is quoted, in part, for that reason, as follows:

"Fresno, Cal., May, 1910.

"To High School Principals and Students:

"The Board of Education of the City of Fresno School District has authorized the establishment of a two years' post graduate or "Junior College" course in connection with the high school, as provided for in Section 1750 of the Political Code. Work in this department will begin at the opening of the regular term of school, September 12th. Capable instructors will be provided, as well as ample equipment in the way of library, laboratories, shops, etc. Special attention will be given to agriculture and other industrial subjects. Courses will be arranged to fit university standards, as well as the more immediate demands of practical life.

"While the prime object of instituting and carrying on this work is to meet the needs of our own students, yet there has been such interest manifest from other near-by high schools as to justify the board in planning such an institution as will command the attention and meet the requirements of the entire San Joaquin Valley. As the expense of conducting this department will necessarily be somewhat heavy, and as Fresno cannot afford to carry this expense for the entire valley, it has been deemed necessary to fix a tuition fee of $40.00 per year, payable in advance, or $5.00 per month, upon all outside students. This fee will hardly pay a proportional amount of the entire cost of maintenance, but will about meet the additional expense thus entailed by reason of such outside attendance.

"It will be the aim of this department to look after students in their interests and activities outside the regular school work, so that they may have all the advantages, so far as practicable, that are afforded by other institutions of higher education.

(Continued on Next Page)

("Junior College"—Continued)

Agricultural Course

"In order to plan wisely in organizing the first year's work, it will be necessary to ascertain the approximate number of students who will attend, and the lines of work they expect to pursue. It is therefore urged upon those who wish to take up this advanced work for the coming year, to fill out the regular application blank, underscoring such subjects listed as they wish to pursue, and file it with the superintendent at once. The university authorities have promised the use of the Kearney Farm, near Fresno, for such agricultural work as the school may need. This farm of 5,000 acres is in a high state of cultivation, and is equipped with almost everything needed for practical work in every line and phase of agricultural experimentation and demonstration. It is the purpose of our school department to give much emphasis to this phase of education. No other section in the west is so vitally interested in such work, and no other high school so favored in the possibilities for carrying on practical, scientific farming.

Normal Course

"It has been proposed by one of the foremost educators in the state that it might be well to include a normal course in our plans, until such time as the legislature might see fit to establish a regular normal school in this section of the state. Our city school system would certainly afford adequate means for the practical training of student-teachers; and no doubt the State Board of Education would be willing to give due recognition to such work. Steps will be taken at once looking toward the establishment of such a course, and obtaining from the state board their attitude toward it. Should there be a large number of students desiring to take a normal course, it might be undertaken at once, and the very fact of such interest being manifest would aid us in getting a fully equipped normal at an early date.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES,
AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining,
but thousands do.
To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well
you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)

526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital$ 1,200,000.00

Capital actually paid up in cash..... 1,000,000.00

Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,555,093.05

Deposits June 30th, 1910..... 40,384,727.21

Total Assets 43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office,

or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin

by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock

P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and

Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8

o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First

Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-

President and Manager, George Tourny; Third

Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A.

H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William

Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant

Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS — N. Ohlandt,

Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann,

Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer,

Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432

Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues.

For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W.

C. Heyer, Manager.

"It is proposed to secure a man of high educational standing and wide experience to act as dean or head of this department, who will take an active part in organizing the faculty and courses of study.

"So soon as the faculty has been organized, and the courses definitely planned for this post graduate work, full information will be sent to all who have registered, or to others interested.

"Admission requirements will be on the same basis as those of the University of California for such students as wish college credits. Graduation from any high school of recognized standing will be accepted for admission into courses not leading to higher college work. Students of good standing who have not finished a high school course may be admitted to the regular high school with the privilege of taking such advanced work as their capabilities and standing will justify. Students may also be admitted upon examination.

"An appropriate certificate, or diploma, will be awarded to such as complete a two years' course."

Polytechnic Annex

The new High School Polytechnic Annex to the Fresno High School, now in process of erection, containing an Assembly room seating about twelve hundred, Laboratories, Lecture rooms, Art rooms, Library and rooms for Household Arts and Sciences and Manual Training—Wood and Iron work—will afford accommodations for this department for some time to come. Some additional laboratory equipment and increased library facilities will necessarily follow.

From the present outlook, the attendance will be sufficiently large from the outset to stimulate an interest among the students attending, and to justify the employment of two or more special instructors for this department. Much interest has been manifest among high schools throughout this section of the state. It would seem that conditions are almost ideal to build up an institution here that will ultimately meet the local needs for higher practical and technical education, as well as to furnish the more formal training and preparation for still higher educational work.

INSURGENCY IN CALIFORNIA

(Editorial in Saturday Evening Post)

"The emancipation of the Republican party in California from domination by the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Railroad and its allies," is the foremost object of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League of that state. Truly, a strange object in a government professedly free. For forty years California, politically speaking, has been an asset of a railroad whose creatures have been put into the legislature, into congress and on the bench.

This seems an odd situation in an American state, but the oddness is more apparent than real. In California the ruling politico-business hierarchy happens to center in a single corporation. In other states it consists of a fraternity of many corporations. Pennsylvania, for example, is as much bossed as California, but not to the same degree by its leading railroad. Probably, for one thing, the Pennsylvania railroad is too intelligent to set up its chief counsel as the political general superintendent of a state.

The contest in California is essentially the same contest that other states are waging—to drive predatory business out of politics. The situation there is, however, both simpler and more galling, because the enemy is so easily identified. And there the contest is more forward than in many states. The Lincoln-Roosevelt League, as California insurgents call themselves, is making a good fight to carry this summer's primaries. In the Second Congressional District the candidate is William Kent—"just the sort of man that is needed in Congress," says the Daily News of Chicago, which city Mr. Kent helped to lead out of its traction jungle. We expect the California-insurgents to win. It is not easy to believe that California chooses to be the appendage of a railroad.

HONOLULU and back first
class from
San Francisco

Reduced Rate $110

The splendid steamship SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, July 30th, August 20th and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sales from S. F. June 29, Aug. 6, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire

OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING

CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

708 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00

Paid-up Capital 300,000.00

Surplus 400,000.00

Profits 45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President;

John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,

Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph

Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.

D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.

Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid
on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper James D. Phelan

J. G. Hooper Mark L. Requa

Thomas Jennings J. H. Skinner

James K. Lynch Rudolph Spreckels

Walter S. Martin John W. Van Bergen

J. K. Moffitt Rolla V. Watt

S. G. Murphy Clinton E. Worden

George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults
provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

O NCT I said to pop, "What do you understand a pennyroil cow is anyways, pop?"

Pop was feelin' purty peart 'cause he had jus' sold a game heifer to Jake Spading for 'leven dollars an' seventy-five cents an' had the money right in his pants' pocket, too. She was a kickin' heifer.

"Son," said he, thoughtful, as he set diggin' the wet dirt off o' the moul' board o' the plow 'ith his heel—he was bustin' up the San'hill road as he did ev'ry spring scourin' his plow—"w'en the Monon railroad years sence came a-cuttin' down through the moskeeter, frog an' pennyroil distric's west o' here I was over to Monon sellin' seed corn for dad, as to save his soul he couldn't git to sprout. The track was finished down to the Wabash an' some big bugs had come out t' inspec' the whole business. Seein' me by the station, says the Super'tendin' to me, 'Hello, is that you, squire? Come along 'ith us an'—"

"W'y pop," I said, "you wa'n't no squire then, was you?"

Pop kind o' caught 'imse'f up, scratched 'is head slow 'ith 'is thumb nail an' said sort o' doubtful like, "That's so, Skid, that's so, but it was in me big, mighty big. So havin' sold all the seed corn, I jumped on. I 'member now, Skid, I was 'bout yer age an' the silver was jinglin' in my pants pocket. I got two dollars a bushel for it. Sence I think they wanted me to ten' the jug w'ich had a hank o' catnip in it; gosh-a-me-e! but that catnip was frageran'. So nothin' would do 'em but Squire Puffer mus' go 'long.

"So off we goes jus' a hummin' as gay as a May snakepeter flittin' about in the sun. Right the very firs' thing we seen about forty rod ahead of us was one o' them 'rign'al pennyroil cows as hadn't mebb'y been lassoed for twenty er thirty year. She was muddy an' black right up to the swimmin' line 'ith swamp gumbo. She was lashin' 'er tail slow like a panther ready to spring, an' her horns stuck right up in the sky. She did look fearful. Ef a man 'ith a shotgun 'd come acrost sech a thing at night, more'n likely he'd throw 'is gun away an' make a Bull Run for home, and ef he was n't scart to death he'd yell 'bloody murder' ev'ry jump. But the pennyroil stock, the buff'lo, the reg'lar six-toed 'rign'al Indianyan an' the unicorn is extinc' in Indianyan now.

"'Wat is it, Jim?' ast the Super'tendin' hangin' on the fore door o' the coach, to Jim th' engineer. Jim breshed the galnippers out of 'is ears an' wiped moskeeters off 'is face an' starin' wil' said:

"'You c'n search me, Mr. Super'tendin'. Nen he shet off 'is san'spike that he jams in the b'iler.

"The Super'tendin' calls to me for the jug an' drinks for 'bout a minnit and a half for courage. Nen he looked agin, wipin' 'is mouth on the back of 'is han'—back'ard an' for'ard slow, starin' at the napperition:

"'Jim, I ast you w'at you think it is.'

"'Seein's it's you, Mr. Super'tendin', I sh'd say it is sun-fish an' devil-fish mixed, but somehow my eyes kind o' jiggle.'

"'Spouse it is the jug, Jim?' ast the Super'tendin' in a whisper kind o' scared an' tryin' to put the p'int's of 'is fore-fingers together an' failin'. Nobody said nothin'. D'rectly he bust out loud, for the jug was gittin' in its work:

"'The track is good here for nine mile; we have lost but two engines sence we commenced this division; I guess we c'n spare anether. Let 'er go. Ra-am 'er-r, an' he rolled them r's way down from his ches' jus' makin' the col' chills play fox an' geese 'long my back.

"O' course I knowed w'at the thing was, Skid, but I was a nones' boy, brought up by poor but scattered descenden's, an' had learned p'liteness, grammar, the single rule o' three an' table manners. It was no time for me to be bustin' in 'thout astin'. I jus' kep' tendin' the jug an' looking modes'.

"The Super'tendin' sent a tincupful for'ard to Jim. He drunk it, holdin' the tincup 'ith both han's to steady 'imse'f an' lookin' cornerways out o' the tincup at the pennyroil. And as we was standin' still she jus' kep' starin' at us an' tossin' her head sassy.

"Nen Jim flung the tincup over 'is head back to me an' puttin' 'is foot agin the b'iler he yanked his handspike clean to the coal bin.

THE PENNYROIL COW

BY

"SKID PUFFER"

(All rights reserved by author)

I guess he was kind o' mad efter drinkin', 'cause the pennyroil was lookin' gapedeed at us, flickin' 'er head an' smilin' lambastically.

"W'en Jim done that the engine jumped for'ard forty foot 'ithout tetchin', an' so did the cow. Gosh-all-blimity, Skid, y'ought to've seen that race! 'Fore a minnit the gravel ballast on th' road begin to come reg'lar. She kicked back darnicks as big as my fist an' 'sides breakin' out the headlight she had Jim scrouged down behin' the b'iler dodgin' the bigges' rocks. But we was flyin' jus' the same, jus' whizzin'!

"We fairly ro-o-ar'd. The frogs 'long the right o' way was throwed out o' the water mebb'y four er five foot high. I watched some of 'em, but we got to goin' faster an' d'rec'ly we was speedin' so fas' 'at we'd git out o' sight 'fore they struck the water agin. The firs' mile we run 'bout even; the secon' mile she was gainin'; the third mile Jim throwed a narmload o' hick'ry kindlin' in an' we gained 'bout twenty rod. I was holdin' my hair on with one han' an' tendin' to the jug with th' ether.

"The fourth mile I set on the jug an' helt my watch. We went that mile in fifty-four forty. an' fightin' still. The gravel rainin' 'roun' was ter-r-ible. I have the watch yit, Skid, to prove that.

"The sixth mile—say, Skid, w'at gol dinged mile am I on anyways? 'The seventh?' well, all right. The seventh mile Jim was red-headed as a woodpecker an' flung in a five gallon can o' coal ile. The pennyroil was goin' reg'lar, kind o' like a saw-log 'ith fins on it sort o' heavin' from en' to en'.

"Thunderation an' Texas! W'en she saw that black coal ile smoke roachin' back over th' engine she got scart. She'd been lookin' back sassy over 'er shoulder for five or six mile an' w'en I got a glancet once nawhile an' could see 'er lambastic grinnin', Skid, w'y I got excited an' got up an' yelled. Bein' so scart she commenced to run. Jim yelled like an Indian. She got scart mos' to death, jus' as ef th' ol' kind of Indianyan Indians was after her.

"Nen she did spurt. Ever see a pennyroil spurt w'en she is scart? No; o' course not. You have got to have mighty quick eyes 'bout that time or you will see 'er no more 'rever. She will be ob-oblivious, vanished, an'—nen pop tried to think o' some po'try he gits off at the winter literary, but he couldn't connect an' went on.

"Skid, never in my whole born days did I see a spurt like that. It was sothin' like a swarm of fence rails an' smoke an' nen silence an' death. Just a flash like a swarm o' fightin' gnats you blow smoke into an' they are extinc'. The nex' two mile, Jim losin' the trail, stopped. He got down an' went 'round to the front.

"'Wat a' you doin' anyways, Jim?' ast the Super'tendin', holdin' onto the keb w'ich was all of a trimble yit.

"'The headlight is busted, the smokestack ripped full o' holes, but the forewheels is good yit as they didn't tetch more'n half the time, but the drivers is most wore out. I'm lookin' for hair an' blood. There ain't any, but the paint's all scorched', an' lookin' sorrowful, he ast for another tincupful.

"'Well, Jim,' said the Super'tendin' lookin' 'round', 'here in the tender 'pears to me like this is a gravel train.' Nen he come back to me purty pale.

"'Squire, he said, no, 'bub,' he said, 'you air native 'roun' here, w'at you think this napperition was?' Nen I bowed in a princely way tetchin' my for'ed. 'Sir, she is the native pennyroil.' Nen I bowed agin an' tetchin' my for'ed agin. 'Sir, she is a wil' denizen an' has to be lassoed to milk 'er. W'en native an' wil' she can't be ketched 'cept with blood-houn's with 'bout two miles handicap. The male animal eats on'y pennyroil an' bull-frogs.' Nen, Skid, I bowed nearly to the jug, sayin', 'Sir, she is noted for 'er fleetness, slerity, rasheoshenashun details an' perspective!' I tell you, Skid, I could fling grammar with the best of 'em in them early days. The Super'tendin' set down kind o' weak.

"'Pennyroil? Pennyroil?' he said in a whisper. 'The devil you say! W'y I been a smellin' mint for ten mile back, but I thought it was comin' from Jim's system.'

"An' that's w'at a pennyroil was, Skid. The milk was always tainted with our native perfume an' none of 'em ever give more'n a thimble or two o' milk. But it was rich, Skid, mighty didrapin' rich—cream clean to the bottom. It jus' nachurly produces crippled words, d'lect po'try, Knights o' the Golden Circle an' long laiged dogs."

"Long la-iged dogs, Pop?" I ast, perfectly astonished.

"Course, son, 'cause we always had to run 'em down at milkin' time."

"'Spect they was golding kickers, pop, w'en bein' milked," I said thinkin'.

"Nix, Skid, for you see they'd soar till they dropped an' w'en they was onconscious we tapped 'em for ther heavenly nectar an' pennyroil otter."

A FORGOTTEN POET

A discussion having arisen over some verses alleged to have been composed by General Stonewall Jackson, the Springfield Republican corrects the mistake as to their authorship and gives some interesting details concerning an almost forgotten poet of the old South. It says:

But there is no mystery about the authorship of the poem mentioned. It is by Gen. Henry Rootes Jackson of Georgia, born in that state in 1820, educated at the university of Georgia, at Princeton, N. J., and at Yale. He engaged in the practice of the law, but on the breaking out of the war with Mexico raised a company for that service and became its captain and subsequently colonel of the regiment to which it was attached. He held several important public posts, among which was that of United States minister to Austria at Vienna. On the breaking out of the war of secession he served with Georgia troops and finally under Hood in his advance upon Nashville, when he commanded a brigade. In the battle of Nashville he was taken prisoner and held to the close of the war. The general was quite a poet, and in 1850 he published a volume entitled "Tallulah and Other poems." In that collection are the lines to his father, mentioned above. But the poem by him best known and oftenest quoted is "My Wife and Child." It has also been ignorantly attributed to Stonewall Jackson. Here are two stanzas from it:

"The tatoo beats; the lights are gone;
The camp around in slumber lies;
The night with solemn pace moves on;
The shadows thicken o'er the skies;
But sleep my weary eyes hath flown,
And sad, uneasy thoughts arise.

"I think of thee, oh, dearest one!
Whose love my early life hath blest;
Of thee and him—our baby son—
Who slumbers on thy gentle breast;
God of the tender, frail and lone,
Oh! guard that little sleeper's rest!"

Jurist, statesman, soldier and diplomatist, Gen. Henry R. Jackson died at Savannah in 1898. In his later life he thought but little of his lines, but some of them are not without merit, and they are quoted in newspapers after their author is dead and forgotten. As for Stonewall Jackson, who appears to have been incapable of expressing tender sentiments in musical numbers, he needs nothing of that sort to make him remembered. His deeds in war speak for him and testify that he was one of the greatest soldiers who ever lived.

SHEAR WIT

"How long a term does the vice-president serve, pa?" "Four years, my son." "Doesn't he get anything off for good behavior?"—Lippincott's.

"How did your act take, amateur night?" "Great! When I sang the first verse they yelled 'Fine!' and when I sang the next they yelled 'Imprisonment!'"—Baltimore Sun.

He saw her sitting in the dark corner and knew that his chance had come. Noiselessly he stole up behind her, and before she was aware of his presence he had kissed her. "How dare you!" she shrieked. "Pardon me," he bluffed, readily—"I thought you were my sister." She stepped out into the light. "You silly fool!" she giggled, "I am." He fainted.—Cleveland Leader.

"Where's your father?" asked the man on horseback. "Up the river fishin'," answered the boy. "Where's your big brother?" "Down the river fishin'." "What are you doing?" "Diggin' bait." "Hasn't your family anything to do but amuse itself?" "Mister, if you think we're doin' this for fun, you wait an' hear what maw says if we come home without any fish."—Washington Star.

A small boy who had recently passed his fifth birthday was riding in a New York Central train with his mother, when they were asked the customary question "How old is the boy?" After being told the correct age, which did not require a fare, the conductor passed on to the next person. The boy sat quite still as if pondering, and then cried to the conductor, "And mother's 31!"—Yonkers Statesman.

The "boss" was a hustler. Two of his men were not. Long experience, however, had made them wise in their way. "Now, then, where are you going?" asked the foreman on one occasion. "Please, sir," responded one of the men, "we're takin' this 'ere plank up to the saw-mill." "Plank? What plank?" snapped the boss. "I don't see any plank!" The man looked down at his hands, then over his shoulder, and turned blandly to his mate. "Why, bless me, Bill," he exclaimed, "if we ain't been an' forgot the plank!"—Answers.

The auctioneer held up a battered fiddle. "What am I offered for this antique violin?" he pathetically inquired. "Look it over. See the blessed finger marks of remorseless time. Note the stains of the hurrying years. To the merry notes of this fine old instrument the brocaded dames of fair France may have danced the minuet in glittering Versailles. Perhaps the vestal virgins marched to its stirring rhythms in the feasts of Lupericalia. Ha, it bears an abrasion—perhaps a touch of fire. Why, this may have been the very fiddle on which Nero played when Rome burned." "Thirty cents," said a red nosed man in the front row. "It's yours!" cried the auctioneer cheerfully. "What next?"—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

AN INSURGENT LADY

Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, rarely tells a story, but the position of the insurgent Republican senators in finally voting for some of the administration bills, and their attitude toward the regulars when so doing, reminded him of a thin, hatchet-faced woman he saw once in a street car in Providence.

She stood in the rear doorway of the car and refused to move up, although several times asked to do so by the conductor.

"Move up, madam; move up," the conductor shouted, pushing her ahead.

"I shan't do it," she said. "I shan't move a peg."

"Move up," insisted the conductor; "plenty of room in the middle of the car."

"I shan't do it," said the woman, clinging to her strap.

Just then a man ran across the track in front of the car and the motorman put on his brakes hard. The car stopped very suddenly. The woman was pulled from her strap and sent skittering up to the front end, where she banged against the door. From that position she glared back at the conductor and shouted:

"Well, I'm here; but you didn't make me come!"—Saturday Evening Post.

PERSONALIA

Miss Elinor C. Zimmerman of East St. Louis, Ill., has won a prize for drawing the best plan of a seven-room house to cost $2,500. She had more than five thousand competitors.

Sir Ernest Shackleton, the Antarctic explorer, has made his first investment in Canadian real estate by purchasing 100 feet of residential property at Port Arthur, Ontario.

Mrs. Russell Sage has given $15,000 to the National Association of Audubon Societies for its work in the South. She has already given $500 to start a special robin protective fund which the association is raising for the purpose of protecting the robins. In the South the robin is treated as a game bird and each year fewer and fewer return to their homes in the North.

President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University, who, with Mrs. Butler, is making a long stay in London, is spending a great deal of time in finding out the most beneficial manner in which George Crocker's bequest to Columbia for cancer research may be spent. Dr. Butler is consulting many leading cancer specialists in an endeavor to get their views on the subject, one object being not to duplicate in any way the research work that is being done in England and elsewhere in Europe.

Miss Alice B. White of Crosswicks, N. J., is said to be the only woman who has ever sent in an application for employment as a motorwoman in this country. Miss White is 18. She is the daughter of an expert machinist, who died recently and from whom she inherited her love for machinery and her ability to manage it. She has applied to the Camden and Trenton Railway Company for a place as motorwoman. It is said that she knows how to manage an automobile and has had considerable experience with trolley cars.

Henry M. MacCracken, whose connection with New York university as chancellor for a quarter of a century has just ended, started last week on a tour of the world, part of which will be spent in the study of educational features and the civilization of the far east. He was accompanied by Mrs. MacCracken, who will be his traveling companion throughout the long journey. Secretary of State Knox has given the chancellor an official introduction to the powers in the far east, so that he will be received as a semi-official visitor from the United States government.

Ever since he was a boy at school Field Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood, who recently celebrated his 72d birthday, has had a tough time, and often has been called "Hard Wood." At the age of ten he went to Marlborough grammar school, and then to the college in the same town. Here he received his baptism in "war." It was a riot among the boys, brought about by the prohibition of pyrotechnic displays on the 5th of November. The culmination was a month of mutiny, during which the head master's desk was burned and great damage done to the premises. Young Wood was flogged, fined £2 and given 300 lines of Latin to learn by heart.

John E. Thayer, recently granted the degree of master of arts by Haryard university, has established and maintains a museum, unequalled in its collection of birds of North America. Here, upon his own initiative, and by his own means, he has brought together and holds for free public exhibition an absolutely unique collection of mounted specimens of all species of birds ever known to have been found upon the continent of North America, or its adjoining seas. A wonderful and, in many specialties, unparalleled collection of skins, for scientific study, supplements the specimens exhibited for more popular study or observation. All known nests and eggs of birds of our northern hemisphere are here also preserved, and all safeguarded in an appropriate and beautiful building, erected for their care and exhibition for the free enjoyment and education of the people.

"WE HOLD THEE SAFE"

Total Assets
Over Ninety-one
Million Dollars

Exclusively Fire
Funds Thirty-nine
Million Dollars

The World's Greatest Fire Insurance Company

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.
OF AMERICA

TOTAL ASSETS NEARLY NINE MILLION DOLLARS
POLICY HOLDERS' SURPLUS OVER FOUR MILLION DOLLARS
Agents In Every City, Town and Village

ROLLA V. WATT, Manager
ROYAL INSURANCE BUILDING Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco

("Dr. W. R. Cluness"—Concluded)

satisfied without the old family doctor, too. He attended her until she was well. Then the two parties of travelers were called together and the voyage back to California was begun. Before the vessel reached Honolulu the little girl's sister became ill and her case developed into smallpox, and she and her parents were removed to quarantine at Honolulu. Dr. Cluness was not allowed to see her again before the ship resumed the voyage, but he went as near the hospital as he was allowed, and got a big dry goods box upon which he stood, so that he could wave goodbye to the little girl. She stood at the window inside, and the last he saw of her for several weeks she was throwing him kisses from the quarantine window.

When she and her parents reached California the parents wished to acknowledge their gratitude to the doctor for his promptness and willingness in making the hard journey in Japan to attend them. So they sent him a great armchair, which is now the favorite seat of the doctor in his home. The friend who told the writer this story once remarked to Dr. Cluness, "You remind me of Dr. Maclure when I see you sitting in that chair." "Why," exclaimed the doctor, "that's what they call me—Dr. Maclure."

Three charter members of the old Sacramento Society for Medical Improvement still survive, of those who founded the society forty-two years ago. They are Dr. G. L. Simmons, Dr. H. L. Nichols and Dr. Cluness. To bridge the gap that lies between Sacramento of that day, without railroads, a mining town set in a barren plain, to the Sacramento and the California of today, rich, cultivated, populous, equipped with all the accessories of modern comfort and civilization, surely this is a career to look back upon with satisfaction at having seen such things accomplished. And Dr. Cluness might say, with Caesar, "All of these things I saw, part of these things I was."

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 1.

Action No. 21780.

ADOLPH ZEIS, as Administrator of the Estate of AUGUSTE ZEIS, deceased, Plaintiff,

vs.

ALL persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property described herein, or any part thereof, Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of plaintiff filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Green street, distant one hundred and thirteen and nine-twelfths (113 9/12) feet westerly from the westerly line of Mason street, running thence westerly along said line of Green street twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23 9/12) feet, thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68 9/12) feet, thence at right angles easterly twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23 9/12) feet, and thence at right angles southerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68 9/12) feet to the place of beginning. Together with the improvements thereon and the appurtenances thereunto belonging.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 8th day of June, A. D. 1910.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

CAREY HOWARD, Attorney for Plaintiff.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of MARY GAFFNEY, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administratrix at the law office of Maurice Gradwohl, 816 Pacific Building, corner Fourth and Market streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased.

ELIZABETH HOLLAND.

Administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, July 7, 1910.

MAURICE GRADWOHL, Attorney at Law, Pacific Building, San Francisco.

7-8-4t

SPECIAL MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS. NOTICE TO THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, duly held on the 1st day of July, 1910, at the office of said corporation in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for and will be held at the office of said corporation in the Foxcroft Building, Number 68 Post Street, in said City and County of San Francisco (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet), on Monday, the 12th day of September, 1910, at 2:00 o'clock, in the afternoon of that day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition of increasing the capital stock of said corporation from Seventy-five Thousand ($75,000.00) Dollars, divided into Fifteen Hundred (1500) shares of the par value of Fifty ($50.00) Dollars each, to Three Hundred Thousand ($300,000.00) Dollars, divided into Six Thousand (6,000) shares of the par value of Fifty ($50.00) Dollars each.

The amount of increase proposed in the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Twenty-five Thousand ($225,000.00) Dollars.

NOTICE IS FURTHER GIVEN that at the same time and place there will be submitted to said stockholders meeting the matter of increasing the number of Directors of said corporation from Three members to Five or more members to thereafter constitute its Board of Directors, and to elect such additional directors.

AND NOTICE IS FURTHER GIVEN that at the same time and place, there will be submitted to said Stockholders' meeting the matter of repealing By-Laws, amending By-Laws, and adopting new By-Laws, and that said meeting is called for the purpose of considering and acting upon all of the propositions and matters hereinabove named and such other business as may properly come before such stockholders meeting.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Dated July 1st, 1910.

RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY. By R. C. Shaw, President.

(Seal) By L. W. McGlaflin, Secretary.

7-8-10t

NOTICE REDUCTION OF CAPITAL STOCK

A Special Meeting of the Stockholders of the PARKIN-HOWARD COMPANY will be held at the office of the Company, Room 1006 Metropolitan Bank Building, Market Street, San Francisco, on Thursday, September 15, 1910, at the hour of 12:30 P. M., for the purpose of diminishing the Capital Stock of the Corporation from 50,000 shares to 10,000 shares.

PARKIN-HOWARD COMPANY.

By John Parkin, Secretary.

7-8-10t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of JAMES CORCORAN, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, M. J. Hynes, Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of the Administrator, Room 858, Phelan Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

M. J. HYNES,

Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, June 30, 1910.

CULLINAN & HICKEY, Attorneys for Administrator.

ORPHAN NOTICE

THE BOYS AND GIRLS AID SOCIETY

The following have been received since the publication of the last notice:

Whole Orphans		Years	Months
Halstead, Andrew	12
Chrisholm, Louis	12	10
Half Orphans		Years	Months
Scofield, Olin	10	7
Reno, Willie	12	6
Reno, Peter	13	6
McGuire, Ignatius	11	7

7-8-4t

DIVIDEND NOTICE

FRENCH-AMERICAN BANK OF SAVINGS (savings department), formerly French Savings Bank, 108 Sutter street.—For the half year ending June 30, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1, 1910. Dividends not called for are added to and bear the same rate of interest as the principal from July 1, 1910.

A. LEGALLET, President.

7-1-2t

ANNUAL MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS

The regular annual meeting of the stockholders of NEPTUNE DREDGING COMPANY will be held at the office of the Company, Number 237 First street, between Howard and Folsom streets, in the City of San Francisco, State of California, on MONDAY, the 18th day of July, 1910, at two o'clock p. m., for the purpose of electing a board of directors to serve for the ensuing year, and for the consideration and transaction of any and all other business that may be brought before the meeting.

By order of the Board of Directors.

J. S. SPILMAN, Secretary.

7-1-2t

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

THE SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY (Member Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco), 101 Montgomery street, corner Sutter street.—For the half year ending June 30th, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Friday, July 1st, 1910.

Dividends not drawn become part of deposit accounts and earn dividends from July 1st.

Money deposited on or before July 11th will earn interest from July 1st.

WM. A. BOSTON, Cashier.

7-1-2t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF GEORGE CHILDS, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administrator, at the office of W. H. Payson, room 1700, Claus Spreckels Building, southeast corner Market and Third streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

RUFUS H. CHILDS,

Administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, June 10, 1910.

W. H. PAYSON, attorney for estate.

6-10-5t

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Department No. 12.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

KATHERINE MUNDELL, sometimes known as Kate Mundell, Plaintiff, vs.

No. 22107

All persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

WILLIAM F. HERRON,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA TO ALL PERSONS CLAIMING ANY INTEREST IN, OR LIEN UPON THE REAL PROPERTY HEREIN DESCRIBED, OR ANY PART THEREOF, DEFENDANTS, GREETING:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of the above named plaintiff filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain property or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly bounded and described as follows, to-wit:

PARCEL NO. 1.

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Second Avenue distant thereon one hundred and seventy-five (175) feet northerly from the northerly line of "C" street, running thence northerly and along said easterly line of Second Avenue twenty-five (25) feet, thence at right angles easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet, thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet and thence at right angles westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the easterly line of Second Avenue and point of commencement, being a portion of Richmond, formerly outside lands, block number (380).

PARCEL NO. II.

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Twenty-third Avenue distant thereon two hundred (200) feet southerly from the southerly line of J street, running thence southerly fifty (50) feet along the easterly line of Twenty-third Avenue, thence at right angles easterly ninety-six (96) feet, more or less, thence running northerly fifty (50) feet, more or less, thence at right angles in a westerly direction ninety-nine (99) feet, more or less, to the point of commencement, being a portion of block number (747) of outside lands in the City and County of San Francisco.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: that the said plaintiff be decreed to be the owner of said property and every part thereof in fee simple and to own and hold said property and every part thereof as her separate property and estate, and that the title of said plaintiff to said property, and every part thereof be established and quieted, and that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; and that it be decreed that no person or persons other than said plaintiff have any estate, right, title, interest or lien whatsoever in or to said property or any part thereof, and for such other and further relief as to the Court shall seem meet, just and proper in the premises.

Witness my hand and seal of this Court, this 5th day of July, A. D. 1910.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY,

County Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE,

Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM:

The first publication of this summons was made in California Weekly newspaper on the 15th day of July, A. D. 1910.

MEMORANDUM:

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property, adverse to plaintiff:

The German Savings and Loan Society, 526 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.; Isaac Ellsner, San Francisco, Cal.; Rosa Cohen, San Francisco, Cal.

WILLIAM F. HERRON,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

Humboldt Bank Building. Phone Douglas 3595

7-15-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Insurance Commissioner

If all men were honest and entirely sane, possessed sound judgments and were prudent, were anxious to serve society in full measure heaped up and pressed down, there would be little need for government beyond the simplest forms, but few men possess all these virtues and some possess none of them. Therefore the regulative powers of government have to be invoked at every turn.

Insurance is many centuries old. It was in operation back as far as the twelfth century, and it grew out of marine insurance. In those days the Mediterranean sea was the world's one great theatre of commerce. It is a stormy sea and the vessels which then ploughed it were not the great, floating hotels which now make regular trips on schedule time from New York to Naples, little harmed by weather conditions. The ships of those early years were small and not made of steel, and the risks of navigation were great.

Furthermore, the Mediterranean was infested with Moorish and other pirates. Merchants commonly went with their ships and cargoes and traded from port to port, and if, as sometimes happened, they were captured by an enemy of their country, or by a piratical crew, ransom was exacted on pain of death. All such perils to commerce and navigation had somehow to be provided for or commerce could not go on, and so the merchants came to create a common fund to which they all contributed and out of which the unfortunate were reimbursed or ransomed as each case might require. From insuring ships the business came to be extended to other forms of property, from insuring the lives and liberties of traveling merchants to insuring the lives of all classes of persons, from insuring against death for the benefit of families to insurance against accidents for the benefit of the individual, and then to live stock, automobiles, integrity of character, titles to property, against injury from lightning and tornadoes, or from the sprinkling of goods by the breaking of water pipes.

But it was found that, because of the cupidities or incapacities of men, much insurance proved of little worth in the time of need. Insurance companies collected much in premiums, but paid few losses. The great fire in San Francisco tested many insurance companies beyond their endurance. Some of them sought relief from their obligations through trickery, through clauses printed in their policies in exceedingly fine print that went far to destroy the value of the policy, and yet constituted a part of the contract. To prevent fraud on the part of insurance companies, to know what companies are solvent and what are bankrupt, state supervision must be exercised in the public interest.

In order to perform this service California maintains an Insurance Commissioner with a staff of assistants, clerks and other employees, in addition to hiring trained actuaries when they are needed, for insurance is reduced almost to an exact science. Hazard is figured out in the light of human experience and foreknown to a nicety. It is not always that our State Insurance Commissioners are trained insurance men. On the contrary they are usually untrained politicians who must learn their business from their own clerks and from the office books and law books; but we Americans are a versatile people and get on somehow even without expert men in such offices, although it were better to have men technically trained in the work before they enter upon such duties.

California law recognizes fourteen differing branches of insurance and stipulates how much capital any company must have to be allowed to insure in this state. It is the duty of the State Commissioner of Insurance and his examiners to inquire into the financial standing of all insurance companies; to see to it that insurance companies chartered in other states have no more right in California than insurance companies chartered in California have in the states from which such other insurance companies derive their charters; to demand that insurance companies chartered in foreign countries maintain reserves, either in the state treasury of California or some other state, as a guaranty of reliability in the event of loss; the collection of fees and taxes from insurance companies, amounting, in 1908, for example, to nearly a half million dollars; where laws are violated by insurance companies or their agents, certifying the facts to the district attorney where the unlawful acts were committed that the guilty persons may be prosecuted; to grant certificates to insurance companies entitled to do business in the state and revoke the same when companies are no longer fit; to compel the replenishing of the impaired capital of insurance companies when they are no longer sound and, in short, to do all things needful for the protection of the insured.

This department of government proved its worth after the great fire, but it also proved that, in spite of it, not all precautions were taken that should have been. Hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of insurance that had been paid for in good faith proved valueless when the supreme test came.

The cost of maintaining the state department of insurance is borne by the insurance companies doing business in this state, mainly in the form of fees and fines or, if need be, assessments. The Commissioner receives $4,000 a year and his employees draw salaries in the aggregate sum of $13,700 per year, beside traveling expenses.

Assessment and fraternal insurance associations are exempt from supervision by this department. There is need for it. Many such enterprises fail through bad management and not a few from trying to do what, in the long run, cannot be done—furnish insurance for less than it costs to insure. Those associations need looking after, too, and the law should be so amended as to bring them under the supervision of this department.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary.....$50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary..... 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary..... 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week.. 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander

ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA- WEEKLY: JULY 22 : '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 35.

That Which Is Dangerous

AN ENTHUSIASTIC CONTEMPORARY boosts the candidacy for the assembly of Judge G. M. Steele, of Lodi, in part for the avowed reason that he has the requisite legal knowledge, and "fine oratorical 'agility.'" May we not venture to hope that the booster meant "ability?" Oratorical ability in a legislative body is hazard enough, as the career of one Nathan C. Coghlan has often demonstrated, but an orator of "agility" in a legislature would prove a greater plague than a Parker, Burke and Hatton rolled into one.

A Good Man's Good Cheer

IT WAS KINDLY OF FRANCIS J. HENEY, resting and recruiting away off at Cos Cob, Connecticut, to send words of good cheer to Hiram Johnson and the marching hosts of political liberty in California. "Good cheer to Johnson, and good cheer to the people of California," he writes, "their day of deliverance from the bondage of Southern Pacific greedy and unscrupulous control is near at hand." Right you are, Mr. Heney! And as the years pass the unselfish service you gave the people of this city and this state will be increasingly appreciated. All your faults of temper and of zeal will vanish as a mist of the morning and the splendid service you rendered will stand over against time as enduring, as inspiring and as grand as Tamalpais against our northwestern horizon. We would that you were here to lend your voice to this cause, but there lives in California no friend to Frank Heney who will not vote for Hiram W. Johnson on August 16.

In On a Technicality

PIOUS JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, the second, feels certain that it will be well hereafter for John D., the first, for, although he will die possessed of many hundreds of millions of dollars, he will die devoid of all love therefor. The point seems to be slightly technical but well taken. The old gentleman knows how dollars are made.

In Protest at Delay

PATRICK CALHOUN AND his fellow conspirators are becoming restive because of delay in their cases in the administration of justice, and have appealed to the supreme court for relief. Indeed, why should there be delay in these cases? Have not these malefactors secured a prosecuting officer after their own heart? Is not the chief witness for the prosecution being maintained in idle affluence just over the British Columbian border? Are not all the powers of police and for execution of judicial process in friendly hands? Then why should the wheels of the judicial mill be clogged merely because one upright judge hopes against hope that peradventure something may happen to give Justice a chance to vindicate its right to be respected even by those who sit in the seats of the mighty?

Coals to Newcastle

THE SAN JOAQUIN POWER COMPANY, generating hydro-electric energy on the head waters of the San Joaquin river, have just bought out the electric concern supplying Bakersfield with light and power, confessedly as an initial step toward invading the oil fields of Kern county with electric fluid transmitted from the mountains of Fresno. If that be not "carrying coals to Newcastle," what is? It has been stated that power can be generated hydro-electrically, transmitted more than a hundred miles and sold so cheaply that if a manufacturer had an inexhaustible well of oil issuing from his own engine room he could better afford to take power from the wires than generate it from his own well. This looks as though there might be some foundation for the statement.

Unequaled In History

IN MAKING HIS CAMPAIGN before the people of California, Hiram W. Johnson has traveled, principally by automobile, between 8,000 and 9,000 miles; has addressed between 400 and 500 meetings; has looked into the faces of, and delivered his message to, not less than 100,000 voters, half as many as there are Republicans in the state. Not a man who heard his voice and looked into his eyes has gone away doubting the sincerity of his convictions or the single mindedness of his purpose. It is to be doubted if, in the sixty years of its history as a state, California has witnessed another such campaign, as it is to be doubted if it has witnessed another such victory of right over wrong, unless it was when Starr King won undying fame in a part of the same field. And there are yet twenty-five days in which the same eloquent voice will be heard in the same transcendent cause of making California a free state! Emancipation is not a less glorious cause in 1910 than it was in 1861, nor has it a less glorious champion.

Only a Foretaste

SYMPATHY CANNOT BE WITHHELD from Mr. Charles F. Curry, in view of his disastrous experience with an unruly automobile, but, bitter as was that experience, it was no more than a foretaste of what the Southern Pacific's political machine is trying to do to him if the power of money can accomplish it. And yet, let him take comfort in this thought: If that machine finds that it cannot crush him it will, in the last throes of its own dissolution, cave Alden Anderson down the bank and throw all its strength back to Curry. Anderson is having his chance now. Curry's may come later.

The Physical Culture Incident Closed

THAT HYPOCRITICAL HOMAGE which vice so often pays to virtue, by softening the acerbities of speech, has now reduced prize fighting to "physical cultural," but it is to be doubted if the bloody business will smell more sweet under that terminology than under another or be tolerated any more readily.

The Chronicle Renegade

THE SAN FRANCISCO MORNING MORAL IDIOT is fighting Kent and conservation, notwithstanding that it was a Republican congress that "buttressed" a Republican president with the power, which that President speedily exercised, to withdraw from entry all the coal lands of Alaska and oil lands of California, all the water power sites of the continent and phosphate lands of West and South, and notwithstanding the further fact that the Taft administration, from Aldrich to Ballinger, crosses its heart in sacred honor and swears point blank that it out-Pinchots Pinchot in its allegiance to conservation. If that journal be not renegade to Republicanism, who is? Certainly neither Johnson nor Kent, for they stand by the President's avowed conservation policy.

Does San Francisco Want the Fair?

To ask the above question is to perform a most ungracious act. It is to knock. And yet here and there cool-headed, clear-brained men and women are asking it and few have either the courage or the patience to give them answer. But just betwixt ourselves, we of The California Weekly staff and clientele, let us consider it, at least in some of its aspects.

Seattle is now the hardest hit city on this coast. Practically every house in Portland fit to live in is occupied, while something like one-fourth of all the houses in Seattle are tenantless. Portland has gotten over its fair of five years ago. It will take three or four years more for Seattle to recover from its exposition of last year. And yet both of these expositions were successful. It is notorious that Chicago did not recover from the great exposition of 1893 for a half dozen years, and St. Louis not from her's for four or five. One of the elements of cost to San Francisco of the Panama-Pacific exposition may safely be set down as five years of convalescence leading back to good health after the exposition shall have closed its doors.

If San Francisco shall be selected as the exposition city the task assumed will absorb the energies of this community for five years to come. People will have to give more than they can afford to give in raising the guaranty fund, the city will have to bond itself for not less than $5,000,000 and the state will be importuned for at least $3,000,000, if not for $5,000,000 more. The expenditure of these moneys will stimulate certain forms of activity, but mainly directed into channels yielding little of permanent value. Scores of hotels will be erected for which there will be no need after the fair is over and to the great injury of investments in hotel properties of a permanent character. In short, the next ten years will be mainly devoted, first, to an artificial stimulation of an ephemeral prosperity and, second, to recovery from the inevitable collapse.

Now San Francisco, of all cities in America, is the one in poorest plight to enter upon a hazard of uncertain fortunes. Four years ago it was in ruins. While most of its business portion has been rehabilitated, very few of its fortunes have. As a result of the great fire it lost business that it has not yet been able to regain. It lost population that has not returned to it. Its crippled manufacturing enterprises have not been restored and its over-sea commerce has dwindled.

Whenever a circus visits a country town it stimulates business that day, but oh, the day after! The streets are deserted, the clerks are idle and a week of dull days is the price paid for one day in which there is "something doing every minute." An exposition acts in the same way and to the same effect, only that months and years take the place of days. An exposition would bring to San Francisco some millions of ready money to go into retail trade and transient business of one sort or another, but little of it would go into anything permanent. What San Francisco needs more than all else is to devote its energies, its constructive ability and its available capital to a rehabilitation of its commerce, its industries and the development of its back country.

The completion of the Panama canal will be an event worthy of commemoration. The holding of a great exposition will be a fit way to commemorate that event. If no other city will undertake the task on a scale fitted to the occasion San Francisco ought, as an act of patriotism, to undertake such an exposition, albeit at great cost, but, considering what San Francisco has endured, and only partially recovered from, the performance of

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

that national service might well be relinquished to New Orleans if New Orleans is willing, in the light of its own bitter memories, to assume the obligation.

Upon no account should San Francisco go ahead with the exposition project if New Orleans does so also. Let there be one exposition or none.

Brand Whitlock's View

A friend to The California Weekly ventured the hope that this paper might comment upon Brand Whitlock's views in relation to "The Enforcement of Laws in Cities," as published in a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post. The article is worthy of thoughtful consideration and a more extended treatment than this paper can give it. Like many another reformer, Brand Whitlock attributes our ills to our "industrial system," and is inclined to look upon the grafters of San Francisco and Pittsburg, of St. Louis and Philadelphia, as unfortunates whose wealth has driven them to bribery as the hardships of wage slavery have driven many another to drunkenness. Such talk savors of sentimentality, "the most broken reed" upon which statesmanship can rely.

Of course we humans do not know what justice is in its ultimate and most holy essence. We are not called upon to judge the quick and the dead for ever and aye. That issue is appealed to the Judge-of-All-the-Earth who will be in a position to consider all the facts of heredity and of environment, temperament and temptation, and it may go hard with the best of us if on that day justice be not tempered with mercy. When we attempt to judge as Jehovah must judge we flounder until we hardly know whether humans ought to have any laws at all or not, those we do have are so crude; whether infractions of our laws should or should not be punished, our efforts to punish are so unsatisfactory. That way lies doubt, uncertainty, nervelessness in the administration of our laws and consequent social and industrial chaos.

But unless we are moral idiots we do know, of our own knowledge and out of inherited ages of human experience, that bribery is crime; that the corruption of the electorate is treason to the state or city; that special privilege is the foundation for tyranny; that the malefactor of great wealth is a greater malefactor than the common thief, inasmuch as he may fare sumptuously every day without resorting to criminal methods for supplying him with all the creature comforts that human ingenuity can devise.

Somehow all the power of the printer's art, and all the potencies that lie within vocal expression, seem to have combined to confound the power of the people for discriminating betwixt good and evil, between those human aspirations that are the main incentives to enterprise and that political criminality that makes American cities the Gomorrah of the world and shakes the confidence of humanity in the permanency and potency of democratic institutions.

And when Brand Whitlock affirms, as he does in the article in question, that, "It is not yet a custom for society to punish the acts which these statutes, that Heney and Folk and Wachenheimer, and other brave prosecutors, sought to enforce, were enacted to punish; these acts are inextricably woven and interwoven into the fabric of our industrial system—they cannot be separated from it, nor can their evils be avoided, until the whole fabric is renovated and renewed. And until that is done it will continue to be customary to maintain one law for the rich and another for the poor; certain men will be let alone and certain men punished; and until another ideal and another system shall prevail, courts and prosecutors will be powerless to convict. I would not be understood as wishing to see these men—or for that matter, any men—in prison; for my wish is the exact opposite to that. No one can safely judge men; no one is wise enough to know what is justice in any case"—when Brand Whitlock delivers himself of that sort of stuff in a paper as widely circulated as the Saturday Evening Post, he lends himself to making confusion worse confounded.

We who know enough to know that we are alive do know a few things to a certainty, and some of these are that theft, murder, bribery, perjury and subornation of perjury, extortion, however and by whomever committed, are criminal acts; that the greater, the richer, the more influential the criminal, the more certainly does he deserve the prison and all the ignominy that being clad in stripes can inflict upon him.

To see anyone in prison is a sorrowful sight. Crime in all its forms is melancholy, but when men, big men, such men as constitute the grafters of St. Louis and San Francisco, make the commission of crime a business method because it promises to be profitable, when such men are brought low and are made to suffer shame, they are as little entitled to be wept over and carried flowers to as any candidate for the gallows over whom sentimental spinsterhood ever shed unavailing tears.

While Brand Whitlock's article contains much truth, and is well meant, its general tendency is to paralyze the arm of righteousness and weaken that wrath against wrong that moved The Christ to slay scribes, pharisees, hypocrites, whited sepulchres. We may safely venture to be as unsparing as he.

Residence Option

Our "backbone" article on the Residence Option issue in San Francisco should prove of interest to every municipality in the state and every San Franciscan should be eager to understand exactly what is proposed. There has been in San Francisco, from its very birth until now, a certain contempt for and disregard of what people in other cities and other states think of it. This has proven at once costly and wholly unnecessary to the prosperity or to the liberty of the city. There are standards of virtue that every self-respecting city sets up, and one of these is that saloons shall not be allowed in residential districts. San Francisco needs the good opinion of the country now as never before. The shutting out of the prize fight and prize fight pictures has helped San Francisco. The confining of saloons to the commercial section of the city will be another step forward. Of itself, it is eternally a right thing to do. Mr. White's exposition of the issue is clear and convincing.

Smash Ahead

There never was reason to doubt that the United Railroads would do all in its power, covertly and overtly, to thwart, hinder, derail and wreck the Geary street municipal railway enterprise. The black flag may as well be hoisted one time as another. That fight has got to be another like the graft prosecution, a fight to a finish. In the United Railroads the city of San Francisco has a foeman worthy, and right richly well deserving, of its steel, keen edged, sharp pointed and plunged in clear to the hilt. It will not do to stop or to look back. Scoundrelism has been too successful in the case of the United Railroads people to pre-dispose them to be conciliatory or reasonable, and there is no reason why the people of San Francisco should be tender of the interests of that corporation. Smash ahead. It is the only way. San Francisco can stand it if the United Railroads can.

The Scale Not the Issue

Some time since this paper took the ground that it were better to foster the unionization of labor in Los Angeles, Portland, Tacoma and Seattle than to fight such organization here, and reasons were offered in support of the contention. The Pacific Outlook of Los Angeles objects on the ground that the San Francisco scale of wages, especially in the metals industries, is so high as to make it impossible for coast cities to compete with eastern cities. That may be true. Very likely it is. Pittsburg and Bethlehem work their workers seven days in the week and twelve hours a day, work them as they would not think of working mules or cattle. It is entirely possible that the San Francisco wage scale, with decent hours of labor, cannot, even with the protection of high freight rates, compete with those eastern hells of industry. If so, then the scale should be lowered until such industries can live here, but, whatever scale is established, it should be the same for all these coast cities and that cannot be without unionization, inter-municipal and interstate. The present condition of labor, partly unionized and partly non-unionized, cannot profitably continue, and for San Francisco to disunionize will not be so well for her coast competitors as for them all to unionize, too. With unionization there will be stability and permanency. Without it neither city will know how to bid on work and all relations will be strained.

The Buck Company Capitulates

It may be doubted if the shade of the late J. W. Van Cleave rests content at any time in that realm to which it has flitted, but if, now that the Buck Stove Company has capitulated, it be less than beside itself it is more calm than we have any right to suppose unless, indeed, news of the event has not filtered through the bars of that cage. That was a case of men fighting first and reasoning together afterward. The stove company was autocratic and not too just, whereupon organized labor fought it in all the ways it knows how to fight and, very likely, not always within the law or the rules of the game. Van Cleave took counsel of the spirit of belligerency rather than of sanity, and the consequences of that contest not only outlived him but will probably outlive his entire generation. And yet a deal of good may come out of it all, albeit with a deal of woe sustained by those through whom it comes. The supreme court of the United States may make the way clearer for those who come after. When the reconstructed court convenes it will be to confront issues that will go searching to the heart of things, and this will be one of them.

The Endowed Theatre

Percy MacKaye, litterateur, playwright, cultivated gentleman and clear thinker, has taken up the cause of the endowed theatre and, being endowed with imagination, looks forward to the time when the highest dramatic art will be under the administration and protection of the universities of this country, when the nation will sustain a theatre at Washington, when each state shall have one at its capital or elsewhere, when each municipality will sustain one or more at the public charge to the end that dramatic art may not only hold up before the face of society a mirror truly reflecting its own image as it is, but as it in good conscience ought to be. The presentation of this dream in skeleton may be as little attractive as skeletons normally are, but supplemented with the author's splendid reasoning and abundant information his message arouses enthusiasm and gives buoyancy to the hope that the box office may, one day, no more dominate dramatic art than it now dominates the pulpit or should dominate the press. All we need in order to bring such things to pass is to will that they shall be. Thinking so will make it so.

The Annual Railroad Wriggle

The State Board of Equalization is now in session listening with what patience it may to the annual railroad attempt to wriggle out of a just proportion of public taxation. The railroads have so long shirked their due portion of the public burden that they feel that their rights are being invaded if any attempt is made to make them bear their share. It was hoped that the four-per-cent-upon-the-gross-earnings tax, as a method of estimating valuation, might prove fair, but evidences are not wanting to show a disposition on the part of railroads to so sophisticate their statements of gross earnings as to make the basis of that system more like guesswork than accounting. For purposes of rate-making railroads generally hold that their actual valuation equals, or exceeds, their total of stocks and bonds. For purposes of taxation they have hitherto denied the truth of their own affirmation. Fortunately for California there is at least one man on the board, State Controller A. B. Nye, who will take the public into confidence at all times and puncture any little bubbles of pretense that may be placed before the board. He did that very neatly this week when he showed that the Santa Fe Company is bonded for $31,000 per mile, has outstanding stock issues of $25,000 and is assessed at only $20,000, or 36 per cent of the total value, whereas a 60 per cent valuation, such as other property owners pay on, would make its assessment $33,600 per mile instead of $20,000. Would not poor old Ripley throw a fit, though, if the Board of Equalization were to raise the assessment of the Santa Fe to that figure?

Kent's Commentary

Duncan McKinlay recently challenged William Kent to debate the issues of the day throughout the second congressional district. The letter of challenge so misrepresented Mr. Kent's statements as to make it evident to Mr. Kent that a fair presentation of the issues on the part of McKinlay could not be hoped for. Therefore he declined to meet him, but, that the people of the second district may not be under any misapprehension as to the issue, Mr. Kent has caused to be printed and distributed throughout the second district Mr. McKinlay's letter and his own reply thereto. No voter in that district should fail of reading these letters from end to end. They throw much light on the character of McKinlay, lack of which, by the way, is Mr. McKinlay's serious deficiency.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

We all of us remember that old story that used to be told us in our childhood (and how tenaciously do our memories cling to those old stories told us in our childhood) of the boy who was sent aloft on shipboard and, looking down, grew dizzy and near to falling when his father, on deck, called to him, "look up! look up!" and, looking up, his nerves regained their composure and he descended in safety.

Watch the crowd moving along the street and, now and again, one will see one plodding along with his eyes fixed upon the walk scarcely a yard in front of his feet. He sees where his feet are going but not whether he himself is tending, and he is in momentary danger of being run over by some careless driver of team or automobile. The habit of proceeding with head down renders one liable to bump into passers-by and whatever else crosses his path.

These physical manifestations of inability to look up are so common as not to occasion comment, but all do not realize that a spiritual inability to look up is even more common and more dangerous and as easily contracted.

For, if we make a success of what we are doing in the world we must rivet our attention to the task in hand. Concentration of mind and energy are essential to success in our modern competitive world where efficiency is demanded at every turn and small patience is had with dreamy, listless, nerveless folk who take hold of nothing with a will. How, then, shall we ever learn to have our attention upon our life work and still retain our ability to look up and look out, up toward higher things and out upon the ever widening field of human interest? By taking thought of it and deliberately planning to do it. There is no other way. If we let ourselves go, if we blindly follow the direction of least resistance, we shall become rutted, narrowed in our sympathies and selfish in our interests. While we cannot, by taking thought, add a cubit to our physical stature, we can add a mile to our mental, our moral, our spiritual natures.

To concentrate all the attention upon one interest all the time weakens one's powers even in that one direction. If one start out with the conception that money is the only good, and is resolved to devote himself wholly to making money, he will make money faster, and more of it in the end, if he give his acquisitive faculties a breathing spell now and again that they may recuperate. He will be the better financier for being a better gardener, student of art, history, sociology, psychology, literature or science.

The sin of our age and of our nation is its materialism, its relative over-valuation of creature comforts and financial power, but had we ordered our lives more wisely we Americans could have subdued a continent without ravaging it, developed railroads without pillaging the public, harnessed the waterfalls without extortion, converted cattle and hogs into beef and pork without becoming either bovine in our culture, or hoggish in our tendency to exploit rather than to conserve. Rest, we have learned, consists in changing the direction of our activities rather than in folding the hands and doing nothing.

Liberty is the bravest word in any language, the supreme desire of every aspiring soul, not liberty from the restraints of just laws, but liberty from bondage to task masters, liberty from toil unrequited, liberty from galling servitude to special interests; but where shall we find such a task master, such toil unrequited, servitude so galling as to ourselves through unfortunate habits we have permitted ourselves to form? And what inability so binds us down, so shackles our minds and imprisons our spirits as our inability to look up to higher things and to look out upon a broad range of interests when our souls make such easy surrender to one idea. Our souls are not as unconquerable as we sometimes boast them to be.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Concerning Our Long Ago Grandpas

Heretofore the genealogy experts have done fairly acceptable work. They have traced the ancestry of the son of his papa back to William the Conqueror, or Charlemagne, or Xerxes, or Adam, or somebody who was worth while, at the same time thoughtfully excluding any grandpas who were hanged or retired from public life on account of sheep-stealing, and the person who paid for the job was satisfied. Such slack work no longer will be acceptable, for Dr. F. Melchers, a German biologist, has traced the whole herd of us a great deal farther back than the Garden of Eden. He has discovered that all mankind is divided into four great race groups, one of which is descended from a chimpanzee, another from a gorilla, the third from a gibbon, and the fourth from an orang-outang. These great grandpas of ours used to gambol around in the respective trees to which their tails or their toe-nails would adjust themselves, and they absolutely refused to have anything to do with international arbitration; in fact, each tribe maintained its own Society Four Hundred, which was very exclusive and refused to have anything to do with the others. Hence it follows that the lineage of mankind is very pure. Dr. Melchers gives it, as follows: The negroes, the Zulus and the blonde races of northern Europe are descended from the gorilla; the Bushmen, the Lapps and southern Europeans are descended from the chimpanzee; the Tasmanians, Australians and southern Germans from the orang-outang, and the Mongolians and Malays from the gibbon. Now let the experts get busy. We who are proud of our ancestry will be satisfied with nothing less than a picture of the genealogical tree (now perhaps turned to coal) in which our revered grandparent gaily swung to and fro.

A "Marked Increase" in Ship-Building

Speaking of tubs, scows and things of that nature, has anybody observed that the federal bureau of navigation, in its report concerning ship-building in this country, proudly refers to "a marked increase over the previous year?" This sounds encouraging, but the encouragement wears thin when one inspects the figures the bureau presents in justification of its pride. During the fiscal year ending with June 30, 1502 merchant vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of 347,025, were built, as against 1362, with an aggregate tonnage of 232,816, in the previous year. Thus far the flush of conscious pride doesn't wear off, but it begins to do so immediately. In the tonnage of the year just ended was one steel vessel of 6975 tons and one wooden vessel of 3707 tons, and aside from these there was but one vessel exceeding a thousand tons in burden. The balance of our added commercial fleet averaged 224 tons each. Row-boats! Tub! Where is that flush of conscious pride now? Fifty or sixty years ago about two-thirds of American commerce was carried in American ships; now about one-thirteenth of it has that distinction. How our pride does ooze! Perhaps the bureau of navigation has been heeding the hen that cackled because it had laid the smallest egg.

How the Ships of War Pass

"Men may come, and men may go."
Straight truth, without a flicker,
But here's another truth we know,
That ships of war go quicker.

Just by way of illustration of the foregoing unclassical sentiment: In 1891 Germany built a battleship which was named the Frithjof. It now is obsolete, and the other day a ship of war to take its place was launched. Now note the difference that just nineteen years have made in war vessels. The displacement of the Frithjof was 4,049 tons, of the new vessel 22,000, or more than five to one; the length of the former was 267 feet, of the latter 490 feet, nearly two to one; horse-power, 4,800 and 28,000, nearly six to one; weight of gunfire, 1,614 and 14,120, eight or nine to one; cost, $875,000 and $11,000,000, or more than twelve to one. Going some, is it not? A great deal of territory to cover in less than two decades, or before the babe has become a voter. And the people, the dear, toiling, perspiring and sometimes hungering people, pay the bills. Also, that kind of thing is not confined to Germany. In this "land of the free and home of the brave," we, too, fairly dote on going down into our pocketbooks to pay for warships to replace warships to replace yet other warships to replace—but the reader may continue the sentence at will. And it has been nineteen slow-creeping centuries since One came out of Nazareth to teach us the cure for such ill. Ah, we learn and we Christianize but slowly.

To Lie, or Not to Lie

Just by way of arousing tranquil interest attention is called to the fact that the British divorce commission not long ago ran against a snag in the form of the old question, Is a lie ever justifiable? Lord Guthrie insisted that it is not. He said that a man who would sidestep the truth ought to be ashamed of himself and that a woman always should be at home when she is at home. Professor Paterson, who is something of a li—that is, who believes in upcutting the truth if it seems advisable, asked the noble lord if he did not believe it right to lie to save a man's life. The noble lord responded that he would feel sorry for the man, but he couldn't prevail upon himself to do it. Nothing was said about what he would do if the man were a woman, so that question still is unsettled. The battle was waged through several columns of print, but it merely is of mild interest to the vast majority of us. Lying may be wrong, but we will continue to do just about as we always have done.

A Surprise For the Musical

Ever since man first twanged a harp or tuned a lyre, or since about that time, there has been a popular theory that stringed instruments improve with age. Give a Stradivarius or a Guarnerius their centuries of ripening, we have said, and the very soul of melody is confined to them. Well, the theory recently was tested in Paris. The test was made on violoncellos, and those who made it were well known musicians. There were twelve of the 'cellos, six of modern manufacture and six famous ancient instruments. In a darkened room an expert played the same concerto on all of these instruments, one after another. Then a vote was taken—mark you, by recognized musical authorities—and the new 'cellos scored 1464 points, while the ancient instruments scored but 883. It was an inglorious defeat for the rare old 'cello in the house of its friends. And here, perhaps, is the moral of it: The old instruments were catalogued at $30,000; the list price of the new was $800—thirty-seven to one paid for a distinction that is somewhat less than imaginary. The result of the test appears like a solar plexus for the old, old theory.

The Wealth of New York City

Let us consider for a moment the wealth of New York City, thus endeavoring to form a conception of the extent to which the riches of this great country have been piled up in its metropolis. The assessed valuation of the real and personal property, and it is well known that the latter largely escapes valuation, is $7,044,000,000. This is just about one-fifteenth of the total wealth of the people of the United States at the time of the latest estimate. That is to say, we have piled one-fifteenth of our entire wealth on a strip of land a few miles long by some miles less in width. This valuation of $7,044,000,000, which is recognized to be a great undervaluation in the matter of personal property, is divided among, perhaps, 5,000,000 people, and, if equally divided, it would give $1409 apiece to each one of them all, or $7,045 to each head of a family of five persons. If that division were equal—if there were no multi-millionaires in New York City—the average resident evidently would be comfortably fixed financially; with such division as exists, we have Fifth avenue and the East Side neighboring each other. Of course we are proud of New York City, outside of Wall street, but, query: May it not be possible to over-invest in it?

Tribe of Human Pygmies Discovered

Far back in the mountain regions of Dutch New Guinea a British exploring party has discovered a tribe of veritable human pygmies. They are black, these little people, so black that the proverbial ace of spades would appear a delicate tan by comparison, and the average height of the males is about four feet and three inches. With broad, flat nose and kinky hair, they seem a miniature edition of the larger negro tribes. They are said to be rather genial, to steal by virtue of such self-made law as they recognize, to be unprogressive, wedded to their institutions whether good or bad, neither looking for nor desiring betterment, opposing all improvement and appearing to dread it—in short, there is not an insurgent among them. The members of the exploring party report that it probably will not be possible to make them realize their forlorn condition.

Berlin To Be a Seaport

It is officially announced that before another two years have passed Berlin, for the first time in its history, will be a seaport. This great end will be attained by the completion of the canal to that city from Stettin. The canal will be 82 miles in length, and while it will not be of sufficient capacity to accommodate the most gigantic freighters, it will suffice for all except the largest, thus receiving cargoes without breaking bulk from all seaports throughout the world.

Church—I see the Gaekwar of Baroda left for Europe on the Mauretania, yesterday. Gotham—Indeed! Why I didn't know it had been played here at all yet!—Yonkers Statesman.

"Of course," said Dr. Price, "I cannot properly treat your case without a diagnosis." "Don't let that worry you," replied Mr. Nuritch, haughtily; "I got barrels o' money. I suppose that's the medical word for 'fee in advance,' eh?"

Union Square Hotel

POST STREET
At Stockton

Best Location in San Francisco; Faces Union Square
and the Victory Monument

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PLANS

Terms Moderate

Cuisine Excellent

Take Sutter St. Cars to Stockton St.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES
AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

FROHMAN'S NEW PLAYS

Charles Frohman recently returned from Europe and announced his plans for next season. As Frohman's new plays are next year's theatrical fare, the Pacific Coast is interested. He said:

"Mr. Drew will reopen the Empire theatre with W. Somerset Maugham's four-act play, 'Smith,' that I produced in London. At the Lyceum, in August, I shall produce 'The Brass Bottle.' At the Garrick I produce a new farce called 'Love Among the Lions,' and at the Knickerbocker the musical play that has been running two years at the Gaiety theatre, London, called 'Our Lady Gibbs.' Several of the London Gaiety favorites will come to America for this production. The Criterion theatre will open with James Forbes's play, 'The Commuters,' and as soon as I can get another theatre I shall produce a new play by Henry Arthur Jones.

"Maude Adams will play 'Chantecler' in New York during the winter, and later in other large cities. Miss Adams, in all that she has said of this play, shows much of the reverence and affection for 'Chantecler' that she felt for 'Peter Pan.' Ethel Barrymore will have her choice of three plays for her reappearance in New York next winter, and Sir Arthur Pinero intends, I am glad to say, to write a new play for her directly she finishes his 'Mid-Channel.' For Miss Billie Burke I have a new play by the authors of 'Love Watches.' William Gillette will appear in a repertoire of his former successes, and also in a new play. For Otis Skinner I have a Comedie Francaise play called 'Sire,' written by Henry Lavedan, author of 'The Duel.' Annie Russell will appear under my management this season, beginning in November, in a new comedy, which is yet unnamed, but is ready for production.

"For Marie Doro I have a new comedy written by Mr. Gillette, called 'Electricity,' for September production. Kyrle Bellew will begin his season in October in Henri Bataille's 'The Scandal,' playing the part taken in Paris by Lucien Guitry. Francis Wilson will continue throughout America in 'The Bachelor's Baby,' and later on tour in this farce abroad. During the season I will produce with William H. Crane a new play called 'Grumpy,' by the authors of 'Sunday.' I shall begin Marie Tempest's season in Philadelphia in October, and in a dramatic play called 'A Thief in the Night.' The G. P. Huntley and Hattie Williams combination will begin the season in September in a comedy that has pleased Paris greatly, which in English will be called 'The Sacred Forest.' I shall have a remarkable cast for the play.

"I have a new play by Augustus Thomas called 'The Jew,' which will be produced under Mr. Thomas's direction in November; a new comedy by Winchell Smith, a new play by Mr. Gillette, a dramatization of 'White Magic,' by Graham Phillips and Walter Hackett, and new comedies by Sir Arthur Pinero and Hubert Henry Davies, the latter called 'The Single Man.' London will see the last play in September. I have a new comedy by J. M. Barrie and a new play by Alfred Sutro, called 'The Fire Screen.' And I am glad to say I have a new play by Henri Bernstein, which will be ready for production at the Comedie Francaise in October, and will be produced here in January. It is called 'After Me.' One of the successes of the season in Paris I have is Henri Bataille's 'The Foolish Virgin,' which I shall produce here in November. I also have the delightful comedy, 'The Unknown Dancer,' from the Athenee theatre, Paris; a strong and novel drama by Leonard Merrick and Michael Morton, called 'The Impostor'; another drama called 'A Bolt from the Blue'; also 'The Tenth Man,' a Duke of York's theatre success; a comedy called 'Chains,' and a play from the Renaissance theatre in Paris, called 'A Woman Passed By.'

"Sir Conan Doyle has just made a great success in London with his new play, 'The Speckled Band,' an adventure of Sherlock Holmes. It is mine for America, and I purpose producing it both in New York and Boston as quickly as I can arrange the casts. I shall produce here Mr. Barrie's wonderful little play called 'The Twelve-Pound Look.' I have also what I consider a very remarkable play, with a fine part for a young actress, called 'Montmartre.'

"The day before I left London I bought a new four-act comedy by the late Capt. Robert Marshall and Mrs. G. R. Jennings, called 'The Second Footman,' which soon will be produced in London. I have a new comedy by Pierre Wolf, called 'A Man Passing,' and a comedy called 'The Dressmaker,' now running in Budapest. Sir John Hare will appear at my Repertoire theatre, London, next winter in several plays, and then play here under my management. Marie Lohr, the popular young London actress, will play under my management the coming season on both sides of the ocean.

"Besides 'Our Miss Gibbs' I have for America a new musical play called 'The Doll Girl,' book by the author of 'The Merry Widow,' and the music by the authors of 'The Dollar Princess.' It will be produced in Berlin in October, and by George Edwardes in London. I also have Leo Ball's musical play, which will be produced in Vienna in November, called 'La Belle Risetete,' and a new musical play that Mr. Edwardes will produce in London. I shall have eleven new productions ready by the middle of September, and then many others will follow."

Californian Poets' Corner

RESURGO

By Joseph T. Goodman

Though we grow obsolete and worn,

We still are like the leafless tree
That has a sense of blossoms borne,
If not of fruitage yet to be.

Beneath the torpor and the throes,
Which are time's bearing and device,
A viewless undercurrent flows
Like living water under ice.

For while to-day in listlessness
I noted earth and heaven and wind—
Barren and bleak and colorless
As the complexion of my mind—

There broke out of the leaden sky
A sweet clear trill—one strain, no more;
The unseen songster drifted by,
And all was vacant as before.

But that remembered wildwood note,
Sung with such carelessness and haste,
Shook me convulsively and smote
A rock within the desert waste,

From which a stream of memories
Burst forth and brought a flow of tears
That watered all the dust that lies
Between me and my better years.

I saw dear faces that are veiled
Or turned so that I may not see;
I heard kind voices that are stilled
Or silent as if dead to me;

I kissed sweet lips, I clasped true hands,
I walked by many a comrade's side,
And saw o'er all the smiling lands
The splendor of life's morning tide.

It went as it had come, the glow
Departed with the wildwood strain;
But age sits lighter since I know
Some bird may bring me youth again.

JONES ON PREACHY PLAYS

Speaking at a dinner recently given in London, Mr. Henry Arthur Jones deplored the modern tendency of regarding the theatre as a substitute for the school and the pulpit, says the New York Times.

It could be claimed that there were many bright and encouraging signs in the dramatic atmosphere, he said. But it was a fatal error to dwell complacently on our virtues and achievements. To rest and be thankful was the sign of old age and decrepitude, and he proposed to notice a rather disquieting symptom of the present dramatic movement. A noticeable feature in the English drama of recent years had been an assumption that the drama in the future must do something that the drama has never done before; that it must be pre-eminently a direct, explicit, and merciless expounder and enforcer of ethical, social, political, and scientific doctrines and theories.

It had lately been claimed that the national drama should make for righteousness—a general and lofty sentiment which commanded ready and unstinted approval. If the English drama made for anything after the authors' fees had been duly provided for, the surplus should unquestionably make for righteousness. But what sort of righteousness should the drama make for? "The plot is the first thing," said Aristotle. Not the chief thing, but the first thing. Character-drawing, literature, ideas, philosophy, righteousness itself, could only be effectively introduced into a play that had already been provided with a definite, articulate, vertebrate scheme of action.

Further, it had lately been said that our national drama should be normal. He was wholeheartedly in accord with the dictum, but he would not be cruel enough to inquire how far many of our recent masterpieces had been "normal" and addressed to the normal man. There was a constant tendency among young artists in every art to rebel against all its conventions, to rebel against the necessary and eternal conventions, as well as against the outworn and dying conventions. The man who could not do a sane strong thing would always do an eccentric thing, a perverse thing. So that it was a good sign when they came across a recognition and declaration that the English drama should be normal and addressed to the average normal man.

LITERARY BEGINNINGS

Being Selected First Lines of Some Forthcoming Best Sellers, as Vouched for by The New York Times.

"Oh, hell," growled the Yukon Yap, "I'll get you for that!"—The He-Wolf's Fang, by Jack London.

"Bertie Vanknickerhyde, descending the onyx, gold-inlaid steps of the Millionaires' Club, paused to light his famous pipe, carved from the Black Pearl of Samarcand, with a P. & R. bond of ten-thousand-dollar denomination."—The Chimpanzee-Toasters, by Upton Sinclair.

"It is wholly (I use the word advisedly with due regard to the full force of its etymology) a matter of conjecture whether Aline Allingham, having looked into the inmost, hidden, subventricular recesses of her heart—a heart which no one could have called unduly susceptible to amatory, exclamatory phases—phases which are and will ever be," &c.—A Lady's Tintype, by Henry James.

"Whoop—whoop—listen at me—I quiver—I tremble—I've got 'em again."—Pyrotechnics of Mary MacLane.

"Great Tooth, the grizzly, lumbering out of the forest, slouched down upon a slab of rock and began to figure out the square root of $x^3 + z^2$."—Memoirs of Cock Robin, by Thompson-Seton.

It is understood that Olga Nethersole has the plot of a play which Maurice Maeterlinck is to write for her. She will appear in it first in this country, and, Maeterlinck's wife, Georgette Le Blanc, will appear in it at Paris at the same time.

TEACHING TEACHERS TO PLAY

AND THE GOOD TIMES IT GIVES THE CHILDREN

If you feel lonely, or blue, or old, or as if there was a cloud between you and the sun, go to California Field, on the campus of the State University at Berkeley, and watch the children play. You can't put in a happier hour any afternoon (except Saturday and Sunday). It costs nothing but the carfare, and there is more of the elixir of life in it than Ponce de Leon ever hoped to find. Children in groups of ten, children in groups of twenty, children by the hundred, and not an unhappy face among them, everybody having the time of their young lives. As they themselves would say, "It's great!"

Why are they there? No, the university hasn't intentionally thrown itself open as a joy-factory for the boys and girls. No, this is an intellectual training school for teachers, and the university continues to pursue its sober ideal of teaching somebody something. But, bless you, the boys and girls don't know it—lucky youngsters!—they know simply that somebody passed the word down through child-dom, "Something doing at California Field," and they found that the word was joyfully, unbelievably, true.

To speak quite seriously, all this riot of childish games and dances and enthusiasm is an incident to the Playground Courses of the University of California Summer School. Now don't be frightened by the awe-inspiring names of these courses—they sound terrible, but they are transmuted gloriously in practice into happiness for hundreds of children. Course 1 is on "The Nature and Function of Play." Course 2 is on "Playground Administration." Course 3 is on "Folk Dances." Course 4 is on "Playground Games." Course 5 is on the "Practical Application" of the preceding courses.

From the point of view of the university, these children playing here by the hundred are simply the necessary apparatus to be used for the purposes of practical study of playground work by the students of the summer school. These students are nearly all school teachers, and they come from every state on the Pacific Coast. Altogether, 260 men and women have registered for these courses in playground work. Of these, 39 are studying to go into playground work as a life profession, seeking positions in the city playgrounds that are now being opened by the score all over the United States. One hundred and twenty school teachers are registered for the whole five courses, 80 are registered for the course in games and 79 for the folk dances.

The courses are given by Dr. E. C. Beach, who is the head of the department of physical training and hygiene of the Los Angeles high schools, and director of physical training in the grade schools of Los Angeles. Here, again, don't let big titles convey a wrong impression. Dr. Beach, for all his titles and his long training, appears to the children who see him only as a young man with a clean-cut, sunburned face, clear and laughing eye, and the spirit of childhood strong in him to enjoy playing with the children. It is play he teaches, not "exercise" nor "drills." He is not trying to "do good to somebody," but to teach the boys and girls how they can have more fun of their own kind than they ever dreamed they could have until he showed them how.

Dr. Beach is admirably equipped for the work by training as well as by disposition. He took the pre-medical course at Stanford University for two years and then for five years was engaged in practical playground work in Baltimore. For the last two years he has held the positions in Los Angeles that are named above.

Dr. Beach is assisted in the courses by Mrs. Marion P. Morgan, who is an instructor in the Manual Arts High School of Los Angeles. Mrs. Morgan is a graduate of the New York Normal School of Physical Instruction.

But to get back to the courses with the big names. The first two of these—on the nature and function of play and on playground administration—are the theoretical part of the work. Only the teachers hear all this profound wisdom about the psychology of the childish mind, the history of games, and the reason why of the whiciness of the what. In all the other courses the children get a look-in, in fact, so far as they know, they are the whole thing. Of course, Mrs. Morgan, who is a specialist on folk-dances, puts the teachers through the steps and the history of the dances in the classroom, but right afterwards the teachers put the children through the steps, minus the history, and all the children know is that they are having a fine time learning new dances besides the Virginia reel.

And by the way, folk-dances have nothing in common, in spirit or movement, with the short-arm two-step or the half-Nelson waltz. They are the national dances of the various nations, dances that grew up among the common people out of the conditions of their life that shaped their amusements, out of such festival occasions as the vintage of Italy and the sheep-shearing time of Scotland and the harvest of Norway. Often they are symbolical. Always they are a cultivating power for naturalness and grace. And they are great fun, which is the important thing besides the exercise.

The children get in on the Playgrounds Games course to the limit of enjoyment. After Dr. Beach and Mrs. Morgan have taught the teachers the rules of volley-ball, hand-ball, captain-ball, croquet, and the rest of the playground games and, furthermore, made the teachers play the games themselves, the teachers go out to California Field and pass their new-found knowledge and skill along to the children.

This is a great sight. On the huge field, with its acres of bleachers on either side, are twenty or thirty groups of thirty or forty children apiece. The boys are all kept at one end of the field, the girls at the other. Then the boys are "graded," according to age and weight, so that those in any game are practically all of the same size, in order that they may be matched as evenly as possible and that no boy in a group shall feel at a disadvantage in his play. The girls are similarly graded. Then the games begin. Here a crowd of girls ten years old, or thereabouts, are playing volley-ball. Next to their game is a hand-ball court, where girls of twelve are playing. Nearby are swings, in which girls of six and eight are swinging high—the "cat" never "dies" on these swings. Next to the swings are see-saw boards, with one, two or three girls on either end. On a bank at one end of the field, little girls of three and four are coasting down smooth slides. And over by the bleachers, away from any chance of interference from the games on the field, are the sand boxes, where the little tots are building sand castles and getting covered with "clean dirt" to their superlative delight.

At the boys' end of the field, hand-ball games are in progress, a baseball game or two is being played, youngsters are vaulting the wooden "horse," and races are being run. These races are all sprints, short distance races that test speed and wit but do not test endurance. No long races are allowed. Some races are run in relays. These relays are run on a straightaway course and return, not on a circular track.

Behind the bleachers, in a quiet spot away from the noise of the playground, a teacher is holding the "story hour." This is especially popular just after lunch and again when the children are tired out with play. Here again the play is graduated to suit the age of the children. To the little ones are told the old nursery tales of "Jack, the Giant Killer," of "Little Red Riding Hood," and the other classics of childhood. To the older children are read "Grimm's Fairy Tales" and stories of the age of chivalry, the romances that from immemorial time have fired the imaginations and fed the love of moving narrative of children.

As this whole playground pleasure is part of the equipment of a university course, the university supplies all the apparatus. Here is where the teachers, in turn, get part of "Course 5, Practical Application." Every afternoon one teacher is put in entire charge of the playground. He, or she, is then responsible for the enforcement of playground rules, the preservation of order, the settlement of disputes, and for the proper use and the return of the apparatus. He must see that the hand-balls and croquet sets and baseball outfits are returned in good order, must judge the rate of wear and tear upon apparatus and, in general, keep a systematic record of this important part of the work.

These playground courses are especially interesting to educators because they are the first attempt ever made by an American university to teach the science and practice of playground work in a summer school. If the enthusiasm with which the children offer themselves as subjects for study is any test of the success of the experiment, the faculty can have no grounds for complaint. Dr. Beach's records show that on some days the attendance of children has been as high as 1,100, and that the average daily attendance is about 700. And the registration of 260 teachers, from all the coast states, for a six weeks' course, extending from June 20th to July 29th, is an indication of the popularity of the idea amongst educators.

It is pleasant to contemplate the results of these teachers' studies in playground work. In the first place, the 39 who are training for professional playground work are fitting themselves to teach the children of the city streets the joy of organized play on grounds set apart for them by the city, away from the streets, where the ground is their very own and where the sole ambition of the directors is to make them enjoy themselves in true childhood fashion. These 39 will join the ranks of a profession that is reducing crime and misery faster than police courts and charities ever dreamed they could be. Every one of the 39 will displace twenty policemen, and get better order amongst city children by the rule of love and by comradeship in play than the twenty policemen could ever get by the rule of force. Every one of the 39 will go out as an agent of civilization, a centre of uplift in as many cities.

Of the others, the teachers will go back to their schools with a new conception of the possibilities for understanding and mutual sympathy with their pupils by reason of their new knowledge of the common bond of fellowship in the spirit of play. Every one of these teachers has had his youth renewed by contact with childhood in the intimacy and freedom of childish games. These things mean that school days will be happier to thousands of children because of this greater intimacy with teachers who join in and enjoy their sports. And this means, again, a gain in scholarships. Not only will the children's minds be clearer for well-directed play, but they will respond more readily to the instruction of the teacher who they know can be, upon occasion, one of themselves.

So we repeat: if you have lost your power to feel the emotions of childhood, if you feel old, or blue, go over to the campus and watch the youngsters play. You will grow young in spite of yourself, your lips will unconsciously turn to smiles for days afterward at the recollection of childish happiness. The trip is a good investment, cheap at the price. Maybe you will even remember, all suddenly, that you yourself were once like that. Then children will rise up and call you blessed. Try it.

There is a story of Thomas Bailey Aldrich to the effect that his editorial sanctum was for a long time shared by a favorite dog—a red setter. One day the dog ate up a sonnet. "Poor creature," remarked Mr. Aldrich sympathetically, "How could he know that it was doggerel?"—Christian Science Monitor.

In Boston—"Say, I'm a stranger in this town. Can you tell me a good place to stop at?" "Yes, sir. Stop just before the 'at.'"—Cleveland Leader.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Our Golden West

"I have builded an earth," said the great Lord God,
 "I have builded an earth more fair
 Than the vap'rous spheres by the angels trod,
 And man is my creature there.
 He shall lay him down in the pleasant vales
 And bide with my angel, Rest,
 While the stars and planets shall whisper tales
 To him, in my Golden West."

Oh, the shine of the suns, and the flowers abloom,
 And the song of the birds in the sky's blue room,
 And the brown-green earth by the days caressed
 In the home of our love in the Golden West.

"Now the earth is fair," said the great Lord God,
 "With beauty its robe I hem,
 And the buds that spring from the dun, dark sod
 Are gems in its diadem.
 Yes, I love the grace that my strong hand made
 As chaos I shaped and blest,
 But the home of beauty, in glen or glade,
 Is e'er in my Golden West."

Sparkle of waters that glisten and gleam,
 And nights when the stars are a poet's dream;
 Glory that dreamers but vaguely have guessed,
 In the home of our love in the Golden West.

And ever since then—it was long, long ago—
 In the Westland is Beauty the queen.
 She reigns on the peaks in the glint o' the snow;
 She rules where the meadows are green;
 She sings us a song in the murmuring breeze,
 And our hearts to her bosom are pressed.
 "Dear soul," is her whisper, "find comfort and ease
 Out here, in my Golden West."

Bright days, like the pearls that maidens have strung
 On thread of the nights, and, stringing, have sung:
 "Oh, land of rare bounty, by Summer caressed,
 We love thee forever, our own Golden West."

Found a Good Business Opportunity

The Imp—You remember that enterprising insurance agent we brought in here yesterday?
 His Evil Majesty—Yes. What about him?
 "He has started an insurance business down here on the corner of Redhot street and Still-hotter avenue."
 "So? He can't be insuring against fire, I suppose."
 "No, against damage by water."

An Appeal to Janet

"Oh, loosen the snood of your hair, Janet."
 Let me see how it looks on the bureau, my pet,
 For, considering the price that you paid for the wad,
 The length of it shouldn't be less than a rod.
 On those tresses so bonnie I'm yearning to gaze
 In a spasm of awe and a trance of amaze,
 But, oh, when you wear them, my darling, my pet,
 Be sure that the hairpins don't loosen, Janet.

Knew About Angel Children

First Cat—Where are you going in such a hurry?
 Second Cat—Oh, a new family has moved into my house.
 "Well, what of it?"
 "I heard the woman say that her little boy is a perfect angel of a child."

The Opinions of Rufus

I'm glad to b'lieve you've found the food of faith that's satisfyin' to your soul, oh, my brother, but I can't help callin' your 'tention to the fact that the mushmelon that one revels in makes another man sick.

I'm grateful that some folks are reel rich, fer if they wan't there'd be neither news nor pictures for the enlightenin' an' enlivenin' Society page in the daily papers.

When folks git so they never feel no yearnin' aspirashuns to git up on a pillar an' be looked at by everybody I don't b'lieve they'll ever 'mount to much.

Jabe Perkins says that, es a bach'ler, he can't see any reason why married men object to buttonin' them up the back; says he reckons he'd be willin'.

I understand that the author of How to Be Happy Though Married is writin' another book that 'll be called, How to Be of Some Use Though the Child of a Rich Pa.

Patient perseverance conquers all things, 'less, o' course, you're married to her.

The poet says that friendship is a sacred trust, but it's 'bout the only one I know of that is.

It's mighty curious that folks that change their minds often hardly ever change 'em fer one that's worth while.

I s'pose if a reel good partisan had to take his choice 'tween his party an' his country he'd shed a few tears es he bid his country good-bye.

The way of the transgressor may be hard, but I know several of them that ride in their own automobiles.

It may be an overrulin' Providence that sends a rich an' racy murder often 'nough to keep the daily papers goin', but sometimes I doubt it.

* * *

Concerning Our Dunc

Concernin' our Dunc—
 Our Dunc was a chap with a versatile jaw
 Which worked in a manner to fill you with awe.
 While others had talkers that frequently balked,
 He talked and orated, orated and talked.
 He would prove that the tariff was high, don't you know,
 Or, if you preferred, he would prove it was low,
 And the people all cried as they listened,
 "Hurrah!
 Perpetual motion? Just look at his jaw!"
 Our dear Dunc.

Concernin' our Dunc—
 A duffer named Kent arose in his place
 And urged that a jaw isn't all of a face,
 And added, "I deem it a definite law
 That a head full of brains beats the wag of a jaw."
 Oh, Duncan was startled, and Duncan was grieved.
 It was treason to all he had lived and believed,
 But he seized on his trusty old tongue, and he went
 To smite with his jaw the duffer named Kent.
 Our dear Dunc.

Concernin' our Dunc—
 There's a wild-wagging tongue in the vales of Marin
 Which coy Sacramento has heard with a grin;
 There's a jaw that's unresting in Yolo and Lake,
 And Duncan's franked speeches an engine might break;
 And as the days hasten this duffer named Kent
 In the plans of our Duncan is making a rent,
 For the people remark, "We are weary of jaw,
 This Kent is our friend; so it's for him, hurrah!"
 Our poor Dunc!

Thoughtful Man on Mistakes of Johnson

"The trouble with Hiram Johnson as a candidate," the Thoughtful Man observed, "is that he has nothing to say on the crucial issues of the day. The tariff question, for instance, is a bone of contention on which the slaver of patriotic parties never should be permitted to dry, yet the heedless Johnson passes it by."

"Republicans are in favor of tariff protection—unless they have nothing to protect, and Democrats are opposed to it—unless they have something to protect. You will find it so everywhere."

"Says the earnest-hearted Democrat: 'I denounce this foul and shameful protection, except for my prune orchard. Prunes need protection, for they are an infant industry, and have been ever since I can remember,' says he."

"Says the great-souled Republican: 'I am heartily in favor of the noble and inspiring protective tariff, and I'll be more so when I get something ahead. It encourages infant industry,' says he, 'and my infants are not industrious, and need that kind of encouragement.'"

"I blush to say it," said the Thoughtful Man, "but Mr. Johnson rarely mentions the dearly beloved and much chewed tariff question. Again, there is the good-roads issue. As everybody knows, this state is largely populated by people who are deadly opposed on principle to good roads. 'Death to good roads!' these people cry. 'We insist on riding over jolts.' Curry, Ellery and Anderson have heroically called attention to this shameful condition and burning issue, but Johnson disgracefully refuses to discuss it. He says it is the people's first duty to remove the dishonoring S. P. brand from their costume and—"

"Well, but isn't the brand there?" I interrupted.

"Good heavens!" the Thoughtful Man replied. "Haven't they worn it for 30 or 40 years? Have the eels a right to demand that time to get used to being skinned? Well, then!"

* * *

Anderson and Curry Interviewed

Feeling that the attitude of gubernatorial candidates, with reference to the dominance of the Southern Pacific Political Bureau in the political affairs of California, is of vast importance to the people, The California Weekly has, at cost of considerable labor and expense, secured interviews with both Mr. Curry and Mr. Anderson on this subject, at the same time urging them to speak frankly and without mental reservation. Mr. Anderson, who was first seen, thought deeply before expressing his views, and then said:

".....why.....
which.....business interests.....
?.....what.....?.....tariff.....
wherefore.....$.....horticulture.....
$!.....when.....unnecessary.....
$?$$!!!.....notwithstanding.....perhaps..... respectability.....whom.....?"

Mr. Curry showed no reticence whatever in expressing his views, and spoke freely as follows:

".....Halley's comet.....
the Weather Bureau.....
 the polar expedition.....direct contact.....
 the Royal Arch.....yes.....yes.....
as you please.....myself.....
soap.....nice day.....yes.....
certainly.....no doubt.....yes....."

While these candidates heretofore have expressed these same views to some extent, The California Weekly congratulates itself that this is a more complete exposition of their deeper feeling than heretofore has been obtained.

* * *

Not Otherwise Noticeable

"Is he a man of grace?"
 "Well—yes—that is, before eating."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Doing Politics With Poison Every dish set before the Czar of Russia must be tasted in his presence by the chef responsible for its preparation lest the Czar be put out of the way by poison. About the time that America was discovered the Latin-European countries had reduced politics-by-poison to a fine art and the name "Borgia" became a never dying stench in the nostrils of humanity. One Dr. Hyde has been convicted at Kansas City, Missouri, of having introduced typhoid germs into the persons of certain of his patients, for mercenary rather than for political reasons, however, but with murderous intent and to murderous effect. Poison has played a great part in the political and the financial history of the world.

But we are admonished to "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell," and that is the manner of man whom the People of California have present cause to fear.

When the historian of the future comes to write dispassionately of the graft prosecutions in San Francisco the burden of his theme will be the signal success with which relentless men deliberately poisoned the mind of a great city. No other factor of the generalship of a successful rascality is comparable with that of feeding the public mind with poisoned reading matter until that mind becomes deranged and unhealthy. The very souls of the people of San Francisco were endangered for they no longer knew good from evil. It is as easy to poison the minds of people through what they read as to poison the body through what they eat, and we have many Borgias and Hydes in California now seeking to debauch the minds of the electorate. Fear them.

Power of the Check-Book Evidences are not wanting to show that the check-book of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company is to be drawn upon unlimitedly from now until the end of the primary campaign, and in the interests of the candidacy of Alden Anderson. From many sources come inklings of this truth and, strange as it may appear, assaults by check-book are mainly to be made upon the strongholds of Charles F. Curry, a life-long politician of the "organization" type and one who has been a beneficiary of the Political Bureau for a score of years.

The explanation of the phenomenon is, perfectly simple. Mr. Anderson's champions can procure votes for Mr. Anderson through the check-book from only one source. There is only one place where they are to be had and that is from the ranks of those who would naturally be for Charles F. Curry. Mr. Curry's hold on his constituents is only through personal affection, through the fact that he is their kind of man. It is a spirit of comradeship. The barkeeper, the McCarthy party man, the man who responds to the stimulus of prospective patronage—these are all normal Curry men, but they will not be able to withstand the check-book. Curry is there vulnerable as is no other gubernatorial candidate, and he is to be crushed if the power of money can crush him, or to be bought off if the power of money can buy him without establishing a more injurious precedent than to crush him. It is unfortunate for him and, perhaps, unfortunate for the state, that he has been so injured in an automobile accident as to hinder him in looking after his fences. It is important to the state that the unmoral element in our political life be divided, not solidified.

Hiram Johnson's Need For Money Hiram Johnson's following can little be affected by the check-book. It consists of that element in our body politic that is capable of a sustained moral purpose, and it is no more to be seduced from his cause by the use of money than the soldiers of Uncle Sam sent to the Philippines or to Cuba could have been corrupted with Spanish gold. The only need which the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has for money is to continue the speaking tours of its candidates, maintain its offices, pay for printing and for the purchase of postage stamps. For these uses there is great need for more money.

When the voter goes into his booth to cast his primary ballot he will find no party circle at the head of the League ticket, no column set apart for Johnson and his co-workers. It is as important to nominate the whole League ticket as to nominate Johnson. Somehow the personnel of that ticket must be placed in the hands of every Republican voter in the state. There are over 200,000 such voters. It will cost anyhow $5,000 to put a copy of that ticket into the hands of every such voter that all who are disposed to do so may carry a copy of the ticket into the election booth with them to be checked off on the card and stamped on the ticket to facilitate voting.

The League has no great corporation or alliance of corporations to finance this work and charge it up to legal and operating expenses and make the people pay the bill, principal and interest, nor has it any share in the million dollar patronage of the state administration. It can only check against the free-will offerings of men who want California to be a free state.

Must Give Or Be Sold The time will come when many of the necessary expenses of making political campaigns will be paid out of the common treasury, but it will never be that all such expenses will be so provided for. There will still be use for disinterested dollars to withstand the baneful onslaughts of dollars that are mercenary. We shall no more be able to provide all the sinews of war for political Right Things from a common treasury than we shall for all the charities which a needy world requires. Good men have got to learn to give for good causes or bad men will buy the public privileges they want and pay for them out of the wages of political sin.

For more than a generation political parties have derived their campaign funds mainly from big corporations. Sometimes such contributions were extorted through fear of adverse legislation, but more often the interests of the people were bartered away in exchange for brass bands, bonfires, hall rent, newspaper advertising and advocacy, hotel bills and railroad fares. For this reason good citizenship has not been taught to contribute for making campaigns for righteous causes. They must learn that lesson or be forced, through bad government, to contribute dollars where they might, with good government, have gotten off with dimes.

Progressive Republicanism has to go out to battle this August with a wily and unscrupulous foe backed by unlimited millions. Aside from the needs mentioned in the preceding paragraph watchers must be had at the polls all day on primary election day to see that no crookedness is permitted, and all night to see that the vote is honestly called, and reported. Not enough volunteers can be had who will be sure to be on hand. Experience has shown that, election morning, very many such are unavoidably detained by urgent business engagements elsewhere. In other words they flunk. But for $10 per voting place men can be hired to do this work who will do it well. For San Francisco alone that service will cost in excess of $3,500, and every precinct in every city in the state will need that kind of watching. The rural precincts seldom require anything of the kind. Where is this money coming from? There is but one source. Contributions from those who expect nothing in return but good government and a free state. Isn't that enough? Cannot the reader of this send enough to Adolph Uhl, treasurer, 717 Market street, to hire one watcher for some one polling place for election day and night? It will cost $10.

If the vote can all be gotten out, if it can be cast as the voter would like to cast it if he knew how, if it can be counted as cast, California will become a free state on and after August 16, and then we can celebrate Admission Day with a patriotic zeal worthy of the occasion.

Is the Power of Self-Help Lost? From over the state complaints come that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican committee has not come to their towns to organize them. This is another legacy from the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. For thirty years or more it has been the policy of corporation control of the Republican party not to stir up the animals. No encouragement has been lent to private initiative. Everything needed by the party has been done for the party from headquarters. If there has been organization work to be done some retainer has been sent out to do it and his salary and expenses have been paid. The League has strained every nerve to keep any headquarters at all, to keep men on the road to prepare for meetings to be addressed by state and district candidates, to get out the little literature that has been sent out, and there has been neither men nor money to send out to organize local districts. What is the matter with patriotic, progressive Republicans in every community in the state organizing the groups around them, making up a sum of money and sending it in to headquarters to help along the cause? If ever politics are put on a sound basis in this country the necessary expenses of making campaigns will have to flow from the outside in, not from the inside out as heretofore. Whoever furnishes the money for the conduct of campaigns will claim the advantages to be gained when a campaign is won. If the corporations furnish the money government will be in their interests. If the people furnish it government will be in their interests. The sooner this truth finds lodgment in the minds of all men the sooner will our political emancipation come.

Hiram Johnson's Oakland Meeting For some time rumor has been injuriously busy with the Lincoln - Roosevelt campaign in Alameda county. It has been alleged that Alameda county, and Oakland especially, was dead to Johnson if not to the world. Now this never was true, and the Johnson meeting in Oakland Saturday night proved it. The largest indoor meeting place in Oakland was jammed to the doors. Johnson made one of the best speeches ever made in a campaign in this state and he carried his hearers with him from beginning to end. That is, he demonstrated that Oakland has the same kind of people that other cities and towns have wherever Johnson has been, people who are sick and ashamed of having their state a political dependency of the Southern Pacific Company. The reason why no meetings were held earlier is that those in charge in Alameda county were anxious that the campaign might be short and that the interval between the launching of the progressive movement and the middle of July might be spent elsewhere rather than in Alameda county but that, from the Middle of July on until the votes are in, the campaign in Alameda might be prosecuted with vigor. Which was the better way is a question of sound judgment, but not a question of loyalty or lukewarmness for Johnson and the progressive Republican ticket.

For a Better Home For a Better Race Gifford Pinchot is not a man with a grievance, but a man with a message and that message to the people of California is from the people of all the eastern and middle western states to press forward in the movement to make California a free state and the United States a free country, to make legislation for the common good and not for the special benefit of special interests. It was a message gladly received in San Francisco, Sacramento and wherever heard. No better epitome of Pinchot's message can be given than the following from his San Francisco address. That same concept is profoundly stirring the hearts of the common people in every community in the United States. We California progressives are not alone. The woods and prairies, the cities and towns, are full of people who think and feel just as we do about the issue joined, which, as Mr. Pinchot conceives it, is this:

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

"It is a great fight, this matter of driving the trusts out of politics. It is going to be a long and a hard fight. There is no other government on earth under whose constitution property rights are as strong as ours. I believe in property. I believe in a square deal just as much for the rich man as for the poor man. But one thing must be clear. The constitution of the United States nowhere recognizes the political existence or the political rights of any corporation. If we are to have in this country free government, good institutions and a chance to make the nation what we all want to see it, a better home for a better race, then the special interests must be put out of politics."

How Intelligence Will Cast Its Vote If only those had the right of suffrage who possess a clear intelligence and clean moral character the campaign would be all over but the shouting. There has just been a convocation of Chautauquans at Yosemite Valley with five hundred persons present. A straw vote on the governorship was taken in which Hiram Johnson had a clear majority of forty over all competitors. While The Watchman believes that appeal can successfully be made, even in Tar Flat, on the issue of human rights, free government and honest, yet he has to admit that there are whole sections of cities and groups in small communities where such appeals are so seldom heard as to have lost, for the time being, their power to challenge attention. The fleshpots of Egypt are rated above the Promised Land. The lower the standards of intelligence and integrity the fewer followers Hiram Johnson has, and conversely reversely.

Duncan McKinlay's United States Mail President Taft is greatly exercised over the $17,000,000 deficit in postoffice revenues, or, rather, over the $17,000,000 of excess of expenditure over receipts, and well he may be. His attention is respectfully called to at least one item in that expense that might properly be cut out. At his Santa Rosa home Duncan E. McKinlay recently received fifty-five sacks of public documents, believed to have weighed not less than 115 pounds to the sack, or not less than 6,300 pounds in all, all franked to his address by himself. Furthermore, this stuff will no doubt all be franked out to constituents, merely to remind them that Duncan is alive (for the stuff itself is seldom worth storage room), making 12,600 pounds in all carried free, to no appreciable public use, for this one congressman. Inasmuch as it costs the government eight cents a pound to carry its mail the railroads that brought this litter to this coast, and that will distribute it over the second congressional district, will earn $1,008 on this one batch, and there is doubtless more to follow. Presuming that Duncan McKinlay is not a sinner over others, then the 391 members of the lower house will frank out mail during this campaign that it will cost the United States government $394,128 to deliver, and if the ninety-two United States senators do as well Uncle Sam is money out to the tune of nearly half a million for this one campaign, to say nothing of doing such things all the year round. No doubt a million a year could be saved by limiting the franking privilege to legitimate correspondence. Suffer those who want pub. docs. to pay the postage on them or go without.

Phillip Heim In The Thirty-Fourth The assembly fight in the Republican ranks in the Thirty-Fourth District, San Francisco, has brought out only two candidates before the Republican primary. These two are Phillip Heim and Thomas Feeley. The man who should be supported is Heim. He is a clean man, a mechanic, intelligent and honest. He will undoubtedly receive the endorsement of the Independent Republican Club of the district. His opponent, Feeley, is a member of the bartenders' union and a deputy sheriff in Tom Finn's office. He was also an avowed Democrat until the day before he announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination, an announcement made upon the suggestion of Finn just as Feeley was preparing to register as a Democrat. Feeley is receiving the "machine" support and should by all means be defeated.

Some Election Prognostications Guesses at the result of elections are not trustworthy enough to build on, but guesses from some sources are interesting and sometimes significant. For example, Meyer Lissner, the reform leader of Los An-has forfeited its right to appear on the primary election ballot because of the failure of the governing body of that party to comply with those sections of the law that require them to file a petition for a place on the ballot and to issue a call for a party convention. This decision makes it necessary for all voters registered as of the Union Labor party to change their declaration of party affiliation before next Wednesday or be disfranchised. The opinion seems to be widespread that the 5,000 Union Labor voters involved are a block of votes that can be delivered by McCarthy to the Republican "organization" for the benefit of Alden Anderson, and that the whole number are now re-registering as Republicans for that purpose. Probably it will be conceded that some of those who re-register will do so as Democrats, and that, of the others, some would naturally support Curry. But even of the remaining number, The Watchman declines to believe that they are herded cattle to be swung at the beck of McCarthy's hand, hither or yon. The Watchman has faith to believe that most of these voters are Men, and that the election returns will show that they refused absolutely to be herded for Anderson merely to carry out the agreement made by the irresponsible McCarthy with the Herrin machine at the time of the last city election in San Francisco.

POOR BAIT

geles, has compiled data received from private sources in all counties south of Tehachapi and in Tulare county, and from these data he estimates that Hiram Johnson will receive a plurality of 15,000 votes in the region described. This estimate is important because Mr. Lissner has managed and won several elections in Los Angeles city and county recently, and in every case his estimates of victory have been under the real figures. Another straw showing the direction of the wind is the odds of betting. Frank Daroux, the principal bookmaker of San Francisco, declares that Johnson is the favorite in the betting, and that while he has Johnson money there is little offered against it. Another straw is the case of R. E. Baines, a merchant of the Mission district of San Francisco, who has the reputation of having won every election bet he has made. Baines has bet $1,500 on Johnson and last Wednesday put up $500 more. He offers even money on Johnson against the field. His estimate of the vote is that 132,000 votes will be cast, divided approximately as follows: Johnson, 55,000; Curry, 37,000; Anderson, 23,000; Stanton, 12,000; Ellery, 5,000. In Alameda county, one of the pivotal counties in this election, C. E. Snook estimates that Johnson will receive between 4,000 and 5,000 plurality.

No State Ticket of Union Labor Party A decision handed down by the San Francisco Election Commission last Monday holds that the Union Labor party

Machine Double-Crossing James Word comes to The Watchman from trustworthy private sources that the "machine" despairs of beating Judge M. C. Sloss for one of the two candidatures for the Supreme Bench on the Republican ticket, and that it has passed the word down the line to mass all the organization's strength to the task of nominating Melvin over Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, the Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate, and over Judge James, of Los Angeles, the machine's own candidate from Southern California. The Watchman believes this report to be true, but he wastes few tears on the sad fate of Judge James, whom the machine is deserting. He knew the source of his support, and took his chances of machine treachery. But The Watchman is greatly concerned that Judge Wilbur is thus forced to make practically two men's fights at once for the nomination. Judge Melvin should be defeated. He is light weight and a better politician than a judge. If Melvin should defeat Judge Wilbur for the Republican nomination, The Watchman will heartily support Judge Lawlor, the Democratic nominee, as against him at the November election. After the primaries, partisanship has no place in the choice of judges, and Judge Lawlor is worth ten men of Judge Melvin's type. That issue would be clear to all thinking Republicans.

Labor Leaders Who Are For Johnson The report that the labor union voters of Sacramento have been lukewarm in their attitude toward Hiram Johnson may or may not be true, but if it is true those men should be informed that the following leaders of labor unionism endorse his candidacy: Richard Caverly, representative of the international of the Boilermakers Union; Will French, editor of the Labor Clarion, who registered as a Republican for the first time this year expressly to vote for Johnson; Andrew Gallagher, secretary of the San Francisco Labor Council; Andrew Furuseth, secretary and organizer of the Coast Seamen's Union; and John W. Sweeney, formerly president of the San Francisco Labor Council and for twenty-five years a leader in the iron trades. The endorsement of these men should be sufficient argument as to the labor record of Hiram Johnson.

The Alameda Situation Not until the Last Day will the sheep get separated from the goats in Alameda county. Every attempt to separate them leads to compromises in the interests of harmony which let in about the worst specimens of goat in the bunch. This is true of the Good Government League ticket announced Wednesday night. The greater part of the ticket is good, but it contains some names that Republican voters should reject. Among these are Tisdale for coroner and Pulcifer for the assembly. Tisdale is impossible and Pulcifer made it clear to his clean-handed associates in the assembly at the last session that he could not be depended on in an emergency. Cut them out. There is no obligation resting upon any voter to forego his divine right to scratch that ticket.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of MARY GAFFNEY, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administratrix at the law office of Maurice Gradwohl, 816 Pacific Building, corner Fourth and Market streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased.

ELIZABETH HOLLAND

Administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, July 7, 1910.

MAURICE GRADWOHL, Attorney at Law, Pacific Building, San Francisco.

7-8-4t

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

The Complete Text of the

REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of JAMES CORCORAN, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, M. J. Hynes, Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of the Administrator, Room 858, Phelan Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

M. J. HYNES,

Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, June 30, 1910.

CULLINAN & HICKLY, Attorneys for Administrator.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

H. L. HOLMES and MARY FRANCES HOLMES, his wife, Plaintiffs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described

Defendants.

J. E. WHITE,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of H. L. Holmes and Mary Frances Holmes, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Louisburg (formerly Spring) Street, distant thereon one hundred and seventy-eight feet northeasterly from the northeasterly line of Mount Vernon Avenue; running thence northeasterly and along the said northwesterly line of Louisburg Street thirty-eight feet; thence at a right angle northwesterly one hundred and three feet, and six inches; thence at a right angle southwesterly thirty-eight feet; thence at a right angle southeasterly one hundred and three feet and six inches to the northwesterly line of Louisburg Street and the point of commencement, being a part of Lot number 14 of San Miguel Homestead Association as per map thereof filed March 5, 1867, in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple as absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 19th day of July A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By Jas. P. Kane, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 22d day of July A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

Amanda Carmean, Tharp, San Jose, California.

J. E. WHITE, Attorney at Law,
729-731 Monadnock Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-10t

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON SALE OF REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

In the Matter of the Estate of ANN DUGAN, deceased.

No. 9481. Dept. 10.

In the above-entitled matter the verified petition of Michael Dugan, administrator of the estate of Ann Dugan, deceased, for an order of sale of all of the real estate and personal property of said deceased, having been this day presented to the Court, and it appearing to the Court from such petition that it is necessary and that it will be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said estate and of those interested therein, to sell the whole of said real estate and personal property in order to pay the debts outstanding against said decedent, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration, and for the purposes and reasons mentioned in said petition, and the said petition having been this day filed herein.

NOW, THEREFORE, it is hereby ordered that all persons interested in the said estate be and appear before this Court, Department Ten thereof, in the Grant Building, on the southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Friday, the 19th day of August, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m. then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to said executor for the sale of all of the real estate and personal property of said estate.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks next preceding said day in "The California Weekly," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated, July 15, 1910.

J. M. SEAWELL,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Endorsed: Filed July 15, 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By E. B. Gilson, Deputy Clerk.

W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Executor, No. 1700
Call Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-4t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ABRAHAM C. MINCHIN, Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

J. E. WHITE,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Abraham C. Minchin, the plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Southwesterly line of Madison Avenue, distant thereon three hundred and fifty-five (355) feet Southeasterly from the Southeast-ly line of Harrison Street; running thence Southeast-ly along the said Southwesterly line of Madison Avenue thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Southwesterly eighty feet; thence at right angles Northwesterly thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches; and thence at right angles Northeasterly eighty feet to the point of beginning, being a part of 100 Vara Lot, No. 190.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 19th day of July A. D. 1910.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By Jas. P. Kane, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 22d day of July A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

None.

J. E. WHITE, Attorney at Law,
729-731 Monadnock Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-10t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

J. R. ALEXANDER, Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property described herein, or any part thereof,

Defendants.

J. E. WHITE,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of J. R. Alexander, the plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have, in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Northerly line of Day Street with the Easterly line of Castro Street; running thence Easterly along said Northerly line of Day Street thirty (30) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly one hundred and fourteen (114) feet; thence at a right angle Westerly thirty (30) feet; thence at a right angle Southerly along said Easterly line of Castro Street one hundred and fourteen (114) feet to the said intersection of the Northerly line of Day Street with the Easterly line of Castro Street and the point of commencement, being a portion of Block No. 171.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 19th day of July A. D. 1910.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By Jas. P. Kane, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 22d day of July A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

None.

J. E. WHITE, Attorney at Law,
729-731 Monadnock Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-10t

RESIDENCE DISTRICT OPTION

WHAT IT IS AND WHY SAN FRANCISCO SHOULD HAVE IT

By J. E. WHITE

District option, as applied to San Francisco, has for its purpose the limiting of saloons to the business portion of the city and prohibiting them from the residential section. It is proposed to accomplish this by means of a charter amendment determining the boundaries outside of which no further licenses can be granted. It is necessary to do this by an amendment to the charter, because as the charter now reads, the Police Commission is given discretionary power to grant or withhold saloon licenses without regard to geographical limitations. It would seem, therefore, to be impossible to limit the area in which saloons could be allowed without amending this provision of the charter. Ordinances passed, either by the Board of Supervisors or under the direct legislative provision of the charter, could not set aside or supersede the charter.

Saloons Near Homes Offensive

There has been a growing feeling on the part of many of our people during the last few years that there should be some portion of our city where persons desiring to do so could establish their homes, secure in the feeling that saloons would not be allowed in their neighborhood. Under the present system this is absolutely impossible, for there is nothing, save the voluntary will of the Police Commission, which can prevent the placing of a saloon in any building within the limits of the city and county. The Police Commission is under no legal obligation to refuse a saloon license simply because there is a protest against it; no matter if that protest should be signed by every resident of the city and county. One might purchase a lot and build a home upon it, governed in the selection of the locality by the fact that there were no saloons in the neighborhood, and he would no more than get moved into his new residence until an application might be made for a saloon license on the corner adjacent to his property, and he would be powerless to prevent or oppose the granting of the license unless he were able to prevail upon the Police Commission, appealing to its discretion, to refuse the license. Experience has shown that it is much easier to get a saloon license than to have one denied.

Saloons Cause Transbay Settlement

There is no doubt that a large number of people doing business in San Francisco, and having all their financial interests here, have sought homes in Alameda, Marin and San Mateo counties, for the very purpose of protecting their families from the vicious influences which would surround them in San Francisco, due largely to the saloon, present in every quarter of the city. It would, therefore, seem to be the part of wisdom for those who are advocating the upbuilding of San Francisco, and seeking for her commercial progress, to open up for settlement those areas now lying waste within her boundaries, with the assurance that no saloons would be allowed within those sections and that those purchasing property and building homes therein would be protected from the saloon. We have within the city and county of San Francisco opportunities for residence sections superior to any that can be found in the world, and really the only thing lacking to make those sections attractive and desirable is that they may be surrounded by a moral atmosphere such as would make people feel that it would be safe to raise their families and send their children to school without coming in contact with the saloon and its influence. It ought to be possible for those who desire it to send their children to school, to church and to the shops in their neighborhood, without passing, or coming into contact with, places where intoxicating liquors are sold, or men are congregated for the purpose of drinking. There are few men, no matter what their personal attitude may be toward the saloon or the indulgence in intoxicating liquors, but who desire to protect their women and children from such influences.

All Other Large Cities Restrict

In all of the large cities of the country the saloons are restricted to the business sections. Los Angeles, which boasts of a population of more than one-half that of San Francisco, not only limits her saloons to a very small portion of the business section, but by an ordinance limits the number of saloons to two hundred. Seattle, Portland, Chicago, Minneapolis, and, in fact, all other large cities, have vast residential areas in which saloons are not allowed. It has been found by experience in those cities that limiting the saloons to the business section has lessened the cost of police protection and made it possible to police the cities more adequately with a smaller force.

As a business advertisement San Francisco could do nothing better than to advertise to the world that she has within her boundaries opportunities for the purchase of building sites in residential areas where saloons are not allowed. This would be an invitation to the best classes of people all over the world to come and make their homes within the city, with as pleasant surroundings as could be found anywhere. There is no doubt that San Francisco would assume a far different moral tone were it possible to have resident within her boundaries all of those who do business and have their financial interests and make their living out of her commercial enterprises, and why not?

The Proposed Saloon District

The proposed amendment provides that no licenses can be granted for the sale of intoxicating liquors in that portion of the city outside of the area bounded as follows: Beginning at the north end of Taylor street, running down the center line of Taylor street to the center line of Sutter street, out the center line of Sutter street to the center line of Larkin street, down the center line of Larkin street to the center line of Ninth street, down the center line of Ninth street to Division street, down the center line of Division to Channel street, thence out the center line of Channel street to the bay, with the provision that saloons may be allowed for places of business opening into Mission street between Ninth and Thirtieth streets and on Fillmore street between McAllister and Bush streets. It seems that within the restricted area there would be ample provision for a sufficient number of saloons to meet all of the demands, or supposed demands, of the city and its entire population. There is also a provision that hotels outside the restricted area may serve liquors with meals. There is nothing to the amendment which would prohibit the operation of a brewery, distillery or other place for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, so long as they are not sold, or at any fixed place of business served, within the prohibited territory.

Argument of "Employment" Answered

The argument has been made that if this amendment is passed it will throw a large number of men out of employment and deprive others of an established business, and in addition, deprive the city of a considerable revenue, in that saloons now paying a license would be forced out of business. There are several answers to this argument. In the first place, one who engages in the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors does so only upon express permission of the municipality. In other words, he is merely permitted to engage in that business, so long as the municipality chooses to tolerate him, and one embarking in that vocation does so with notice beforehand that the municipality may, at any time, place additional burdens upon the business, or entirely prohibit it, so that, if he is deprived of employment, or loses his business, as a result of laws passed, it is merely one of the incidents necessarily connected with the business.

Again, when it is determined that any business or occupation is a menace to the health or moral welfare of any community, that community has a perfect right, under its police power, to eliminate that business, as the welfare of the community at large is superior to any individual privilege. The individual engaged in the liquor traffic has no vested right and no right which can develop into a vested right, as he operates continually with notice of the superior right of the municipality. This fact is emphasized by the provision of the charter itself which provides that no license shall be valid for a longer period than three months and requiring a renewal quarterly by a permission of the Board of Police Commissioners and by this requirement emphasizes the precariousness of the business.

No Loss of Revenue Necessary

Now in reference to the loss of revenue—if there were any serious question as to the ability of the city and county of San Francisco to provide money for its current expenses by reason of any loss of revenue occasioned by the passage of this amendment, the Board of Supervisors could increase the license of the saloons allowed to remain to a point where the present revenue could be maintained, because the present license required for saloons in the city and county of San Francisco is about one-half of that required in all other large cities of the country, and that there have been at various times propositions seriously made to increase the amount of license at present paid. And there is no apparent reason why saloons in San Francisco could not pay as much license as is required of them in Los Angeles, Oakland, Seattle, Tacoma, Chicago and other large cities.

But if it should become necessary to lose that revenue altogether, it would be but a small price to pay for the advantage of having vast residential areas made so attractive that our own people would feel like maintaining a residence on this side of the bay, and people from outside of the city would be attracted here, so as to become permanent residents of our city.

Again, by eliminating saloons from the residential portions of the city better police protection could be afforded those sections with a smaller force of policemen. A smaller section of the city would require and could command more efficient supervision and the loss of revenue would be more than made up in the decreased cost required to maintain peace and order. It is a universal experience of municipalities that the cost of police and criminal courts decreases with the elimination of the saloon, and, in that connection, it might be well to say that San Francisco can well afford to spare a large number of her saloons, as she now has a larger number in proportion to population than any other large city in the world without any corresponding necessity therefor.

Proposed Ordinance Not Radical

Some say that this proposed ordinance is radical. The fact of the matter is that it is extremely lenient. San Francisco has dealt generously with the liquor traffic within her boundaries. Restrictions that are imposed in other cities have not been resorted to here, and the saloons have been allowed a free rein to flourish wheresoever they desired and almost as they pleased. By reason of this tolerance our saloon area has covered the entire city and county, whereas there should have been a dead line established years ago. Had this been done, there would not now be a necessity of what may seem to be radical action, but it can in no sense be deemed radical to insist upon the limitations suggested in the amendment.

Those who will carefully read the history of reform in this direction during the last ten years will notice that the prohibition wave has been sweeping over vast areas of our country and many of the states are passing laws absolutely prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors within their boundaries. California has not seen fit to enact or even propose such a law, but the policy of our state government has been to allow each municipality to determine through its legislative department what regulations shall be enforced within its boundaries. Under these provisions many of the counties and cities of our state have prohibited the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and San Francisco has enjoyed the utmost freedom and liberality along these lines, and many of our citizens are beginning to think that the time has now come when we should place some restrictions upon the liquor traffic. In view of the widespread temperance wave sweeping over the country it would seem wise on the part of those engaged in the traffic to welcome reasonable restrictions as a measure of safety to the existence of their business. It is a law universal in its application that when people once become aroused by a long continued abuse they are apt to adopt radical measures and to go to extremes. It would, therefore, seem better to work for the betterment of our city along sane and rational lines than to force those who are determined upon reform to become radical in their demands.

A movement such as this should appeal strongly to all right thinking people, especially those who are deeply interested in the future welfare of our city. San Francisco has acquired a reputation during the last few years which, deserved or undeserved, has not been to our credit. We all believe that our city is not as bad as she is painted and that we are not more wicked than other large cities, but we are now in the limelight and the finger of scorn has been pointed in our direction and the attention of mankind directed toward us, and all seem eager to find something to criticize. It is up to us to establish ourselves in the confidence and respect of the world by a moral regeneration. We are certainly capable of doing what any other city or municipality can do. If there be some things in our civic life which can be improved we should certainly be not only willing but anxious to make the improvement.

Easterners Offended by Saloon Display

It is difficult for some of our people to appreciate the feeling of intolerance of the saloon on the part of strangers coming to our city. We have become so accustomed to seeing the saloon on every corner, to witness the display of intoxicating liquors in nearly every shop window on the street and the serving of liquors on the tables of every restaurant and hotel, that we do not know how it seems to be where these things are not allowed, but the fact remains that a majority of the people of the United States now live in dry territory and to them these displays are offensive.

California has been attracting during the last few years many colonists, representing well-to-do people who have made a competence in the east and middle west and who desire to spend the remainder of their days in a less rigorous climate. These people for the most part come from portions of the country where the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors are absolutely prohibited, and, in seeking new homes in the west they will give the preference to those localities where similar conditions prevail, and that, no doubt, accounts for the large populations pouring into Los Angeles and Southern California in preference to the bay region. Let San Francisco advertise to the world that she is in harmony with the rest of the country on the question of tolerance and she too will be in a position successfully to bid for her share of the colonists seeking a California home. The people of this city are determined to drive the saloons from the residence districts, and if they do not accomplish that result at this election they will keep up the fight until they succeed.

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES, AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do. To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law
SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco) 526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital $1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds.... 1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910..... 40,384,727.21
Total Assets 43,108,907.82
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock P. M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

CANDIDATES FOR REPUBLICAN NOMINATION

Governor:

Hiram W. Johnson.....San Francisco

Lieutenant Governor:

A. J. Wallace.....Los Angeles

U. S. Senator:

John D. Works.....Los Angeles

Associate Justices Supreme Court:

M. C. Sloss.....San Francisco

Curtis D. Wilbur.....Los Angeles

District Court of Appeals (First District):

Thomas J. Lennon.....San Rafael

Secretary of State:

Florence J. O'Brien.....Chico

Controller:

A. B. Nye.....Oakland

Treasurer:

William R. Williams.....Fresno

Attorney General:

U. S. Webb.....San Francisco

Clerk of Supreme Court:

B. Grant Taylor.....Santa Clara County

Surveyor General:

W. S. Kingsbury.....Los Angeles

Superintendent of Public Instruction:

Allison B. Ware.....San Francisco

Superintendent of State Printing:

Friend W. Richardson.....Berkeley

Railroad Commissioner (First District):

Alex. GordonSacramento

Railroad Commissioner (Third District):

John M. Eshleman.....Imperial

The Republican candidates above have all been endorsed by the Independent Republican Clubs of California and the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League.

HONOLULU and back first class from San Francisco

Reduced Rate $110 The splendid steamship SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, July 30th, August 20th and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sails from S. F. Aug. 6, Sept. 11, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire

OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING

CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

704 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy. Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital $3,000,000.00

Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL $1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper	James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper	Mark L. Requa
Thomas Jennings	J. H. Skinner
James K. Lynch	Rudolph Spreckels
Walter S. Martin	John W. Van Bergen
J. K. Moffitt	Rolla V. Watt
S. G. Murphy	Clinton E. Worden
George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

IT never seemed to Jed that Jed's father ever could have been a boy, and when Jed's aunt assured Jed to the contrary, and tried to make him understand what sort of a boy her younger brother was once upon a time, Jed did not believe a single word she said. So long as Jed knew him his father was a serious-minded, hard-worked, and hard-pushed man, kindly and self-forgotten, but with never a playday and who had never romped with Jed as much as once in his life. If Jed's father ever had, like the apostle Paul, spake as a child, understood as a child, thought as a child, he must, also like Paul, have put away childish things and put them so far away that he had forgotten all about them. Perhaps that is why Jed so well remembers his own childhood and why he so early resolved not to put it wholly away from him.

When Jed came to himself there was a big, burly, gruff old doctor standing over him with a tablespoon in his hand with something nasty in it that the doctor wanted Jed to swallow, or else he wanted to look down Jed's throat to see what he had swallowed already. Jed was not very clear which. Anyhow, the doctor wanted Jed to open his mouth very wide and high and, by way of encouragement, opened his own yawning chasm until it looked to Jed like the mouth of a cave, demanding of Jed, persuasively, that he do like that. "I can't," Jed whimpered, "I ain't big enough," and then he was laughed at, sick as he was and anxious as they were for him, by father, mother and the doctor.

Back of that incident all was chaos in the mind of Jed. To him life began with the scarlet fever that someone brought from "the river," a hundred miles away, and distributed through that pioneer western settlement and, in consequence of it, the nucleus of the little cemetery on the high bank in the bend of the creek was started. He remembered being lifted in his father's arms, while he was yet too ill to walk, to look, for the last time, into the face of his little playfellow cousin lying in such a funny little box, and that all were crying over him, and then they took him away and Jed did not see little cousin any more.

Back of these incidents there was thick mist covering an immeasurable past, for Jed was now nearly four years old, a mental fog that took shadowy forms such as one sees in dreams, but nothing that could be rightly called memories. There were traditions, too, of an ancestry of wonderful people in a far off land known as "Back East," and old personalities to be raked up on occasion by Jed's merciless cousin, six years older than he, such as having run into a heap of hot ashes and coals after the great fireplace had been emptied and standing there and yelling like a maniac until pulled out instead of stepping out with a hop-skip-and-jump, or staying out altogether like a sensible person. That there was foundation for this tradition Jed very well knew, for there were his crippled, scarred and pigeon-toed feet, which always hurt him, in proof of it, besides the remains of the little wooden wagon his father had made to carry him about in during all the months before he could walk again.

But the crowning humiliation of Jed was the metallic bottle with a funny neck to it which Cousin Frank insisted was Jed's mother because he had been brought up on it, his girl mother having had broken breasts after he was born and, therefore, having been unable to nurse him as other babies are nursed. The mere sight of that bottle, always spoken of as "Jed's bottle," filled Jed with an inexplicable but galling sense of shame, and he longed to smash it with the hammer, but it was kept out of his reach so that he couldn't.

He was told afterward that for days his own life hung by a thread, but anyhow the thread held and he lived to steal plums from the trees of the gruff old doctor who had stuck by him and brought him through alive, if not quite whole, for, like as not, the malady left him with constitution weakened, if not with faculties impaired.

So life began with being laughed at, and being laughed at became a pain like a knife thrust, making Jed timid and ashamed without reason, shrinking into corners and remembering that old doctor to detest him ever after. Of course he could not open his mouth so wide. He wasn't big enough. What he had said was true and why all this fuss about it?

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

BY

A. JUDSON

Then little sister came. He remembered that. There were two or three neighbor women there, and that old doctor came again, but after it was all over, they said. His mother screamed and then Jed screamed, too, and pounded these women with his fists to make them quit. There was only one room in the cabin, and a little chamber to which one climbed a ladder, but it was cold up there and cold out of doors, dreadfully cold, for it was January, and somehow they wanted him to look out the window all the time when there wasn't anything there to see that he hadn't seen a thousand times. But by and by his aunt fished a little whimpering red Indian papoose out of the curtained bed in the corner of the room, washed it and dressed it and said it was to be Jed's little sister, but Jed disclaimed ownership and said that he would rather it had been a puppy, and then they all laughed at him and he cried. Even mother laughed, which hurt him most, but she called him to her side and told him that he should have his puppy in a few days, that one had been promised as soon as it was old enough to be taken from its mother.

The promise was kept and Jed came into possession of the friend of his childhood, the one protector and companion who never laughed at him. His uncle brought the puppy to him in his pocket, but what happened to the pocket cannot be so much as hinted at, only it was a great joke on uncle for years after. The dog grew to be as big as a gray wolf, so big and so strong that it did not seem possible that he could ever have been so small as to have been carried in the pocket of an overcoat. For a time other dogs that came to the house used to jump on "Noble" and throw him down and bite him and make him cry, but after he grew up no dog durst come near him lest he be shaken half out of his skin.

Then there was old Kate, the mare that trotted so hard that Jed could scarcely stay in the saddle, for his feet would not even touch the top of the stirrups and, if she broke into a gallop, which she fortunately could hardly be persuaded to do, he had to cling to the horn of the saddle for dear life when they went after the cows, as they did every summer evening. Sometimes they were down in the timber and sometimes out on the prairie, and sometimes it was a long and lonesome hunt for them for a six-year-old, but, when found, Noble rounded them up and Kate trotted after them and bit them if they did not move along and Jed held on and so they generally, but not always, got home before dark. When they did not, and the shadows lengthened, and the coyotes called, and Noble growled, Jed's flesh grew cold and the tears came into his eyes. It was almost as bad as being laughed at. Once as he rode under a tree he heard a noise in the branches and looked up just in time to catch the gleam of a wildcat's eyes on a limb directly above, but Noble flew at the tree and barked and barked and barked, and old Kate trotted off leaving Noble there barking for dear life. The cows were found and driven home and Jed's father took down his rifle, sprang into the saddle and went back to the tree and shot the wildcat, brought it home and skinned it. Everybody said that if it hadn't been for Noble it would have been all up with Jed. Jed was afraid, desperately afraid to be out that way in the woods and dark, but he was more afraid of being laughed at and so went and said nothing.

But that was not as close a call as another one that happened the summer before, when Noble was only an overgrown, gawky puppy, almost afraid of his own shadow. The drinking water had to be brought from a spring a good eighth of a mile from the house, and it used to be Jed's duty to fetch it in a little tin pail with a cover to it to keep the bugs in the grass by the path from falling into the water. The path led down a little ravine through a hickory thicket, around the end of a little bottom-land corn field surrounded by thick woods where the corn grew so big and tall that a man standing on tip-toes could barely hang his hat on the topmost ears. Well, one day Jed did not come back as soon as his father thought he ought, for Jed liked to play in the cool, wet gravel that surrounded the spring, and sometimes loitered, quite contrary to instructions to hurry.

So his father took down his rifle from its pegs on the wall and walked quickly toward the spring. For some reason, he said, he felt impelled to go and to take his rifle, though he had never done so before. After reaching the edge of the cornfield he heard Jed coming singing at the top of his voice and stopped to wait for him, but something told him to go on. He yielded to the impulse and, three or four rods farther, came upon a catamount lying by the path, evidently in wait for Jed or his big puppy dog, who were then almost in sight. The catamount sprang into the corn and Jed's father sent a rifle ball after it, but to no avail, and Jed did not fetch any more water until late that fall when father and mother were sometimes so sick with the fever and ague that there was no one able to go for water except Jed.

From that day forward no one could shake the faith of Jed's father in the verity of spirit presences quite capable of vigilant guardianship if only the guarded could keep his own mind in a receptive mood for receiving premonitions, and, in support of his conviction, he probably related this incident a thousand times. Jed's mother maintained that Jed's innumerable hairbreadth escapes from death implied a providential preservation for some important service, but the old doctor was known to entertain different views and to have expressed the opinion that a young'un that was born to be hanged naturally couldn't be made way with by any other process.

So, when a rattlesnake, being unable to rattle because it had only a button instead of a rattle on the end of its tail, was forced to send its fangs into Jed's bare foot a couple of times, by way of protest against being trodden upon, and afterward made its way through a chink in the outside chimney, and so on under the floor of the cabin and up through a knothole, getting a screwdriver plunged through its neck for its pains, the old doctor counseled Jed's parents not to worry as it was foreordained from the foundation of the world that the rattler was to get the worst of it. Jed's parents pondered the old doctor's saying in their minds, not quite certain what his meaning might be, but the old doctor knew, and Jed knew, what was meant, and Jed hated the old doctor all the more cordially after that and stole his plums every summer as soon as they began to turn yellow.

But that was a close call sure enough, for Jed was alone at home just then, except for a man in the field plowing, whom Jed hated and would not have called to him to have saved his own life, for the man made faces at him, called him the "little Dutchman" and laughed at him every chance he got. Father and mother both came presently, though, and Jed's father cut the foot open with a razor and sucked out a good deal of blood, but the poison had gone on its way and the battle of life and death had to be fought out without great odds either way.

The agony of it! The seeing of swarms of snakes wriggling up through holes in the floor as soon as the candle was out, the skin of the leg stretched as tightly as a drumhead, the turning black-and-blue clear to the body, the poultices of wetted clay to take the fever out, the whisky Jed was made to drink that went down like forked lightning, the intolerable itching when he began to get better, the leg drawn up so that he could only get his foot toward the ground by little and little, week after week, the shock to the nerves, the terror of every rustling sound in the grass, and the inability ever after to put a foot down where he could not see all about it—these were some of the lasting consequences of that close call in the barefoot days of Jed.

And what a snake hole that was where Jed's lines were cast! Jed's father was no little of a dreamer. He had come West with a colony to keep slavery out of the territory; had learned the printer's trade in the office of the old Anti-slavery Standard in New York City, had lectured and preached and prayed that all men might be made equal before the laws of this free country. He had dived into literature, had all the standard poets in his little library, and played the flute. When he came to stake out his claim with the rest he took the one claim that no one else wanted, the one that the Serpentine wound through so crookedly that a straight line crossed it eight times as it cut through the claim diagonally from corner to corner; the claim that had the finest succession of ponds on it and the best fishing, the rocky ford and the turbulent little waterfall from which the creek swung around under a beetling bluff to whose ragged escarpment clung great boulders half the size of the log cabin; the claim that had the largest number of spreading elms and oaks and towering walnut trees scattered over it and decidedly was the most picturesque, but the claim of all claims that had the least tillable land, and that in the smallest patches hardest to fence, the claim least likely to make a living for its owner.

The ponds were alive with water snakes, the rocky hill with rattlers, the woods with copperheads, while blacksnakes and bull snakes, joint snakes and garters, were as numerous as nature's just balance would permit them to be with due deference to the rights of the others.

When, in the spring, the creek was high and the lower levels were overflowed, the bushes that swayed and bent with the surging current were sure to have one or more snakes coiled in the branches. Now and again a big rattler or copperhead was stoned to death or shot through and through with the little squirrel rifle in the hands of Jed's father or Cousin

Frank. Sometimes Jed was allowed to shoot this rifle at a mark, but as he always shut his eyes before he pulled the trigger it was less dangerous to be at the mark than anywhere else in the vicinity.

Which brings to mind another narrow escape, but this time not for Jed. The wildcats became regular visitors to the chicken-house and, though built of firm logs into which no cat could go, straying chickens were watched for in early mornings and, the better to get a shot at the cats, Jed's father kept his little rifle at the head of the ladder that he might get a shot out of the chamber window. One day a visitor came to the house, a stranger to Jed. He talked vehemently and had a way of shaking his finger in the face of Jed's father as he talked, to the mind of Jed, with great ferocity. He was a towering big fellow and Jed was afraid for his father's life, but he said nothing and quietly climbed the ladder, took down the rifle from its pegs, cocked it and leveled it at the intruder through a knot hole in the chamber floor. Then he waited, waited for an overt act, waited until the call to dinner, when the visitor sat up to the table. Jed knew how to cock the rifle, but not how to let the hammer down again and, when he sought to do that, the hammer slipped from his little fingers and the bullet lodged in the cabin wall. There was a scurrying down below and Jed was spanked for touching the rifle. Afterward Jed's mother questioned him as to why he touched the rifle when he had been told so many times never to do so and his reply was, "If that man had struck my father I'd a shot him right through that knot-hole." "Why, child," the mother exclaimed, "they were not quarreling. That was the township assessor and they were talking politics." But politics did not convey much to Jed's mind just then, and he was made to understand that his father would fight his own battles without Jed's help yet awhile.

But everybody talked politics in those days and, in Jed's neighborhood, all on the same side of the question. Sumter had been fired on, many of the neighbors had gone to the war; once a week the mail carrier came and brought a New York Tribune for Jed's father and other papers for other neighbors. They were fairly eaten alive and passed from hand to hand to be read again and again and talked over and over. It was all a mystery to Jed. Even his friend, Danny Bates, a little fellow who always carried his head to one side and owned the next claim to the south, who used to carry Jed on his shoulder when the stubble was prickly and hurt Jed's bare feet, could not make Jed understand what it was all about. But Danny went to the war and, the next winter, came back again, on a furlough, they called it, all dressed in blue with a great overcoat and a big gun. When he went away again he stooped and kissed Jed goodbye and strode against the north wind up the long slope and over the rim of the prairie, the cape to his coat fluttering over his shoulder, but he never came back. They said that his regiment had got caught in a cul de sac and "cut all to pieces," which did not mean much to Jed, only that it made mother cry, and Jed was told that Danny was dead, that he had given his life for his country. That only deepened the mystery and when Jed tried to make clear to his own mind what it meant to "have a regiment 'cut all to pieces'" by taking a litter of kittens that Jed overheard his mother trying to induce his father to kill, out to the work bench and shaving their heads off one by one with the drawing knife, his success was only partial, inasmuch as his father explained to him that there were a thousand men in a regiment, whereas there were only seven kittens in that litter.

But Jed got a chance to find out what it was like to be shot and killed, and what a dead man looked like.

It was one of those clear, early summer mornings when scarcely a breath of air was stirring and sound traveled far, that the ears of the family were greeted by sounds of successive pistol shots coming over the rim of the prairie from the low bottom two or three miles away, and great was the wondering as to what it could mean. The horses had been hitched to the spring wagon and Jed's father was about to take the family to a distant neighbor's to spend the day when here came a horseman at a furious gallop down the slope. He stopped on the bank of the creek and called to Jed's father to come with his team and convey a wounded horse thief from a wood, where he had been shot, to a house over in the valley where his partner had been killed. Jed wanted to go with the team, but his father told him to stay with mother and the baby, that it was no place for his little boy to go, and drove off without him. But Jed was not to be disposed of so easily. He watched his chance, slipped down the back path, waded the creek and started over the prairie in the direction from which the sounds had come, finally reaching the main road with toes cut by the grass and the soles of his feet pierced and bleeding in a dozen places by the sharp stubble. Still he pressed on and had nearly reached the Squire's house in the valley when his father overtook him with the team and the wounded man and took him up.

The wounded man lay groaning in the bottom of the wagon with a bloody horse blanket under him, calling out in agony almost every moment to know if they were not almost there. He was a big, fine, bearded fellow with long, white fingers that had more to tell of cards than of toil. Arrived at the Squire's, Jed heard the story of the morning, how these horse thieves had been overtaken by sheriff and posse while at breakfast at a house in the lane. Both had fine saddle animals and each was leading another horse. The posse divided, two riding by the house and up the lane and the other two waiting behind some trees at the lower end. The thieves would have to go out one way or other.

Presently they came out of the house and vaulted into their saddles, but they had not gone far when they saw their way blocked by horsemen with pistols drawn. They turned their led horses loose and dashed back, only to be confronted by the other two men. One of the men jumped from his horse, leaped the fence and started on foot across a cow lot for a corn field, the sheriff in hot pursuit, also on foot. Seeing that the sheriff, who was calling to him to halt, was gaining on him the thief turned and fired at his pursuer, but his aim was not true and he started to run again, vaulting a second fence with the ease of an athlete. He had now not half a dozen steps to take to reach the tall corn, but turned and

"WE HOLD THEE SAFE"

Total Assets
Over Ninety-one
Million Dollars

Exclusively Fire
Funds Thirty-nine
Million Dollars

The World's Greatest Fire Insurance Company

QUEEN
INSURANCE CO.
OF AMERICA

TOTAL ASSETS NEARLY NINE MILLION DOLLARS
POLICY HOLDERS' SURPLUS OVER FOUR MILLION DOLLARS
Agents In Every City, Town and Village

ROLLA V. WATT, Manager

ROYAL INSURANCE BUILDING

Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco

raised his pistol to fire at the sheriff a second time. The sheriff was too quick for him and the horse thief dropped in his tracks with a bullet through his heart.

The sheriff, without stopping to take a second glance at his victim, ran to his horse and joined in the pursuit of the other horse thief, who was now waging a duel with the man by whom he had dashed at the mouth of the lane and with the others hard after. The sheriff was better mounted than any of the others and overhauled the posse as they struck the timber on the Serpentine. Here the horse thief abandoned his wounded horse and took to the brush with the others hard upon his heels. Like a frightened hare, with hounds upon his track, he ran this way and that, seeking a place in which to hide, by and by dropping under an overhanging bank of the creek and crawling under some vines in the expectation of picking off his pursuers one by one as they advanced, but the sheriff's eyes were the sharper, and he caught sight of the horse thief just as he was in the act of raising his pistol to shoot one of the posse who had come within range. The sheriff sent a ball through his body and he lost his hold on the vines and rolled down the bank, where he was taken into custody.

Jed, having overheard and learned the place where the body of the first horse thief was, sped toward it as fast as his tired feet would carry him, climbed the fence and, for the first time in his life, stood in the presence of death. There the horse thief lay upon his back, his slouch hat scarcely a foot from his head, his revolver at his feet where he had dropped it when he fell, his eyes staring vacantly up at the sun, now high in the heavens. His eyes were blue, his hair brown and there was a smile upon his lips. His mustache was brown and shapely and there was upon his cheeks and chin perhaps a three days' growth of beard. He wore a gray woolen shirt, light blouse-like coat thrown open and, over the heart and down the sides there were blood stains, but in no great quantity. The forelock thrown back disclosed a scar at the roots of the hair.

The flies had begun to gather around him and Jed broke off a weed and drove them away and was so occupied when the coroner's jury found the boy when they came, the whole neighborhood at their heels, to view the remains. Jed's father took the boy into custody and sought to draw him away, but he was one of the jurors, and so Jed stayed by his side until the verdict was rendered. "How cold your hands are, boy," the father exclaimed, "and you look like a ghost. Are you ill?" Jed protested that he was not, but the spectacle of a big, strong man lying lifeless, the blood matted upon his shirt, had made the boy sick at heart and he was glad enough to climb into the wagon with his father and the others and drive home to his nearly distracted mother, who had searched everywhere for Jed, but in vain.

That night the wounded horse thief died and the two were buried side by side in the little cemetery in the bend of the creek. A fortnight later a man and a woman came into the neighborhood making inquiry regarding the dead men, came to Jed's father among others and, finally, asked that the grave might be opened that they might look upon the face of the younger man. Neighbors joined in making the disinterment, the rude coffin of rough boards was opened, the strangers took one long, intent look and turned away uttering no word, the woman leaning heavily upon the arm of her husband, her knees tottering and hand trembling as he helped her into the carriage and quickly drove away.

For years the grave of the horse thieves was, to Jed, if not hallowed ground, at least a spot of earth not to be approached without trepidation, and with a half formed fear that the horse thieves themselves might not be far away, malignant and menacing. When Jed caught shadows lurking in the hickory thicket hard by he pondered in his own mind if they might not be the shades of the dead horse thieves and ran, pale and trembling, as fast as his feet would carry him.

But the neighbors gave great glory to the sheriff who had slain them both, and Cousin Frank declared that he would rather shoot a horse thief than a certain gray wolf which much infested the neighborhood, killing calves and colts, and which no one seemingly could kill, although the whole neighborhood turned out and hunted for it day after day, but Jed's connection with that wolf belongs to another chapter.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 1.

Action No. 21780.

ADOLPH ZEIS, as Administrator of the Estate of AUGUSTE ZEIS, deceased, Plaintiff,

vs.

ALL persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property described herein, or any part thereof, Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of plaintiff filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Green street, distant one hundred and thirteen and nine-twelfths (113-9-12) feet westerly from the westerly line of Mason street, running thence westerly along said line of Green street twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23-9-12) feet, thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68-9-12) feet, thence at right angles easterly twenty-three and nine-twelfths (23-9-12) feet, and thence at right angles southerly sixty-eight and nine-twelfths (68-9-12) feet to the place of beginning. Together with the improvements thereon and the appurtenances thereunto belonging.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 8th day of June, A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

CAREY HOWARD, Attorney for Plaintiff.

NOTICE REDUCTION OF CAPITAL STOCK

A Special Meeting of the Stockholders of the PARKIN-HOWARD COMPANY will be held at the office of the Company, Room 1006 Metropolis Bank Building, Market Street, San Francisco, on Thursday, September 15, 1910, at the hour of 12:30 P. M., for the purpose of diminishing the Capital Stock of the Corporation from 50,000 shares to 10,000 shares.

PARKIN-HOWARD COMPANY.
By John Parkin, Secretary.

7-8-10t

SPECIAL MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS. NOTICE TO THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, duly held on the 1st day of July, 1910, at the office of said corporation in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for and will be held at the office of said corporation in the Foxcroft Building, Number 68 Post Street, in said City and County of San Francisco (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet), on Monday, the 12th day of September, 1910, at 2:00 o'clock, in the afternoon of that day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition of increasing the capital stock of said corporation from Seventy-five Thousand ($75,000.00) Dollars, divided into Fifteen Hundred (1500) shares of the par value of Fifty ($50.00) Dollars each, to Three Hundred Thousand ($300,000.00) Dollars, divided into Six Thousand (6,000) shares of the par value of Fifty ($50.00) Dollars each.

The amount of increase proposed in the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Twenty-five Thousand ($225,000.00) Dollars.

NOTICE IS FURTHER GIVEN that at the same time and place there will be submitted to said stockholders meeting the matter of increasing the number of Directors of said corporation from Three members to Five or more members to thereafter constitute its Board of Directors, and to elect such additional directors.

AND NOTICE IS FURTHER GIVEN that at the same time and place, there will be submitted to said Stockholders' meeting the matter of repealing By-Laws, amending By-Laws, and adopting new By-Laws, and that said meeting is called for the purpose of considering and acting upon all of the propositions and matters hereinabove named and such other business as may properly come before such stockholders meeting.

By order of the Board of Directors.
Dated July 1st, 1910.

RIO CIMARRONES PLANTATION COMPANY.
By R. C. Shaw, President.
(Seal) By L. W. McGlaulin, Secretary.

7-8-10t

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market street, near Third.

ORPHAN NOTICE

THE BOYS AND GIRLS AID SOCIETY
The following have been received since the publication of the last notice:

Whole Orphans		Years	Months
Halstead, Andrew	12
Chrisholm, Louis	12	10
Half Orphans
Scofield, Olin	10	7
Reno, Willie	12	6
Reno, Peter	13	6
McGuire, Ignatius	11	7
		7-8-4t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF GEORGE CHILDS, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administrator, at the office of W. H. Payson, room 1700, Claus Spreckels Building, southeast corner Market and Third streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

RUFUS H. CHILDS,

Administrator of the estate of George Childs, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 10, 1910.
W. H. PAYSON, attorney for estate.

6-10 5t

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
Department No. 12.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

KATHERINE MUNDELL, sometimes known as Kate Mundell, Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

WILLIAM F. HERRON,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA TO ALL PERSONS CLAIMING ANY INTEREST IN, OR LIEN UPON THE REAL PROPERTY HEREIN DESCRIBED, OR ANY PART THEREOF, DEFENDANTS, GREETING:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of the above named plaintiff filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain property or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly bounded and described as follows, to-wit:

PARCEL NO. 1.

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Second Avenue distant thereon one hundred and seventy-five (175) feet northerly from the northerly line of "C" street, running thence northerly and along said easterly line of Second Avenue twenty-five (25) feet, thence at right angles easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet, thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet and thence at right angles westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the easterly line of Second Avenue and point of commencement, being a portion of Richmond, formerly outside lands, block number (380).

PARCEL NO. II.

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Twenty-third Avenue distant thereon two hundred (200) feet southerly from the southerly line of J street, running thence southerly fifty (50) feet along the easterly line of Twenty-third Avenue, thence at right angles easterly ninety-six (96) feet, more or less, thence running northerly fifty (50) feet, more or less, thence at right angles in a westerly direction ninety-nine (99) feet, more or less, to the point of commencement, being a portion of block number (747) of outside lands in the City and County of San Francisco.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: that the said plaintiff be decreed to be the owner of said property and every part thereof in fee simple and to own and hold said property and every part thereof as her separate property and estate, and that the title of said plaintiff to said property, and every part thereof be established and quieted, and that the Court ascertain and determine all estate, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; and that it be decreed that no person or persons other than said plaintiff have any estate, right, title, interest or lien whatsoever in or to said property or any part thereof, and for such other and further relief as to the Court shall seem meet, just and proper in the premises.

Witness my hand and seal of this Court, this 5th day of July, A. D. 1910.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY,

County Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE,

Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM:

The first publication of this summons was made in California Weekly newspaper on the 15th day of July, A. D. 1910.

MEMORANDUM:

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property, adverse to plaintiff: The German Savings and Loan Society, 526 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.; Isaac Eliaser, San Francisco, Cal.; Rosa Cohen, San Francisco, Cal.

WILLIAM F. HERRON,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

Humboldt Bank Building, Phone Douglas 3525

7-15-10t

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Military Arm of the State

In his early ministry Henry Ward Beecher declared that the world would never see another war, that the nations had too much sense to fight and that arbitration and a court of the nations would soon adjust all international differences. After he had lived to witness one of the greatest civil wars in human history, the Franco-Prussian war and minor international disturbances, he threw up his hands and declared that he was done prophesying.

To us of this generation it looks as though war could be no more because of its costliness, its destructiveness and the steady growth of the comity of nations and progress toward a permanent court of nations, but it would be a rash nation that would disarm and a rash state that, yet awhile, would strip itself of its power to quell a mob or to put down an insurrection. Therefore, the military arm of California becomes of interest to every citizen of California. While there is no enemy in sight, and no insurrection in prospect, the wisest cannot know when the military arm may be called to put forth its uttermost strength to preserve order or repel invasion.

The militia of California consists of every able bodied man between the ages of 18 and 45 years, except ministers of religion, civil and military officers of the United States, officers of foreign governments, civil officers of the State of California, members of fire and police departments. Mongolians and Indians are also exempt and no alien is obliged to bear arms against the country to which his allegiance is due. All others are subject to call if the state needs them, and the county assessors of each county annually make up the roll of the persons subject to military duty.

This roll is reported in duplicate to the board of supervisors, is corrected as needed by the board of supervisors sitting as a board of equalization, and one copy of the corrected list is sent to the brigadier-general commanding the district in which each county is situated, and the brigadier-general must transmit a copy of it to the Adjutant-General at his office in the State Capitol, where it is available for calling out the men if needed.

This is the potential fighting force of the state, but "happy is that state whose annals are tedious," inasmuch as they are not filled full of military incidents. Most American citizens live and die without ever being called to do military service. If a military force is needed there are generally volunteers enough to fill the ranks and if not, then the draft is resorted to, for it is seldom that the militia is needed within the state and it cannot be required to do service outside the state without its consent. During the Civil War, along the border states, the militia was frequently called out, and sometimes saw fighting, but the tendency is for it to do guard duty, attend supply trains, leaving the firing line to trained soldiery. In military terminology this great force, in California perhaps numbering a quarter of a million men, is known as the "reserve" militia, but it is not to be called into use until the "active" militia, commonly known as the National Guard, has been found inadequate for the emergency.

When we come to consider the number and variety of persons who have the power to call for the National Guard or, if that be insufficient, then the militia, we may thank our stars that we live in peaceful times and not in an age of heroics, in an age of over-emphasized materialism rather than one of an exaggerated militarism. Our skins are safer if not our souls.

The militia may be called out, "In case of war, insurrection, rebellion, invasion, tumult, riot or imminent danger thereof, or resistance to the laws of this state or the United States."

The militia may be called out by, "Requisition of the President of the United States or any officer of the United States army commanding a division, department or district in California; by any United States marshal in California; or upon call of the chief executive officer of any city or county and county, or by any justice of the supreme court or any judge of the superior court; by any sheriff setting forth that there is an unlawful or riotous assembly with intent to commit a felony, or to offer violence to person or property or to resist the laws of the state or the United States, or upon call of the sheriff setting forth that the civil power of the county is not sufficient to enable him to execute process delivered to him." This showing or requisition must be addressed to the governor of the state, who is the commander-in-chief of the militia, both active and in reserve, whereupon he is "authorized" to issue the call to arms. It would appear from the reading of the statute that a large discretion is reposed in the governor to issue the call or not to issue it as he thinks best, which is probably wise, unless on demand of the President of the United States, inasmuch as, where there are so many persons having the power to make the demand upon him there is risk of encountering some who would be precipitate if not hysterical.

In our next lesson we shall take up for consideration the "organized and uniformed active" militia of California commonly known as the National Guard.

Moneybags—Young man, I started as a clerk on 15 shillings a week, and today I own my own business. Hardupp—I know, sir. But they have cash registers in all the shops now.—Comic Cuts.

They were heckling him at a political meeting. At last he could stand it no longer. "Who brayed there?" he cried out sarcastically. "It was only an echo," retorted somebody amid much laughter.—Tit-Bits.

"An artist," said Mr. Teechum, "should strive to reproduce what is nearest to his thought and deepest in his affection." "Yes," replied the mercenary genius, "but the laws against counterfeiting currency are so severe!"—Washington Star.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.

CENTURY PATH (Illustrated Weekly), edited by Katherine Tingley; Theosophical Manuals and other Theosophical literature of the UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, Point Loma, California, now on sale by Smith Bros., 462 13th Street, Oakland, and by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

TRAIN YOUR BOYS AND GIRLS FOR BUSINESS

ONE WEEK'S POSITIONS FILLED:

- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary $50.00
- One in R. R. Co.'s employ, salary 65.00
- One in Wholesale Firm, salary 50.00
- One in Retail Firm, salary, per week . . 12.50

Several at from $30.00 to $50.00 per month.

☞ Let us prepare your Boys and Girls. We can place every graduate of

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander
ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL
ATTORNEYS AT LAW
Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

OAKLAND 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: JULY 29 : '10

FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated.
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH·GOOD COURAGE·GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 36.

Into Harmon's Hands

THE OHIO REPUBLICANS convoked themselves and solemnly resolved that what ain't so is so, and then appealed to the people to vindicate the untenable position, because the President chances to be an Ohio man. All of which tends to make the path of Judson Harmon to victory in that state, as a stepping stone to the Democratic nomination for the presidency, both plain and easy. Is Ohio seeking, first, to retain the presidency whichever party wins? It looks so.

Tom Platt Knew

THE LATE THOMAS C. PLATT in his autobiography affirmed that, no matter how much a nominee for an office may seek to get away from his political environment before election, it can safely be counted that he never will. Governor Gillett found it so and therefore has not been disobedient from the Santa Cruz convention until now. Alden Anderson, in the unlikely event of his nomination and election, can strain at his tether and wrench at the bars of his cage as much as he will, but never will he be free from the Herrin direction and the Southern Pacific's omnipresent influence. He is a good man in a mighty bad box. Tom Platt knew.

What Else Can He Do?

THE CHARGES MADE by Senator Bristow, that Senator Aldrich secured an increase in the tariff on manufactured rubber in the interests of an industry in which he and his son are engaged, and that he advanced the cotton schedule for the booming of stock quotations in cotton manufacturing corporations, are being treated with a dignified and frigid silence. What else can a man do when his adversary has got him dead to rights?

Let It Not Be Forgotten

IT IS PROBABLE that the higher courts will cause the indictments against Calhoun and the other higher-ups to be dismissed. Perhaps there may be nothing else to do, but let it not be forgotten, when these men claim vindication, as they will, that it was within their power to go upon the stand at any time, open the cases and testify in their own behalf, telling just where that $200,000 went, who got it and why. Until they do this they are not entitled to the benefit of the smallest doubt.

The Straightest Furrow

A STOCK BUYER was making the rounds of an Iowa farming community when he came to a good farm house and entered into negotiations for cattle with the owner. "By the way," asked the buyer, as he was about to write out a check, "what may I call your name?" "Cummins, sir, my name is Cummins." "Any relation to the governor?" "He's my son." "Well, you've given the state a mighty good governor. I can say that for you." "Don't know if he is a good governor or not," was the reply, "but as a boy he could plow the blamdest straightest furrow across a quarter section of land ever plowed in Iowa, I reckon." Some day that son may plow that furrow clear to the White House, for he is still plowing straight as a bee line.

Van Liew

IF PRINCIPAL VAN LIEW, of the Chico normal school, hugged one girl he probably hugged more than one. Every hugger-mugger does, and sooner or later the truth will out, but, whether he hugged or did not hug, Trustee Florence J. O'Brien was right in declaring that the evidence showed Van Liew to be not the right sort of man to head an institution of learning where character counts. Having been exonerated, he should resign and get out without waiting to be kicked out of an institution whose head should be above criticism as to sobriety, integrity and morality.

Aunt Sally

AUNT SALLY USED TO LIKE to tell of the big times had when she was servant to her mistress in the Big House, how kind they were to her and how hard life was washing for a living with a no-account husband and half a dozen pickaninnies to support; but when asked if she did not wish herself back there, as in the old days, she would throw up her hands and declare, "Fo' God, no! Not on you' life! Then I was a slave. Now I is free. Then I belonged to Master. Now I belong to God and my chil'un." It is even so with government by railroad. Even if it were the best government, as the Morning Moral Idiot would have us believe, which it is not, it would be intolerable to any self respecting people because not of The People.

That Man Nye

SOME MEN ARE IN POLITICS for profit, some for glory, some through friendliness to others and a willingness to acquiesce in the wishes of their friends, but, with State Controller A. B. Nye, public office is something more even than a public trust. It is more than a vocation. It is a consecration to service, an opportunity to devote his mind, his strength, his time and all the powers of his being to working out hard public problems and fighting hard public battles for that which is eternally true and righteous altogether. When a state has a chance to secure the services of such a servant it is fatuously imbecile if it does not make his election sure.

Johnson and Labor

OF ALL ENEMIES TO LABOR, organized or unorganized, there is not one other so dangerous as that political charlatan who assumes to speak in labor's name, and to deliver labor's votes in blocks in conformity with trades such as were made in San Francisco last fall for the defeating of Heney and the election of McCarthy, a trade whose consummation was set for August 16, 1910. Hiram Johnson makes no advances toward labor on such a line of march. He advances openly, man to man, valuing a laborer no higher and no lower than he values another, but as a citizen co-equal with every other, a rational being, free and independent. Whether or not that policy commands the votes of labor, it cannot fail of commanding the respect of those who toil, and that is the better part. But he will get that vote, too, because he deserves it.

Only The Little Ones

THE OHIOANS CROWED LUSTILY over the conviction of the underlings engaged in the sugar frauds in New York. It had been fitter had the crowings been littler, for only the little living thieves, and one big dead one, were convicted. Had the big thieves, the old he-ones now living, been convicted and imprisoned then might our three hundred pound chanticleer have crowed and crowed as only chanticleer can.

Then and Now

Fifty years ago this nation was convulsed over the issue of Property In Man. In defense of the rights of property in man there were arrayed the commercial and financial interests, North and South. Conservatism clung to and defended the "peculiar" institution. Religion threw about it the mantle of its charity and the sanction of prophet and patriarch. The institution of slavery seemed to be invincible.

Arrayed in opposition were only bare hands sustained by sinewy arms nerved by an unflinching moral purpose; but those hands found weapons and those arms supported them, while sturdy legs carried arms, hands and weapons through forest and swamp, over mountain and plain, and how glorious was their victory! So glorious that victors and vanquished lived to see the day when, kneeling side by side, they could thank Almighty God that the lost cause was lost, that property in man had perished, that conservatism was routed; even the commercial and financial interests were convinced that the Rights of Man are paramount.

Today our nation is again convulsed, and, this time, over the issue of Property or Man and, again, in defense of property, there are arrayed the commercial and financial interests; conservatism clings to and defends the primacy of property, churches and religious teachers have not been wanting to throw about the rotund person of greed the mantle of charity, richly woven, and, through appeal to prophet and patriarch, to defend the primacy of property.

And property is prime in importance. Where property is insecure nothing is secure. Only one thing ranks higher than property and that is Man. It has been said that if all the pickpockets in the United States were gathered up and banished to an otherwise uninhabited island, and left alone, the first person who picked another's pocket, and was caught at it, would be strung up to the most convenient tree, for pickpockets would understand that only by protecting rights in property can society be organized and the destruction of all through anarchy be prevented.

As there are those who would make Man for the Sabbath and not the Sabbath for Man, and those who would make the raiment more than the body, the body more than the soul, so there are those who so lose their power to judge righteous judgment that they exalt business above justice, prosperity above morality, the present above the future, the living above the unborn, the here above the hereafter.

That there is an upheaval, nation wide and as deep as moral plummet sounds, need cause us no alarm; if there were none, then we might well despair. We might then believe our nation dead in the sin of covetousness, but it is not. It lives. It wants prosperity, but not at the price of damning morality or debasing Man. The world had so suffered from insecurity of property that when the constitution of the United States was made it made property, and not the Rights of Man, the cornerstone of the structure. That will be changed. The common good will come first. That is what the modern doctrine of corporate regulation means. The magic word "progress" means a marching in that direction. That is the interpretation of the popular movement against corporation domination in politics and government. It is the essence of insurgency. It is the soul of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement in this state. It is broader than party and deeper than the question of office. It is a moral upheaval such as shook the nation to its foundation half a century ago. It has in its keeping the hope for a "better place for a better race," as was splendidly said by Gifford Pinchot.

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

And yet money has got to be made, mainly by those who have so much of it already that they do not need to make more. What do the Morgans and Guggenheims, Rockefellers and Carnegies need of more money? But how shall the ninety-and-nine find work if the hundredth man with large executive ability does not find it for them? Our modern revolution is not founded on the untruth that "property is robbery." On the contrary, it accords it second place in the scheme of our civilization, placing only humanity first. Vested rights have nothing to fear, though vested wrongs may be shaken loose from their parasitical hold on the vitalities of society. The hand of the dead that would rule the living may be cut off, for the God of our battles is the Lord of the living, not the dead. The fighting is glorious. The heart that does not warm to it is dead in its rib-encased shell.

Too Big To Be Little

It has been reported that certain San Francisco employers have required as a condition of employment that the employee reside in San Francisco. That form of civic pride is mistaken. San Francisco is too big to be little. This is a manifestation of that precinct patriotism that dwarfs the mind and circumscribes the horizon. It is wholly inconsistent with the metropolitan spirit. It is politically unfortunate for San Francisco that so many of its best and broadest professional and business men vote in municipalities other than San Francisco, but that condition is not to be bettered by compelling wage earners to live in San Francisco while employers live at Burlingame and Hillsboro, Berkeley and Belvedere. Rather will it exaggerate the difficulty. San Francisco is no more the city and county thereof than the borough of London with its 50,000 people constitutes the metropolis of the British empire with nearly seven-and-a-half million. San Francisco comprises as much territory as may be seen from the top of twin peaks. That this territory is broken up into a dozen municipalities is relatively an insignificant circumstance. Lift up your eyes, Men of San Francisco. You are not living in a pint cup, although there are specimens among you who would find such a horizon more than ample. The good will of the suburbs of your city is worth more to your city than any forced citizenship ever can be. We are members one of another in all this bay district, and the day may come when all shall be one and inseparable, but not by compulsory process.

His Great Opportunity

President Taft may have difficulty in so influencing the 483 members of the two houses of congress as to extract from them the legislation the country needs, but the reconstruction of the supreme court of the United States is to be in his own hands. Congress can enact statutes, but the supreme court makes laws. We make the president, the president makes the court and the court makes the law, and there is no one whom The People can hold responsible for the quality of the laws so made except the president. That court must be made as progressive as the spirit of the nation, or trouble will result. That bench needs to be prescient in interpreting the spirit of its age, for the law is what that spirit makes it, and neither congresses nor courts can do more than to hinder, harass and exasperate society with misfit statutes and decisions. Watch the reconstruction of that court! It will mean more to the country than making congress Republican or Democratic, Insurgent or Standpat. What an opportunity William Howard Taft has to do a really great thing for his country!

Bay Cities Beware of Bay Cities

The Bay Cities Water Company has agents out soliciting in the east bay cities for individual contracts to take water from that company at prices a trifle lower than now obtain. The Bay Cities Company may be abundantly able to fulfill all the obligations it makes. It ought to be, for the lowest price at which it contracts ever to supply water is 25 cents per 1,000 gallons, about double the final figure that any city ought to pay. Individuals should make no contracts that can stand betwixt themselves and a municipally owned water system sufficient for all purposes for all time, and how shall a municipal system be established when the field is already occupied by two private distributing systems? Shall the city build a third system and leave two others useless, or buy out both when only one is needed? That way lies enormous waste if nothing worse. This is an instance in which no man should act for himself alone, but each for all and all for each. Besides, if San Francisco shall go to the Sierras for a supply of pure snow water in quantity to last for all time the east bay cities will wish to go there, too. Suffer no glib-tongued agent to so tangle the issue as to stand in the way of a forward movement all along the line. When action is taken let it be by cities and as cities, not by individuals as individual consumers. This is an instance wherein the individualist becomes a marplot.

All Quiet Along the Water Front

After forty years of fighting for "white meat" along its western water front Oakland seems to be in a position to guard its interests and assert its ownership of an open way to the open sea. This is good news, not only for Oakland, but for all the country back of Oakland clear to the Mississippi valley. Let us hope that Oakland will so guard its own and the nation's interests as to keep its local government so free from corporation control that no corporation shall be able to obtain by concession what it could not obtain by aggression. It is worth while noting, too, that Oakland's water front fight was won for it rather than by it, that it was only when its cause was espoused by another corporation nearly as great as the one that squatted on its front that a winning fight was made, an admission as humiliating to pride as indispensable to truth. Every fight for an open way to the sea is a fight for the Rights of Man. Private ownership of harbor privilege is privilege and not property, and very special privilege at that.

Joy Riding to a Fall

The steel industry is a-boom and rubber manufacturing is going ahead with throttle wide open, all because the American people are bent on joy riding in automobiles. To all of which the American bankers are saying:

"What a pity, what a pity!" To the mind of the banker the only use for money is to invest it where it will make more money. But, notwithstanding his narrowed view, we cannot afford to laugh at the banker. If the joy rider burnt up only his own money the loss would not be of great public concern, but that he may joy ride he borrows, and that he may borrow he mortgages his home, his life insurance, sells his stocks and his bonds, runs into unsecured debt and paves the way to the day when he can't pay. As there are hundreds of thousands of joy riders getting into debt to the aggregate of hundreds of millions of dollars, the consequences are like enough to prove serious to the prosperity of the nation. Moral: If the reader wants an automobile, and cannot pay for one without borrowing, let him take the next car or harness up the old horse, for that way he contentment and the common good. The joy rider is the most ominous cloud above the financial horizon.

State and Nation

There are those who discuss conservation as if it were an issue of state or nation. It is not. It is an issue of state and nation. There is quite enough for both to do. Until the state has shown its ability to conserve those resources that are clearly within the province of state control the national government should hold fast to those interests that are clearly its own. Between the two there may be co-operation as easily as conflict and, whether one or other, it is not yet necessary to borrow trouble about either. California has the nucleus, and only the nucleus, of a forestry system. Its management of its waters, whether for power or irrigation, has been imbecile. It is time for the state to address itself to the task of evolving a sane, practical, just and safe system of regulation and conservation within its uncontested sphere. When it shall have done this broader fields may open to it, but it would avail little to take conservation issues out of the hands of even a Ballinger to confide them to a Herrin.

No Fiat In This Fight

Not a few have taken to their souls the flattering unction that the spirit of insurgency is Populism redivivus. Nothing could be farther from the fact. Populism was Socialism, only it did not know it, while progressive Republicanism has no taint of Socialism in it. Populism also held with serenity that the government's fiat impressed on the tails of the winds would make them circulate and so perform the debt paying office of money. No taint of fiat attaches to the progressive movement of 1910. Only in a realization of the dangers of government by the "money power" is there a parallelism between insurgency and Populism, a danger that has grown more intense since Populism was in flower.

Picketing

Los Angeles has by ordinance prohibited "picketing," for which excess of zeal organized labor should be duly thankful. Some means should be found whereby organized labor may inform its own membership, and the public, that "we don't patronize" and why "we don't patronize," but every time the ordinary citizen passes a restaurant before which stands a bawling "barker," he instinctively feels like going in and ordering a square meal even if he has just eaten, and for the reason that the picketers are generally offensive brawlers who speak with a foreign accent and manifest tendencies unamerican and anarchistic. And yet the public has a right to know, and the aggrieved has a right to have the public know, what the issues are in every labor dispute. It is the business of society to provide a means whereby the facts may be made public decently, and in good order. That also is something to which a free legislature may well give constructive attention. While the Los Angeles ordinance is probably an invasion of personal rights, and therefore not worth the paper it is written on, its educational value may prove great. It may lead to the establishment of a labor court with power to hear, if not to determine, issues involved in labor disputes that the general, fair minded, justice loving, long suffering public may know what to think and how to act. In most cases that will settle the issue.

Expelled From Home

It is far to Kiev, but not so far that human sympathy may not reach out with at least a well-wishing for the 7,593 Jews that have been expelled from that city, with a warning of three hours to three days, and all since the first of May. Denied access to the land, and confined within narrow limits in the towns of Russia, this wonderful people have made themselves hated because where others are stupid they are keen, where others are shiftless they toil, where others know not the value of a rouble they know the power that lies in a kopeck. Unable to compete with this people in commerce, in industry, in finance or in mind the brutish Russians drive them forth without mercy, themselves to live in greater poverty and degradation because they are gone. When these people reach our shores, as very likely most of them will, they will come to us alien in thought, in custom, in ideals of life, in all things save that they will rejoice to be free and will be ambitious to better their condition. If we dislike them, as we shall, it will be because of their virtues rather than because of their vices, but two generations will not have passed before they will have fitted into their new environment as perfectly as the sons and daughters of the Revolution. All they need is to be given a chance, just a chance and, after all, what race needs more? What race has failed to respond to opportunity three generations long? Equality of opportunity! Is there anything in all the world better worth fighting for than that? And that is what Republican insurgency is fighting for now.

The Daylight Saloon

Gentlemen have jumped to the conclusion that Mr. William J. Bryan's political career has definitely closed because, in opposition to the prevailing sentiment within his party in Nebraska, he stood for county option on the liquor question rather than for local option and the "daylight" saloon. That Mr. Bryan's political future belongs to the past is probably true enough, but if anything can resurrect him it will be his staunch standing for a moral principle and going down with flying colors, fighting for what he believes best for his state. Probably it is not that Nebraska Democrats love Bryan less but whisky more. But what shall we of California say of Nebraska when the most that the liquor interests in that state dare to ask for is local option, together with the privilege of keeping their gin shops open from sun-up to sun-set only in those communities that will tolerate them at all? The daylight saloon! Advocated by saloon keepers and championed by the saloon influence! In the language of the street, isn't that "going some?" And does it not "look good" to one who lives where saloons are open from year's end to year's end, all day and all night? This incident serves to show how far California must travel temperance-ward before it reaches the elevation of saloon sentiment in Nebraska. Is it not about time to be moving?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The nearest of the two thousand or more suns we see on a starlit night is some 270,000 times 93,000,000 miles distant from us, and there are others so far away that light which started from them toward us when Father Abraham was born, coming right along at the rate of 186,000 miles per second, has not got here yet, and these suns, which we call stars, are presumed to be the centers of other solar systems. In comparison how insignificant, then, is our earth?

And yet our earth is so large that notwithstanding such eternally snow-capped mountain ranges as the Andes and the Himalayas, the Alps and the Mountains of the Moon, the Rockies and Sierras, viewed at a sufficient distance, its surface seems as smooth, round and symmetrical as the fairest orange or pomelo displayed upon the stand of a fruit seller.

How often does the question come home to each of us, Where in all this immensity are we and our loves and our hates, our commerce and our industry, our struggles from barbarism to civilization, our yearnings for democracy and rebellions against plutocracy?

There are two ways of looking at it to which we are accustomed, into the eye of the telescope and out through the object lens, or in through the object lens and out through the eye-piece. The first makes man the image of the God of all this universe, a little lower than the angels and crowned with glory and honor; the second reduces man to grass which today is and tomorrow will be cast into the oven. Looking through neither end of the telescope do we see things as they are. The one way exaggerates many diameters, the reverse minimizes as grotesquely. If we would see things as they are we must view them face to face.

One way of looking at the problem is that all this immensity, this visible and invisible universe, stretching off into space hundreds of millions of times hundreds of millions of miles, was made for us, only us mortals who succeed each other on this earth, perhaps a thousand-and-a-half-millions at a time, with an average change of personnel about three times each century. Great We, Us & Co., if this be so.

Another way of looking at it is through an imagination that fixes this earth as a possible breeding ground for millions times millions of human souls that, from the dawn of the creation of man, are taking the wings of morning and evening and passing from "World to luminous world as far as the universe spreads its flaming wall," until we shall people that universe as we graduate, grade by grade, from brutish savage to redeemed and purified souls, filling all solar systems with light and love and life.

Sometimes again, if we are a bit humbled through our own ineffectiveness, we feel that we are as dust and that God little heeds whether we sink or swim, live or die. To be sure, we are assured that not so much as a sparrow falls without the knowledge of the Father, but what good does that do the sparrow? He falls just the same, and so do we, and every fall hurts.

In very truth we do not know about any of these things and we cannot know about them. For want of this knowledge we fall back into the sheltering arms of faith, faith that the manager of this immensity, and manager as well of that infinitesimality that the microscope reveals to us as readily as the telescope yields its revelation, faith that he will do all things well. We do this, not because, in our wisdom, we have reasoned to that conclusion, but because there is nothing else to do, unless we despair and die, and how shall we know that we have escaped even then? We trust because we must.

The God who made us left us nothing else to do but trust our maker. It is as inevitable as life itself, but we shall find greater joy in doing willingly what we must do unwillingly.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Our Tide of Italian Immigration

Doubtless sunny Italy is not being depopulated, nor is there any likelihood that it will be, for its lure as the most naturally attractive of European countries will not depart from it. Nevertheless, as one notes the figures relating to emigration from that country, it is impossible to avoid a suspicion that it must feel the drain in recent years. Observe the steadily increasing stream, as it flows in this direction: In 1870 about 3000 Italians came to this country; by 1880 the number had increased to 12,000; in 1890 it reached 52,000; in 1900, 100,000, and by 1903 the number of Italians arriving here was 230,000. That is to say, the number of these immigrants multiplied itself by 77 in a third of a century, and the number still is increasing. This, it will be noted, includes only the immigration in the United States. In addition to this was a large immigration in Argentina, Brazil and other countries in South America and elsewhere. Indeed, it is probable that Italian migration at this time amounts to no less than 400,000 annually, and this is a tremendous drain on a nation of hardly 32,500,000 inhabitants. As for the reason why these multitudes leave a country which nature has blessed more than most countries of the world, it must be found in governmental mal-administration; in that system which sets one noble against a score of beggars, leaving the beggars dissatisfied, however the noble may feel.

Monarchy a Little Family Arrangement

All Europe is governed by one family. There is no exception to this rule unless it be the Sultan of Turkey, and what wife related to the ruling family of Europe he may have had probably none but an expert could say. To illustrate, King George of England is related to every king and emperor in Europe except the Sultan and the King of Italy. Both the Czar and Czarina are his first cousins, and so is Kaiser Wilhelm and the Queen of Spain. The King of Greece is his uncle, and the prospective king and queen both are his first cousins. The Queen of Norway is his sister. Brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts, nephews and nieces, brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, cousins in some degree—to sum it all up, the chain of relationship extends everywhere. It is a moot question, considerably discussed in newspapers and periodicals, whether or not this family to which the world salaams has a name, but why should the little matter of a name matter while the family wears a score of crowns and sways an equal number of scepters? As for the peculiar quality of "divine right," or the superior strain of merit and worth, by virtue of which this family nods and the millions kowtow, probably it will be well not to inquire closely into these things.

How Do You Wear Your Shoes?

Scarpology is what it is called, and as it is probable that nobody would know what the word means, it is at once explained that it is the science which deals with the manner in which people wear out the soles of their shoes. Didn't know there was such a science? This shows how ignorant you are of the latest doings in the great world of intellectual advancement. The father of this science—no, not the step-father; this is no place to drag in a soulless pun—is Dr. Garrier, of Basle, Switzerland. The eminent doctor says that by observing the manner in which a person wears out the soles of his shoes one who is learned in his science can accurately determine the person's character; whether he is a villain or a saint, an individual of depraved nature or one of high motives and living. To illustrate the idea, it behooves everybody—still according to Dr. Garrier—to beware of anybody who wears out the toe and the external edge of the sole simultaneously. This is but a single illustration; of course, to know all about approved and disapproved methods of wearing out the shoe, extended research, such as Dr. Garrier has given the subject, will be required. Verily, queer things are done in the sacred name of Science. Was there not a time when alchemy and astrology were pets of hers, and mighty as are her steps, she does not always entirely outrun Pseudo-science.

The Cow Versus the Child

"Is a cow or a child worth more in France?" is a question which is asked by Clement Vautel in the Matin of Paris. He answers it by asserting that in the rural districts the cow is worth the more, at any rate, judging by the attitude of the government toward the two. He illustrates his position by citing the case of a village in Auvergne. In this village there was an epidemic of diphtheria resulting in the death of a number of children. The nearest physician lived at a distance of fourteen miles, and charged eight dollars for a professional visit. The peasants were poor and could not afford to pay for a doctor's services, the state apparently was not interested, and as a result of this double condition the children died. Now see what would have happened if it had been the peasant's cow instead of his child which was sick. The peasant would have informed the village burgomaster, the burgomaster would have notified the prefect, and the prefect would have ordered the veterinary surgeon of the nearest town to attend to the health of the cow. The veterinary's bill of six dollars per visit would have been paid by the state. The government ministers to the sick cow, but the sick child may take its chances. On the whole, Clement Vautel's answer to his own question appears to be justifiable.

A Two-Year-Old Artilleryman

In that little argument which our dearly beloved Uncle Samuel had with Spain some ten or twelve years ago, he was a victor, and not particularly proud of the fact. Since then, however, the Spanish army has been increased, and who knows what might have happened if this had taken place some years ago? Fortunately this was impossible, as the increase consists of Don Jaime, the son of the king, and Don Jaime is barely two years old. To this fortunate fact is due Uncle Sam's escape—perhaps. Smile not at all. Don Jaime was made a private in the fourth regiment of Spanish field artillery but the other day, and his joinder to the service was consummated with much solemnity and ceremony, the bewildered and wondering infant being pompously initiated into a uniform which a gaudy colonel guaranteed to be the right thing for fourth artillery privates. The question at once arises why they did not make a general, a colonel, or at least a major, of the puling babe, but it may be that the Spaniards wished to give other nations a show for existence, and very likely, too, they wished plenty of chances to promote the infant. All one needs is an inchoate sense of humor, and the operations of royalty will keep him happy.

Another Blow at Shakespeare

For a long time now a considerable contingent of learned people have insisted that Shakespeare didn't write Shakespeare, that he was mistaken in thinking that he did, or, if he was not, some of the rest of us are. This was a blow for Shakespeare, but blow is added to blow in the claim, made by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence before the Bacon society of London, that the great William could not write his own name. Of course if he could not it quite naturally follows that he did not write his works, and there is a fair presumption that somebody else did it for a joke on him. Several copies of Shakespeare's signature are in existence, but Sir Edwin of the hyphenated name insists that these either were signed by a clerk, who must have neglected to attach "His X Mark" to the name, or are forgeries. It does not appear that any proof was submitted in substantiation of this claim, but it long must have been noticed that the opponents of Shakespeare as Shakespeare do not insist greatly on proof; it is enough for them to realize that little is known of Shakespeare's life, and hence it inevitably follows that he could not have been a genius. The Shakespeare signatures were written at different times and places, but what of that? Could not the clerk in each instance have signed the name, omitting "His X Mark?" and, for that matter, the same clerk could have been sent for. Shakespeare could not write! Well, was there ever such a person, anyway?

Building Operations in Cities

A document issued by the United States geological survey shows that 51 of the large cities of this country reported the cost of their building operations for the years 1907, 1908 and 1909. It makes a pretty showing, a prettier showing, in fact, than any of us can comprehend, for the sum total of this cost was almost two billion dollars, or, to be exact, $1,984,162,823, or an average of nearly $39,000,000 to each one of these cities. The year 1908 showed the effect of the panic by the investment of nearly eighty million dollars less in such operations than was invested in 1907, but in 1909 more than $125,000,000 more was invested than in the palmy days of two years earlier. The average cost of a building in New York City in 1909 was $24,387, and the average cost of a building in San Francisco that year was $4,536.

Increase of Size in Steamships

Greater and constantly greater are the steamships which are constructed to voyage upon the Atlantic. As late as 1887 the largest of these liners was 560 feet long. By 1897 this length had been increased to 625 feet, which was but a moderate gain. Three years ago, or in 1907, the Lusitania, 762 feet long, was the largest of the great liners. Now, however, the Cunard line is about to construct a vessel, of 50,000 tons burden, which probably will be 1,000 feet long, or nearly a third longer than its greatest predecessor. And no man knows when the end will be reached.

The Toronto Evening Telegraph "discharges a debt of gratitude in acknowledging that it was Goldwin Smith whose timely aid made possible the establishment of this journal, free and untrammelled, with no ends to serve except the public good, with no obligations except those of public duty."

Union Square Hotel

POST STREET
At Stockton

Best Location in San Francisco; Faces Union Square
and the Victory Monument

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PLANS

Terms Moderate

Cuisine Excellent

Take Sutter St. Cars to Stockton St.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES
AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

"THE POETIC NEW WORLD"

Much favor has attended the publication in recent years of a variety of convenient little pocket collections of poetry, gathered together between two covers because of some similarity of theme or manner, says the Springfield Republican. Such, for example, was "The Open Road," one of the earliest and most attractive of these volumes, in which E. V. Lucas showed a rare appreciation in the selection of both poetry and prose dealing with topics of life in the open air. Among other such volumes may be mentioned "The Friendly Town," sort of a supplement to "The Open Road." More recently Henry Holt & Co., who published both "The Open Road" and "The Friendly Town," have published "The Poetic Old World," which, in similarly convenient compass, included poetry relating to all Europe and the British Isles, compiled by Miss Lucy H. Humphrey. There now comes from the Holt company, through Johnson's bookstore in this city, a companion volume, also edited by Miss Humphrey, under the title, "The Poetic New World." It is printed upon thin paper, so that in spite of its 526 pages it does not make a bulky volume for the pocket, or for the satchels of those who unfortunately have no pockets, and its covers are soft and pliable after the pattern of the collections which have just been referred to.

The plan upon which the contents of this collection has been arranged is simple and excellent. The opening pages are devoted to poems dealing with "The Explorers," and included in this division are passages from Lowell's "The Voyage to Vinland," Sidney Lanier's "Columbus," Walt Whitman's "Prayer of Columbus" and others. Then comes a division devoted to "New England" as a whole, after which come many pages devoted to the various celebrated portions of Massachusetts which are arranged more or less in geographical order from east to west. The poems of Whittier, Longfellow, Lowell, Bryant and Holmes naturally claim the chief attention, but it is to be noted that space has been found most properly for two of the late R. W. Gilder's poems upon Tyringham, in addition to which Edith Wharton's exquisite "Moonrise Over Tyringham" also finds its appropriate place. Following Massachusetts, Maine comes next in order, and under the heading of the Pine Tree state there are as many selections from Whittier alone as from all other poets. Then come New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island and Connecticut in their proper order, and it is a significant reminder of the poetic development in this new world that not until half the volume is read through does the reader take a poetical journey outside of New England.

Upon the whole the selections have been well made, for while they have chiefly been taken from the works of those who have long been recognized as the chief poets of America, there are not a few selections from contemporaneous, or nearly contemporaneous, verse. Henry Van Dyke, for example, is represented by numerous selections; Richard Watson Gilder and Edith Wharton have already been mentioned, while Joaquin Miller, James Whitcomb Riley, Hamlin Garland and others are also represented. There is pleasure, too, in finding that the late Guy Wetmore Carroll finds a place with his poem entitled "When the Great Gray Ships Come In," written in the summer following the Spanish war, for his death when still a youth was one of the many tragedies which have denied the fulfillment of apparent rich promise in American letters. It is of interest to note that the last poem of all is "A Song of Panama," by Alfred Damon Runyon, which is a Kipling-esque picture of work and life at the great canal. But this very poetic journey to the isthmus suggests the one serious criticism to be made of the collection. If Panama is to be included and the title of "The Poetic New World" is to be fairly justified, why should there not have been an inclusion also of Mexico, and particularly of Canada? At the moment there does not come to mind any poetry of particular merit relating to the republic to the south of us, although reflection would doubtless recall more or less that would be worthy of a place. But the case of Canada is more striking, for the many beautiful poems of the late Archibald Lampman at once suggest themselves, not to speak of the French-Canadian "Habitant" poems of the late Dr. Drummond. Why there should have been these omissions it is difficult to understand.

THEATRICAL NOTES

Charles Frohman put "Love Among the Lions," Winchell Smith's comedy from the novel of that name, in rehearsal last week. A. E. Mathews and May Blaney, English actors, are to have the leading roles.

The Earl of Yarmouth has returned to the stage again under the name of Eric Hope and says that he is going to star in a musical comedy he has written himself and which he has named "The Pigeon House."

Margaret Illington, who seems to find darn ing socks rather tame, is going to use a play called "Until Electricity" to return to the stage in. It is an adaptation from the French by Edward Elsner.

Maude Adams went abroad week before last and is said to be headed for London to consult J. W. Barrie about a new play. This looks as if the "Chantecler" plan might wisely have been dropped.

Adrienne Augarde, who was one of the great attractions of "The Dollar Princess" in New York last season, is filling in her vacation by acting in a sketch called "Dick's Sister" in London.

Hall Caine's new four-act drama, "The Bishop's Son," is to be produced in London on August 15. It deals with a man who has sinned, but who works out his own salvation.

"THE DIGRESSIONS OF V"

"The Digressions of V," the autobiography of Elihu Vedder, is announced for publication by Houghton Mifflin as follows: In his long life, both in America and in the art centres of Europe, Mr. Vedder has known most of the interesting people of the time—especially among artists. But the book introduces other eminent men incidentally; its unique interest lies in its full, candid, and breezy embodiment of the author's own ripe experience and engaging temperament. One of the best talkers of his time, Mr. Vedder in his book has contrived to express himself so fully that the delighted reader has a feeling that he is engaged in an intimate conversation, listening to the personal reminiscences or humorous whimsies, the suggestive asides, of a man of genius. Few books of autobiography have been so frank, none, perhaps, has ever been so lighted by the continuous play of a rich and mellow humor.

Not the least notable side of the book is its artistic side. It is lavishly illustrated from hundreds of reproductions of Mr. Vedder's paintings, sketches, etc., used both as full-page illustrations and as text-cuts in such a way as not only to embellish, but actually to illustrate the text. There are four full-page cuts in color, but the majority are carefully reproduced and printed with the text upon the text-paper in such a way as to blend with remarkable harmony with the text itself.

Another interesting feature of the book is the poetic half-titles, written and embellished by the author himself, which precede the chapters. In addition to this, Mr. Vedder has made for this book, as for his very successful illustrated edition of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, designs for the cover, for the end papers, headpieces, tail-pieces, etc., etc., so it is, in short, the complete expression of one of the most interesting personalities of the time.

AMATEUR THEATRICALS

"All of us have known the mingled pain and pleasure roused by witnessing 'amateur theatricals,'" says Walter Prichard Eaton in the Woman's Home Companion for August. "Many of us have known the joys of inflicting this pain and pleasure, disguised in wigs and rouge and festive clothes. But, common as is the impulse toward amateur dramatic entertainments, even in our colleges such entertainments are only beginning to be used educationally; and the real scope and field of amateur effort on the stage is only beginning to be generally understood. In a word, amateurs should act in plays which have a definite historic or artistic value, but which cannot be seen on the professional stage; and they should, still further, develop the professionally untilled field of out-of-door theatrical entertainments. Outdoor acting calls for less subtlety and technical skill than indoor, and many plays impossible to amateurs on a stage are well adapted to amateurs in a grove. The open-air play is cheap, novel and can be made very beautiful and potent. It represents almost a lost art, which amateurs can restore to the world."

PLAYS AND PLAYERS

Mrs. Annie Yeamans has been in a New York hospital for some weeks. She was obliged to undergo an operation, but is now rapidly recovering.

A new play by Sir Arthur Wing Pinero is soon to be produced in London, and it is understood that Marie Lohr is to have the leading role.

Rumor has it that Mary Mannering is reading her "As You Like It" diligently these days, as she hopes to appear as Rosalind before long.

Charles Klein has completed a new play called "The Gamblers," which is to be produced under his direction in New York before long.

Californian Poets' CornerPOEMS BY MARSHALL ILSLEY

Mr. Marshall Ilsley, formerly a resident of Santa Barbara, published a small volume of verse a number of years ago, and from it these two sonnets are taken.

TESS OF THE D'URBERVILLES

Terror and pity have uplifted me
As with the scepter of the elder lays,
And led me out of narrowing paths to ways
Where Fate imperial lords humanity.
Fate wrestling with a woman's love.—To kneel!
Unbent before the picture no man stays,
It steals the breath, it fills the eye, it says,—
Your self-love makes her true love tragedy.
Antigone comes forth to wipe her eyes;
Cordelia lowly calls her sister sweet;
Margaret befriends; and pale Pompilia flies
On gentle wings of purity to greet;
But Hester Prynne knows best to sympathize,
To bind her wounds and kiss her bleeding feet.

A DESERT JUNCTION

Whither away? Ah, whither leafless wind?
Wind of a shriveled autumn where appears
No purple pageantry of mellowed tress
In wreathed sorrow of fulfillments kind:
But like the regions of an idiot's mind
The land is bare, and vague, and full of fears Writhing. Ah hist! by apprehensive ears
Sweeps the wild rush of careless Fate and blind.
Whither away? In life's gray pilgrimage
There come these desert junctions of despair,
All shadeless sand with dusty-colored sage,
And hillocks meaningless, and heat and glare,
With but the betterment the winds presage
That come from somewhere and must go somewhere.

"DUNCAN MAC"

By JAMES SMITH

"Princes and lords are but the breath of kings,
An honest man's the noblest work of God."

Duncan's forbears cam' frae the hie'lands
o' bonnie Scotland—the land o' the brown heath and shaggy heather, the land the maister hand o' Sir Wattie Scott has painted in such bright an' vivid colors. He has spread his mantle o' romance ower a' the hills an' glens and mony a kilted cateran was turned into a hero by his magic touch.

Nae hie'lan'man wi' ony pretensions to genteelty cud demean himsel by honest work, for he wha labors wi' his hands has in a' ages been looked doon on and the laborer himsel has an inborn reverence for those wha neither toil nor spin, but wha are aye decked oot in braw raiment at his expense.

The prood chieftain when his plenishin' got scanty wad march at the head o' his fightin' men, harrie the lowlands an' tak' a' things which werena ower heavy tae carry—the lowlands being looked up as happy huntin' grounds for hie'landers, an' mony were the droves o' cattle which were driven awa to the hills afore the morning awoke, by the wild lads, and when the rightfu' owner tried to save his beasties a' he got for his pains was the stab o' a dirk or a slash frae a claymore.

The sma' rogue was just as much despised then as noo an' dire punishment was quickly meted oot to him, when captured; but the chief o' a powerfu' clan was feared and respected just as we fear and respect oor ain captains o' industry wha are lootin' a nation.

Lang syne, however, when the chieftain wad o'erstep the bounds o' prudence in his pillaging he was hunted doon an' killed wi' little ceremony; but oor captains dinna venture their lives or liberties when plundering a people. Na, na, the ruthless men o' the present are far wiser than those o' the past, for they hae made the lawmakers their hirlings and sae are weel protected in their depredations.

The danger o' his callin' made it possible for Scott to mak' a heroic figure oot o' Rob Roy, the redoubtable outlaw, for often for his crimes Rob was chased among the hills by a regiment o' red coated soldiers an' lang he escaped his doom. But brought to bay at last he stood his ground like a brave man and died wi' his face to the foe—wi' his bloody sword still clasped in his death grip.

But wha in the name of common sense cud clothe wi' romance a Morgan, a Rockefeller or a Guggenheim? Even Andrew himsel dressed in his kilts looks a maist peectifu' figure.

Oor Duncan presently sits in congress in the interests o' the Southern Pacific railroad for oor second congressional district and it is hoped his comin' speeches will be o' the nature o' farewell addresses.

We hae the noo the best behaved and maist amenable set o' men in congress o' ony state in the union; they keep so quiet ye wad hardly ken they were in the hoose at a'. An' biddable! My certes they are shinin' examples to a' machine-made polticeens. They dinna believe in makin' trouble and we a' ken hoo they will vote aforehand, for they hae their minds made up—by Maister Herrin.

But Willie Kent, wha will occupy Duncan's seat when the new congress meets, is o' a different stamp; in fact, he is an Honest Man, an' as the poet says, "An honest man's the noblest work of God." He has aye stood for Right Things and has already dune Great Things, and when he enters the hoose a'body will tak' notice, for it will be such a strange sight to see California sendin' a real Man—a God-made man—to serve the People faithfully—to stand up at a' time for the Square Deal. An' we will a' be so prood o' him that we will be anxious to send mair o' the likes o' him an' California will then tak' her rightfu' place among the Free States and whar she shud hae been lang syne.

The Scots, methinks, unnecessarily pray. "O

Lord gie us a gude conceit o' oorsells." Weel, tak' a look at Duncan's face and ye will see his prayer has been answered—ay, he got mair than he bargained for.

Oor Duncan was a painter lad,
But not o' pictures good or bad;
His brush wi' cunning hand he drew O'er carriages baith auld an' new.

But Duncan sighed for ither things.
He worshipped a' the money kings.
An' lang he studied hoo to speak,
A fatal gift for some to seek

O' brilliancy he had the kind
That radiates frae shallow mind—
Ye ken that paste will often shine
An' sparkle like a diamond fine.

But when you deep doon fathomed Mac,
O' Principles ye found a lack,
Those high ideals which point men's eyes
To vistas far beyond the skies.

Noo Duncan's instincts were his curse.
He liked to feel a well lined purse;
To sit doon wi' the wealthy fool,
He didna scorn to be his tool.

Men win their goal by mony tricks,
An' Mac took up wi' Politics.
He lang prepared to play the part,
Success was his right frae the start.

The Chief can recognize the lad
Wha'll dae the things that he is bade,
An' Herrin saw the mark he knew
Was unco plain on Duncan's broo.

Noo Duncan's heart it took a jump
When he was tauld to tak' the stump
An' preach against the Silver craze—
He spoke an' won his Maister's praise.

His paint pot! Honest kindly pot!!
Sae lang his freen was sune forgot,
An' he was tauld to learn the law
An' mix wi' rogues baith great an' sma'.

Syne Herrin, sure as sure cud be,
That Mac was frae sic scruples free,
Sent him into a higher sphere
Whar' Honest men find little cheer.

Here Duncan felt quite at his ease,
An' through the Push he made a squeeze,
Till Cannon smiled on him wi' joy
An' made him his ain Message Boy.

An' Taft took Dunc' upon his knee—
The laddie cleaned his boots at sea—
An' Duncan dreamed about a goal
That led him to a land o' coal.

Next Ballinger wi' freen'ly hand
Hailed him as worthy o' the hand
To tender on a Silver plate
To Guggie all Alaska state.

But trouble rose that a' cud see,
An' Cannon cried maist anxiously,
"On you, my Dunc, I can rely;
Among Insurgents, be my spy."

An' when the Tariff Steal went through,
Oor Dunc was there—his vote "me too";
An' things were lookin' awfu' bright
When Duncan got a fearfu' fright.

A daring Man, a Willie Kent,
Had in Mac's country pitched his tent,
Unfurled his flag, Insurgent blue.
A gallant Man, baith tried an' true.

An' People a' cam' forth to see
Their servant wha wad faithfu' be,
A Man wha fought the Beast before
An' drove it frae the poor man's door.

Noo Duncan crawled up to his chief
An' licked his shoes, wi' heart o' grief,
An' cried, "O, Chief, what must I do,
I wha hae been a slave to you?"

An' then his Maister stowling said:
"They'll bury you, for you are dead,
Thou bungling fool! To work sae raw
That a' the People plainly saw."

Again the old tale has been told,
For love o' pow'r or lure o' gold;
Anither fell frae Man's estate,
Doon, doon to meet the traitor's fate.

O, Duncan! O, my likely lad!
Your public ending, O, how sad!!!
How better far your former lot,
An' honest painter wi' his pot.

HOW HAY WROTE LITTLE BREECHES

In one of his letters John Hay described the circumstances attending the composition of his favorite "Little Breeches": On the train as I journeyed to New York I entertained myself by writing "Little Breeches."
The thing was done merely for my own amusement, without the smallest thought of print. But when I showed it to Whitelaw Reid he seized the manuscript and published it in the Tribune. By that time the lilt and swing of the Pike county ballad had taken possession of me. I was filled with the Pike county spirit, as it were, and the humorous side of my mind was entertained by its rich possibilities. Within a week after the appearance of "Little Breeches" in print all the Pike county ballads were written. After that the impulse was completely gone from me.
* * * There were no more Pike county ballads in me, and there never have been any since.

LIBRARY ROOF READING ROOMS

The roof garden is an established institution, as is the roof playground and recreation center, says the Chicago Record-Herald. New York has led, other cities have followed, and today the idea of using roofs during the summer to take children, mothers and young people off the streets, and to provide them there with games, music, story-telling, is quite familiar.

Not so familiar is the roof reading-room, but it deserves to be, and doubtless soon will be a household term among librarians, settlement and educational workers. The New York public library has five roof reading-rooms, and they are planned and equipped for both afternoon and evening use. Los Angeles has such reading-rooms, and perhaps other municipalities also. They are extremely popular during the summer months.

"SIMON, THE JESTER"

It is announced by the John Lane company that "Simon, the Jester," W. J. Locke's new novel, of which they are the publishers, has been in such great demand as to require the issue of a second large edition within a fortnight after its first appearance. In spite of the fact that the novel was only published the middle of June, it immediately won its way into the ranks of the best sellers. It is declared that the story is proving the most popular that Mr. Locke has written since he made his great hit with the "Beloved Vagabond."

EARNINGS OF FAMOUS PLAYS

The Dramatic Mirror states that "Rip Van Winkle" is the only play credited with having earned $5,000,000, and Jefferson is said to have acted it 5000 times. It was done for three years at the Boston theatre to full houses every night. "The Old Homestead" is said to have cleaned up $4,500,000, "Charlie's Aunt," $2,500,000; "The Private Secretary," $700,000; and "Sweet Lavender," $300,000.
"Dorothy" was good for at least $650,000; "A Chinese Honeymoon" for $350,000; "San Toy" for $400,000. Goodness alone knows what "Way Down East" has earned for "Joe" Grismer and "Ben Hur" for Klaw & Erlanger, to say nothing of such minor hits as "Florodora,"
"The Merry Widow," "The Music Master" and
"The Little Minister." The profits of all these would take seven figures apiece to give.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

When We Do Not Catch a Fish

You recall how you went fishing on a pleasant summer day
 When each moment seemed a blessing from its Heavenland astray?
 Then your rod and line were ready, and the fish were in the stream,
 But the dancing shadows lured you and invited you to dream.
 There a meadowlark was trilling, here a breeze was wooing you,
 And the day was made for dreaming, as the soul within you knew.
 So the hours went lazing by you tranquilly as heart could wish,
 But perhaps you noticed, brother, that you didn't catch a fish.

So it is by life's great river—There are visions that allure, Whisp'ring us, "Avoid the struggle, for your dreams alone endure.
 Lo, the days are full of glory, and the golden sunbeams gleam
 O'er the fishers by the river—better, weary heart, to dream."
 And too oft we heed the whisper; rod and line all idly fall;
 Let the toilers bear the burden, we will labor not at all.
 So we sit beside the river where the waters swirl and swish,
 But perhaps you've noticed, brother, that we do not catch a fish.

I have seen a host of fishers in my swiftly flitting day,
 And, in fact, I've done some fishing in a desultory way;
 I have seen the ones who tended with discretion to their bait,
 And I've also seen the fellows who examined hooks too late;
 I have met the clan of workers, and the tribe of loafers, too,
 And I base on them a moral which I here impart to you:
 There are fishes in the river; we may lure them if we wish,
 But there's more than dreaming needed if we ever catch a fish.

So He Went Down Stairs

"You knew that there was a constant combat between the forces of good and evil in the world whence you came, did you not?" Saint Peter remarked to the tremulous soul at the gate.

"I did," the tremulous soul replied.

"And you were the editor of a paper, were you not?"

The tremulous soul shifted to his other foot (who said that souls do not have feet?), and replied:

"I was."

"And with which side did your paper ally itself?" Saint Peter continued.

The tremulous soul at first thought it would lie out of it; then it realized that, as the great book lay open before Peter, the plan would not work. So it brokenly answered:

"I—well—that is—you see—I generally waited to see which side the big money and the political interests were on, and then I—"

"You may as well step right down stairs," Saint Peter interrupted, "you will find most of that sort of thing down there. Next!"

Of course there was nothing else for the poor soul to do.

P. S.—Naturally, a fellow dislikes to think of an editor being treated in that way, but when one reflects on the tremendous issue presented to the people of this state today—the issue between Manhood and Serfdom—and when one observes the my-hand-is-behind-me attitude of certain editors, fortunately not very many—well, painful as it is, I don't see how it could have been avoided, do you? Of course, it is too bad, but what could one have expected?

The Opinions of Rufus

Blessed is the man who has something he considers jest es good es the thing he wanted an' didn't git.

If the parson hadn't asked fer a raise o' salary I'd have thought more of his sermon on the duty of bein' contented with what we've got.

A man advertised for an honest lawyer that was poor, an' everybody said they guessed if he found him he would be.

I wouldn't ask anything any better than to be able to see an' do my own duty es easy es I can another man's.

Money talks, but lots o' times it can't be educated to say anything but good-bye.

Character is you, reputashun is the clothes you wear, an' it orto be expected that the rest of us see an' know a good deal more of the clothes than we do of the feller that's inside them.

The old theery that dogs have no souls would seem reasonable 'nough if folks didn't insist that all men have.

I b'lieve that women orto have the right to vote, unless I see some of the hats they wear.

Money used to make the mare go, but now it's gone into the business of makin' the automobile honk.

We may not b'lieve it, but like es not the best proof that our neighbor's right lies in the fact that he don't agree with us.

This is a world of pathos, but 'tain't often we see a sight so affectin', an' so warranted to cause an outburst of tears, es Mayor McCarthy caught in the act of bitterly inveighin' 'gainst prize-fight pictures.

It must be a poor an' unforchunit wretch indeed who can't feel a thrill of honest pride in reflectin' that in his time he's helped the great Pullman company to pay dozens or hundreds of its porters an' conductors.

A Talk With Somebody's Son

You would like to be wealthy, wouldn't you, son? Often you dream of how splendid it would be if you could have so much money that you would not have to pause to consider whether you should spend a nickel or ten cents for something you wanted. "Ah," you sometimes say to yourself, "if only I could have enough so that I could own an automobile and a yacht and pay the porter on the train all that he appears to expect, how glorious it would be! I should be perfectly happy!" So you have thought and felt many a time, and people who feel in that way constantly are jostling one another on the streets.

Well, son, I once knew a man who was as wealthy as you would be. He could own an automobile and a yacht, and he even could tip two or three porters without having a bank refuse to honor his check. Do you think he was perfectly happy? Well, if he was, he was more successful in concealing happiness than any other person I ever met—except when he realized that he was making a nickel; at such times I fancied that I could detect a gleam of pleasure on his countenance. At other times—well, the people who lived in the same block with him had to go without milk because it turned sour whenever he passed.

But let us do justice to this man, son. At last, after many years, he did a fine thing with his money. What was it, do you ask? Why, he died, and somebody else was given a chance to make his wealth useful. I don't know that this somebody did make it useful, but, anyway, he had a chance. And I take it, son, that this man was a fair sample of a considerable class. They have money, but if they are happy their faces deceive, and the human countenance is no liar. On the whole, my boy, if you would be happy I fancy it will be well that you echo the wise man's prayer for neither riches nor poverty.

And He Said, Says He

And he said, says he:

I don't know much 'bout the big machine,
 'Bout the sun an' the planets an' stars, I mean;
 I don't know much 'bout the Engineer,
 An' to map His plans, it is not my sp'ere,
 But I leave sech things to the good divines
 With diplomas to teach 'bout the Lord's de-signs.

No, I don't know much as I wish I knew,
 But here is a creed that I'm holdin' to,

An' somehow it gives me a world of cheer:

If I do my best,

I can leave the rest,

With never a doubt, to the Engineer.

And he said, says he:

I don't know the country from which I come,
 And the mists that hide it forever are dumb;
 I ask, but know not whither I fare,
 Though the creedal signboards point every-where.

Oh, blinded, confused, what wonder that I
 Too often have strayed from a purpose high,
 Have strayed and fallen 'mid fogs of doubt,
 Seeing the hosts of the good in rout?

Yet I hold no less to my creed of cheer:

If I do my best,

I can leave the rest,

With never a doubt, to the Engineer.

* * *

Concerning Figs From Thistles

We may as well be reasonable about these things. We do not expect the thistle to yield figs or the poison oak to add anything to the English walnut crop; why, then, should we expect our child to be more and better than his lineage promises?

We hold the little one upon our knee, singing some tender, loving lullaby to him, and, while we sing, what dreams do come! He will be a wonderful man, this babe we fondle; loyal and brave to do his high work in this world—no coward, he. He will be a giant among intellectual giants, and mankind gladly will accord him that distinction. Spiritually strong and beautiful, he will be unfaltering in his devotion to the cause of right, wherever its white banner may lead.

And you are his father! "Ay, there's the rub" as likely as not. He will be brave; and perhaps he was sired by a man who longs to call in a policeman to discharge a hired girl because he is afraid to do it himself. He will be an intellectual giant; and his father's head is shaped like a cocoanut which met with calamity in its earlier development. He will be spiritually beautiful; and his sire's soul is warped all out of shape in the attempt to make a dollar-mark cover its plan of salvation.

Oh, as I said, we may as well be reasonable about these things, brethren and sisters. Our child will be just about such quality of being as you and I are entitled to father or mother; if we are in the thistle line of business, he will not pan out much in the fig market. Here or there one may hark back to a grandparent of some degree who was better or worse than we, but, generally speaking, we will get no French prune from our wild plum tree. Wherefore let us look the truth in the face, and, recognizing the limitation we have placed upon our child, help him to make the best of it.

* * *

Naturally

Hocus—Did you ever hear what happened to the chauffeur who visited New York City for the first time and put in a day looking up at the sky-scrapers and counting their stories?
 Pocus—No, what was it?
 "He got rubber-tired."

A Courteous Gentleman

"The car oscillated, and he suddenly sat down in a woman's lap."
 "He apologized, of course?"

"Well, not exactly, but he offered to exchange places with her."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Politics As a Game

There is a type of mind to which politics as a game proves more attractive than politics either as a profession or for patriotism, and the county of San Diego is not without some very adroit political gamblers. They are all in the "organization" camp. One of the rules of the game is to keep a full treasury and the most acceptable method for attaining that end is to locate and develop a political "good thing." For more than ten years Ulysses S. Grant, a most amiable son of a most honorable sire, served in that capacity for San Diego county, to the vast depletion of the fortune which his late wife brought him, which moved her to so order the expenditure of what remained as to limit it to the support of husband and children. It is estimated that, as a recompense for political preferments, as empty of real value as being made one of a hundred vice-presidents to sit on the rostrum when some candidate makes a speech, Mr. Grant has, since he settled in San Diego, been relieved of a round hundred thousand. He was long in awakening to the truth, but when at last the truth did effect an entrance into the cavity of his brain he closed his cash box with a slam and nothing short of dynamite will ever open it again. Nor was that the only use made of Grant. Being San Diego's most distinguished political asset, the bringing forward of his name for any old thing, from delegate to a national convention to candidate for United States senator, besides being made presidential elector, a number of local patriots were carried into office in his wake who otherwise might never have been inflicted upon a public that had never done anything to San Diego to merit the infliction.

Mr. Spalding Succeeds Grant as "Good Thing"

Ever since the lid went on the Grant cash box, and was nailed down, San Diego "regulars" have been seeking another "good thing." Passing over Madam Tingley as too smart for them, they set snares for the autocrat of the Scripps papers, but he was both wary and inclined to the irregular side of public issues and they dropped him. Then came Mr. A. G. Spalding, the sporting goods man. He had the money and all else that heart can desire except political recognition at the hands of his countrymen. The players-of-the-game made eyes at him with a spontaneity that should have aroused his suspicions. San Diego rose to receive him, stood with head uncovered and folded him to its heart of hearts. His reception was touching. It was intended to be. They had "touched" Grant for a cool hundred thousand, why not Spalding? But Spalding proved to be no ordinary sucker or wide-mouthed catfish. Belonging to the sporting world, it was natural that he should be "game," and he was. He tested their art to the uttermost and, for a time, the chase was as exciting as pursuing a swordfish off Catalina, but the gaff clung and they landed him. If they do not get as much fat out of him before they drop him as they got out of Grant it will be because he sees this paragraph. In fact, this is written for his benefit, and not theirs. He shall not say that The Watchman warned him not.

To Ride In On the Wave

The Spalding wave is billowing up just a bit and on the crest of it a critical observer will discern the grizzled but scratch-awlpated pate of one Leroy Wright. Wright knows without the hazard of trephining that there is no political salvation for himself alone and therefore seeks salvation through the imputed righteousness of another. Not that he has not a long record of good work to his credit, but unfortunately the good work he did in the legislature was mainly done for bad causes and the people of San Diego county know it. To be sure Mr. George H. Van Smith has given him clearance papers, so far as the direct primary law is concerned, but until someone with a right to speak performs a similar service for Mr. George H. Van Smith the chain of evidence must remain incomplete. So the word is being passed from hand to hand and mouth to mouth, throughout the fortieth senatorial district, that it is not of Leroy Wright that Leroy Wright is thinking, but only of Spalding, that if San Diego will re-elect Wright he will secure the election of Spalding to the United States senate. And what a great thing that will be for —Wright. As for Mr. Spalding, he has as little chance of being anything but a "good thing" successor to Grant as a Wright biplane would have in a Kansas tornado. And, by the way, the Wright scheme for electing Spalding to the United States senate—if it advances beyond the stage of electing Wright to the state senate—depends on ignoring the advisory vote of the Republicans of California at the primary election. Such is the loyalty of Leroy Wright to the direct primary law of whose paternity he boasteth!

Not New Party But New Life

Last week it was noised around that Senator Cummins and the other Middle West insurgents proposed to form a new political party composed of insurgent Republicans and Bryan Democrats. Of course it wasn't so. No person in his senses needed to be assured of that. Not but that there is a fellow feeling between insurgent Republicans and Bryan Democrats, for there is in this: Both of them believe in free government and detest corporation rule, and a great many Bryan Democrats this year, in California and everywhere, will vote with the insurgent Republicans, just as many of the Parker Democrats will vote with the "organization" Republicans. In a speech at Council Grove, Kansas, Senator Cummins made it clear that the purpose of Republican insurgency is not to create a new political party, but to capture the old one and make it so progressive, so clean and so alive to the needs of the day that it will have a right to live. This may make it necessary to eliminate a good deal of dry-rotted timber from the party and, during the work of reconstruction, considerable of a muss may be created, but the country can stand that if only the Republican party can be made to represent the progressive, buoyant, militant spirit of a great people unafraid to be free. No, the purpose of Republican insurgency is not to divide, or to kill the party of Lincoln and Roosevelt, but to enter into it, possess it and make it fit to survive. When one hears of any other purpose he may safely set it down as a taint so.

John Works After Them

Whatever faults may be found with John D. Works, it will never be alleged that he has not faith in his own convictions or that he is not frank with the public. In a letter to candidates for the legislature he puts the problems of the day straight up to them and neither dodges himself nor permits anyone else to dodge the issues. He demands to know of them if they propose to abide by the advisory vote in good faith or not; if they are or are not in favor of election of United States senators by direct vote; if they favor the initiative and referendum in state affairs; if they are or are not in favor of a non-partisan judiciary; if they are or are not in favor of eliminating Southern Pacific control in the political affairs of this state; if they do or do not favor extending the civil service system to county and state affairs; if the candidates offering themselves for Republican nomination will work and vote for the reforms indicated in the event of their election to the legislature. The judge exacts no pledge to support his own candidacy. On the contrary he declares that he neither desires nor expects the vote of any legislator whose constituency does not authorize him to vote for John D. Works for United States senator. Any candidate who does not answer in ten days will be treated as having answered in the negative. When in the history of California did any other candidate for the United States senate fight so out in the open, concealing nothing and nothing extenuating?

The Recall Is To Be Tested

The city of Richmond is convulsed. A good deal of civil engineering work has to be done in that young and growing city. A civil engineer, selected by a former board of city trustees, entered upon the task and had made good headway when the new board came into office. One of the new officials had a civil engineer in his own employ for whom he wished to secure the appointment. He won over five other members of the board, the appointment was made and the old engineer was displaced. There was no question as to the competency of the old engineer as there is no question as to the competency of the new. The board threw the old one out because they wanted to, and 500 citizens petitioned that he be retained inasmuch as he had unfinished work to do and making changes through mere caprice was bad public policy. The board of trustees disregarded the petition, declaring that they could not, and would not, be influenced by such things, whereupon the protestants instituted proceedings for the recall of the six trustees who had thrown out the old engineer, elected the new and disdained the petition of citizens. The petition for the calling of a recall election was signed by double the requisite number of voters, but the board of trustees disdained that petition also and refused to call a recall election. Now the matter goes to the courts to compel the trustees to call that election. Just here a new element of interest comes into the case in that the attorney for the Southern Pacific Company is advising the board in relation to the recall issue. This, and other features of the contest, has persuaded many that Mr. Herrin, head of the law department of the Southern Pacific Company, has interested himself in the issue with the view of having the constitutionality of the recall tested in the higher courts. It is known, from his Oregon address, that Mr. Herrin is opposed to direct legislation, that he knows the temper of the courts of appeal in California as probably no one else does, and the inference is drawn that he hopes to head off the recall at any rate by having it declared unconstitutional. The progress of this case may well attract no small share of public attention. If the head of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company can secure the setting aside of direct legislative methods he may be able to restore representative legislative methods and, when he has done that, he will be in a position to resume, at the old stand, the business of making representative legislation represent the interests and views of the corporation for which he works rather than the views and interests of The People of the State of California. Watch the case and watch the courts.

A Successor to Miller In the Thirty-second

There is no gainsaying the fact that E. O. Miller, of the thirty-second senatorial district, made a reputation for being a strong man both on the floor of the senate and in committee. That district has the chance to send to the senate another man as strong as Miller and who will as certainly be on the right side of all issues. It also has the chance to fill the place with as weak legislative timber as may be found on the floor of the upper chamber. E. O. Larkins, of Visalia, is intellectually a strong man and morally incorruptible. Jesse R. Dorsey, of Bakersfield, means well, but he is an unstable equilibrium. He has a surface smartness that makes him take well at first blush, but he lacks depth and robustness and upon no issue can his constituents know in advance where he will be found. To have the Republicans of the thirty-second district fail of nominating Larkins would be a blunder, but, fair warning to Mr. Larkins, Dorsey is a glad-hander and a hustler and the right man for the place may not get it unless he glad-hands a little and hustles, too, especially in Dorsey's own territory, the oil districts of Kern county. Despite disparity in size it is always possible for the victory to go to the more vigilant rather than to the more fit.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK—Continued

Which Shall It Be, Wilbur or Melvin?

It is unthinkable that Republicans north of Tehachapi will, even if they have the votes with which to do it, take away from Southern California both of the places to be filled on the state supreme bench. We western men pride ourselves on our love for fair play, and not to allow Southern California one of the two vacancies would not be playing fair. Whatever tends to foster sectional hard feeling is injurious to the whole state.

Both the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and the "organization" recognized the justness of taking at least one candidate from the south and so the League stood for Sloss and Wilbur, while the "organization" threw their strength to Melvin and James.

But it became evident to the "organization" that Sloss could not be beaten. The Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company wants Melvin retained on the supreme bench. It was preparing, therefore, to throw Judge James overboard when the death of Judge Taggart, of the southern court of appeals, provided an opportunity to shunt James onto that bench. This was done by Governor Gillett appointing James to fill the unexpired term of the late Judge Taggart. Now the issue is between Wilbur and Melvin, with fitness, locality, freedom from corporation pre-deliction, all on the side of Judge Wilbur. If the Men of California would have a free, non-partisan and impartial judiciary they must not permit the one litigant that has cases in all courts to name the judges for those courts, as that litigant has been doing, in the main, for time out of mind. Vote for Judge Wilbur.

Webb or McGowan

There are few more important offices than that of Attorney General. There will be two candidates for nomination to that office on the Republican ticket. One of these is the present incumbent, U. S. Webb, the other is Frank McGowan. General Webb has distinctly made good in office, so good as to have made himself persona non grata with the "organization" with which he had theretofore been affiliated. He should be re-nominated and re-elected, if for no other reason, then because it was Frank McGowan who, at the very height of the graft prosecutions, made the race against W. J. Langdon for district attorney of San Francisco, with, behind him and supporting him, all those influences that were then struggling to set rascality free, forces which finally accomplished their purpose. That is all The Watchman has against Frank McGowan, but that is enough. That he is leading a forlorn hope appears plain enough, even to himself, for, if he is making any effort to be nominated, it is being made under the surface and not above ground, a still hunt and not a fight out in the open.

The Berkeley Picked Ticket

Oakland has a good government organization that has been trying to make up a ticket fit for Republicans to nominate August 16. It was in the main successful, but a few political goats crawled in with the sheep. In Berkeley the organization for good government is the straight-out Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. While it accepted the greater part of the Oakland ticket, it cut out some goats and let in a few sheep to the betterment of the ticket as a whole. Particularly, it endorsed Dr. T. B. Holmes for coroner in place of Dr. Tisdale, who should have no place on any ticket. And it endorsed G. W. Bacon for county auditor, whereas the Oakland organization failed of making any nomination for that office. Bacon is the man who should be nominated. It is noted also that the Berkeley organization stood loyally by C. C. Young for the assembly, who should by rights be without opposition of any kind either for nomination or election. The Berkeley league also endorsed E. J. Tyrrell for the state senate in opposition to Frank Leavitt. Tyrrell is a young man of good parts and well vouched for, but it is unfortunate that the reform influences did not bring out a stronger and more experienced man against Leavitt, whose fault is that he takes the wrong side of nearly all issues with great force and masterly abilities. All he lacks of being one of the big men of the state is the requisite moral quality, but, lacking that, he lacks all things and should be beaten for everything political as often as he sticks up his head. Vote for Tyrrell.

Pulcifer In A Paragraph

When the district advisory vote scheme of the "organization" was in the throes of life or death, and Assemblyman C. C. Young of Berkeley had cast the needful vote to kill it, thus saving to the people a state-wide vote on United States senators it was Assemblyman Harry W. Pulcifer who rose in his place and changed his vote from "no" to "aye," and so inflicted that monstrosity upon the people. For this offense against the public interest he should be retired to private life forever. Having first voted in the public interest, he deliberately changed his vote to the interests of those whose purpose it was to confuse and confound the people's choice, and he did it with deliberation. That alone should finish Pulcifer in the fiftieth district.

But that was not his only instance of arraying himself on the wrong side. There are others. When the infamous "gag" rules were sought to be forced upon the assembly, Pulcifer voted for them. Throughout his career in the assembly he showed that he was all right except when he was badly needed on the right side. Then he went wrong; just the kind of a man who is not wanted in the legislature. Fortunately for the fiftieth district, it has a chance, in the person of W. C. Clark, to nominate and elect an assemblyman who will vote for Right Things all the time and who will not need to be watched.

San Francisco Registration

Registration for the primary election closed at midnight Wednesday night. The registration in San Francisco is approximately 67,500, and of this probably 80 per cent is Republican, or about 54,000. Eight or nine thousand are Democrats, and the remainder are scattered amongst Socialists, Prohibitionists, and those Union Labor Party adherents who neglected to change their affiliation in accordance with the decision of the Election Commission. This registration is a tribute to the interest aroused in the people by their first opportunity to vote under a direct primary, for the number registered is 12,000 in excess of the highest estimates and by far the largest primary election registration in the history of San Francisco. A great deal of this extra registration is directly due to the Hiram Johnson meetings in San Francisco, at Dreamland Rink and the Central Theatre. The people now have the opportunity to vindicate their political sagacity at the point where the vote really counts, which is at the primary election. With the issue clearly drawn—the emancipation of the state from corporate control—and plainly personified in Hiram Johnson, the result of that primary should not be in doubt.

Johnson at the Star Theatre

Hiram Johnson's meeting last Wednesday evening at the Star Theatre, in the Mission district of San Francisco, was beyond the expectations of his most optimistic supporters. The Star is the largest theatre in the city, seating about 2,400. Every seat was filled, every box was filled, and hundreds stood. Johnson spoke directly to the hearts of the main body of the audience—the union laborers—and showed them the fallacy of the idea that bad government and good times could go hand in hand. The point went home, and the audience rose to it with cheers. The betrayal of union labor by its professed political friends was shown, and this point also hit its mark. The large body of union leaders—not union labor politicians—that sat on the platform behind Johnson, gave force to his arguments. This meeting put the concluding seal of union labor approval upon Johnson's candidacy, besides being an overwhelming popular success.

The Curry Circular

We are getting along to that stage of the primary campaign when scurrility and trickery, tomfoolery and stupidity, may be expected to do their worst. We do not know who sent out the scurrilous circular, but a few facts may help to a sagacious surmise.

1. It was sent out by a fool. No one but a fool would have taken the chance of serving years in prison, and being fined anywhere from $3,000 to $30,000, for the use of "penalty" envelopes to save a dollar or two in stamps.

2. That fool had access to the office of a United States marshal who received his appointment at the hands of Senator Frank Flint and must therefore be favorable either to Anderson, Curry or Stanton, but not to Johnson.

3. Unless it was sent out to create sympathy for Curry, which would imply sagacity, and no fool has sagacity, it was sent out to injure Curry or Johnson, but not Anderson or Stanton.

4. It was sent only to papers supporting Johnson, evidently in the hope that their zeal would lead them to make the mistake of publishing a libelous, scandalous screed, manifestly, even to a fool, injurious to Johnson.

5. It was prepared by some one conversant with Curry's political history.

If the detectives will look for someone with a special grievance against Curry, someone discharged from his service, one who has the run of the office of the United States marshal for the southern district of California, some zealot with a thimble full of brains, a stomach full of whiskey and an organism surcharged with "dope," they will probably discover the miscreant. The Watchman is of opinion that all the candidates may safely be absolved from all complicity.

Johnson's Itinerary

The concluding weeks of the primary campaign will be occupied by Hiram Johnson as follows: Friday night, July 29th, he will speak at the Clunie Theatre in Sacramento; Saturday night, July 30th, he will speak in the Auditorium in San Jose. The week of August 1st to 6th, inclusive, he will tour Southern California. On Monday, August 8th, he will speak in San Francisco; Tuesday, the 9th, in Sacramento; Wednesday, the 10th, and Thursday, the 11th, two meetings a day in San Francisco; Friday, the 12th, evening meeting in Alcatraz Hall, Oakland, on Peralta, between 7th and 8th streets; and Saturday evening, August 13th, at Dreamland Rink, San Francisco.

Santa Clara Endorsements

Last Saturday evening, at a public meeting of the Santa Clara County Republican Club, held in San Jose, the candidacies of the following were endorsed: R. L. Telfer, assembly from the 55th district; L. D. Bohnett, assembly from 56th district; Charles R. Detrick, assembly from 57th district; Marshall Black, for the state senate; E. A. Hayes, for congress, and the state ticket headed by Hiram Johnson. This is the regular Republican club of Santa Clara county. A significant point was made by a speaker at this meeting: that of the candidates endorsed ten are incumbents and five are candidates for offices to which the incumbents do not aspire.

Lanktree's Chosen Ones

Joe Lanktree, organization boss of Alameda, is making a special effort in behalf of four men whom he is especially anxious to see elected. This should be sufficient reason for voting against them. They are: John W. Mott, for recorder; John P. Cook, for county clerk; Joe Kelley, for supervisor, and Sumner Crosby, for the assembly.

Charles Battell Loomis is touring England and writing letters to the New York Sun about his experiences. Among these he records the following: "In Chiswick churchyard he showed me what looked like a freshly dug grave and told me that there lay one of the most famous Americans who ever lived, a man who wished to be buried there because another great man lay there already—Hogarth. 'Who was the American?' I asked. 'Jimmy Whistler.'"

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of MARY GAFFNEY, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said administratrix at the law office of Maurice Gradwohl, 816 Pacific Building, corner Fourth and Market streets, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as her place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased.

ELIZABETH HOLLAND,
Administratrix of the estate of Mary Gaffney, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, July 7, 1910.
MAURICE GRADWOHL, Attorney at Law, Pacific Building, San Francisco.

7-8-4t

JULIUS GARMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office, 30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491
Residence, 1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590
SAN FRANCISCO

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY REPORT ON THE Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco

As disclosed by the investigations of the Oliver Grand Jury and the prosecution of certain persons for bribery and other offenses against the state.

William Denman, Chairman
Will J. French
Henry Gibbons, Jr.
Alexander Goldstein
William Kirk Guthrie
William Kent
D. O. Crowley

Committee appointed by Mayor Taylor
October 12, 1908.

The California Weekly has reprinted, in pamphlet form, the official copy of this report, as published by the Board of Supervisors, and has added a complete INDEX OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS discussed and an explanatory preface.

Copies of this report may be had, together with three months' subscription to The California Weekly for 50 cents.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY
26 Montgomery St. San Francisco

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of JAMES CORCORAN, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, M. J. Hynes, Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at the office of the Administrator, Room 858, Phelan Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said deceased.

M. J. HYNES,
Administrator of the estate of James Corcoran, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, June 30, 1910.
CULLINAN & HICKEY, Attorneys for Administrator.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
H. L. HOLMES and MARY FRANCES HOLMES, his wife, Plaintiffs,

vs.
All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

J. E. WHITE,
Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of H. L. Holmes and Mary Frances Holmes, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Louisburg (formerly Spring) Street, distant thereon one hundred and seventy-eight feet northeasterly from the northeasterly line of Mount Vernon Avenue; running thence northeasterly and along the said northwesterly line of Louisburg Street thirty-eight feet; thence at a right angle northwesterly one hundred and three feet, and six inches; thence at a right angle southwesterly thirty-eight feet; thence at a right angle southeasterly one hundred and three feet and six inches to the northwesterly line of Louisburg Street and the point of commencement, being a part of Lot number 14 of San Miguel Homestead Association as per map thereof filed March 5, 1867, in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple as absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 19th day of July A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By Jas. P. Kane, Deputy Clerk.
MEMORANDUM.
The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 22d day of July A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

Amanda Carmean Tharp, San Jose, California.
J. E. WHITE, Attorney at Law,
729-731 Monadnock Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-10t

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON SALE OF REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
In the Matter of the Estate of ANN DUGAN, deceased.

No. 9481. Dept. 10.
In the above-entitled matter the verified petition of Michael Dugan, administrator of the estate of Ann Dugan, deceased, for an order of sale of all of the real estate and personal property of said deceased, having been this day presented to the Court, and it appearing to the Court from such petition that it is necessary and that it will be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said estate and of those interested therein, to sell the whole of said real estate and personal property in order to pay the debts outstanding against said decedent, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration, and for the purposes and reasons mentioned in said petition, and the said petition having been this day filed herein,

NOW, THEREFORE, it is hereby ordered that all persons interested in the said estate be and appear before this Court, Department Ten thereof, in the Grant Building, on the southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Friday, the 19th day of August, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m., then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to said executor for the sale of all of the real estate and personal property of said estate.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks next preceding said day in "The California Weekly," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated, July 15, 1910.
J. M. SEAWELL,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Enrolled. Filed July 15, 1910.
H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By E. B. Gilson, Deputy Clerk.
W. H. PAYSON, Attorney for Executor, No. 1700
Call Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-4t.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
ABRAHAM C. MINCHIN, Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

J. E. WHITE,
Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Abraham C. Minchin, the plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Southwesterly line of Madison Avenue, distant thereon three hundred and fifty-five (355) feet Southeasterly from the Southeasterly line of Harrison Street; running thence Southeasterly along the said Southwesterly line of Madison Avenue thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles Southwesterly eighty feet; thence at right angles Northwesterly thirty-two (32) feet and six (6) inches; and thence at right angles Northeasterly eighty feet to the point of beginning, being a part of 100 Vara Lot, No. 190.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 19th day of July A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By Jas. P. Kane, Deputy Clerk.
MEMORANDUM.
The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 22d day of July A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

None.
J. E. WHITE, Attorney at Law,
729-731 Monadnock Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-10t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
J. R. ALEXANDER, Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property described herein, or any part thereof,

Defendants.

J. E. WHITE,
Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of J. R. Alexander, the plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have, in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:
Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Northerly line of Day Street with the Easterly line of Castro Street; running thence Easterly along said Northerly line of Day Street thirty (30) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly one hundred and fourteen (114) feet; thence at a right angle Westerly thirty (30) feet; thence at a right angle Easterly along said Easterly line of Castro Street one hundred and fourteen (114) feet to the said intersection of the Northerly line of Day Street with the Easterly line of Castro Street and the point of commencement, being a portion of Block No. 171.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 19th day of July A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By Jas. P. Kane, Deputy Clerk.
MEMORANDUM.
The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 22d day of July A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

None.
J. E. WHITE, Attorney at Law,
729-731 Monadnock Building, San Francisco, Cal.

7-22-10t

CACOETHES VERBIFACIENDI

THAT MAKES THE FEARFUL AND WONDERFUL LINGO OF SCIENCE

By MARSDEN MANSON

Just as crowding a dense population upon limited areas has developed diseases unknown in primitive states of life, so too the crowding of a number of ideas into a limited brain space has developed new brain diseases. In both cases the young and the weak are more susceptible than the strong. Remedial and protective measures must therefore be extended to them. In both cases, too, there are outbreaks which pass almost beyond control, and which take the form of epidemics and necessitate isolation and protection. The parallel goes farther, the need of removing waste products from homes and of introducing an abundance of pure air and water has developed the science of sanitary engineering. In corresponding lines there has grown up a need for the application of knowledge to the removal of waste and useless words and the introduction of pure modes of expressing thought.

It might be said that our colleges and universities were developing this application of knowledge and that they were putting into precept and practice the rules which would rid our language of the great heaps of word dregs and scum which are still accumulating. But, unfortunately, the college bred man is frequently afflicted with a tendency to build up hybrid words, and when he discovers something actually new, or rarer still, develops an original idea, he spurns the use of the roots and powers of his mother tongue in making a name for his novelty.

The most prevalent of these new diseases and its cause will first be considered, then its effects in various branches of knowledge will be illustrated, and finally a few suggestions as to the proper treatment will be given.

Cause of This New Disease

It is at times considered necessary to dress up weak and feeble ideas on small subjects in a highly scientific garb. If these subjects be dealt with in clear, plain English the matter would stand forth in all its ugliness; it therefore becomes desirable to use big, high-sounding words to pad out the little idea into big shape. The newer the words, the more stunning the effect and the more difficult the detection. This introduces an incentive to word building or word inventing, which has developed in feeble minded individuals addicted to science the disease which may very properly be called cacoethes verbifaciendi.^{*} This disease is to a certain extent contagious and if contracted in early life the mental effects sometimes persist through several generations. In those disposed to epideicticism it becomes chronic. Patients suffering from subtle types of this chronic form have gained a foothold in the faculties of some of our colleges and universities and thus successive classes have become contaminated and have spread the disease so widely that it will be difficult to eradicate.

It is, however, an encouraging sign that two types of students, although repeatedly exposed, resist attacks of this disease entirely, and investigation has readily revealed the fact that such students either have good common sense or are deeply versed in the dead languages, both of which make the student completely immune. But for those who have a smattering of the dead languages and for feeble minded persons addicted to science there is as yet no known prophylactic. In the most common and aggravating forms of this disease the patient is beguiled into the idea that by the frequent use of hybrid words made by adding to the names of individuals the system of terminology used in the declension of nouns in dead languages he is expressing himself in a highly learned and scientific manner. It matters not whether he is talking of a bug or of a rock, so long as he can call it by some hybrid word built up possibly of a surname of North European or Erse origin and a Latin or Greek terminal he is happy.

Originated in Egypt

The delusion above mentioned appears to be a very degenerate form of a practice originating, it is believed, in ancient Egypt. Here the learned and scientific were not content with the shallow subtleties now used, but expressed themselves in a language totally different from that used by common people and absolutely unintelligible to them; while the modern practice is to form a sort of philological hash, the ingredients being fairly good English and the mongrel words above referred to, built in accordance with the grammars of two languages, the rules of which are incongruent.

The consequences of the unchecked ravages of this disease are serious.

(1) The ignorant or uninitiated are led to look upon the most serious cases as cultivated and scientific men.

(2) The youth of the land are given a sickly form of mental training which is actually weakening in its effects.

(3) Instead of that pure and strong speech for which good English is noted, there is substituted a weak and pedantic style in which "garbled or rehearsed ideas are often made to masquerade as original thought."

The effects of this new disease are best brought to notice by citing a few cases:

Jimtown—Ha-ma-siopolis

At the meeting of the A. A. A. S., a member was describing a "new species" of saxifrage which was named in honor of Prof. James. This gentleman's name had been rendered into scientific jargon by adding the Latin genitive termination ii—but Jamesii does not sound quite "scientific" enough to suit your "modern scientist" and the Latin j is pronounced h according to one system of Latin pronunciation, and each vowel forms a syllable, so our Jamesii became Ha-me-sii. There's science for you with a vengeance. Under this system, our well known Californian city of Jimtown becomes Ha-ma-siopolis.* After an exposure of this kind that section of the A. A. A. S. ought to be quarantined for a year, and made to study English grammar during the whole period, and Prof. who necessitated the quarantine ought to be sentenced to the use of pure English for the rest of his natural life.

As an example of the effect of this disease upon geologists the following case is cited as a useless addition to that already overburdened branch of science. The forces which have upheaved the continents have been considered and their effects observed for several generations, but it has been left for Prof. to introduce the words "epeirogenic" and "epeirogeny." It is to be hoped that some consolation has been afforded him after this effort and no doubt the poor man is deluded into the idea that he has discovered something new or at least invented something or other. He has—he has invented a useless expression for an idea known and well expressed before he was born and he has exposed himself to the grave suspicion on the part of alienists that he has contracted epeirogemia.

Rules For Doing It, Forsooth!

But these philological pranks with dead and living languages have not been played without rules. Very many rules have been written in all seriousness, describing how, when and where to galvanize into scientific use the ^{*}Several of the words used in these pages are the results of a temporary fever artificially produced in the writer after long exposure to severe cases of cacoethes verbifaciendi and by inoculating him with the germs of this disease. These words are not recommended for general use except as antidotes, for which purpose they have been found effective in mild cases in early life.

grammar and terminals of the dead languages of Greece and Rome and how to graft their petrified terminals upon the living roots of modern names, or how, after finding out some peculiarity of the object, to render this into Latin or Greek. The results would be funny if they were not so ghastly. One master and earnest lover of the grand literature of the classics refrains from passing through the botanical gardens at one of our universities because the names of the plants cause him to have the nightmare. The effect of looking over the lists of names of birds, bugs, rocks and plants which have been newly made would be to give him a severe attack of literary jimjams in which he would see a Greek phalanx of Japanese dragons in rubber boots and Roman helmets, led by Julius Caesar in the costume of Li Hung Chang.

In a highly commended treatise on how to build up "scientific names of Latin and Greek Derivation,"* there are found seventy-two rules, each with its exceptions. The most valuable rule of the lot is part of number 4, which, with slight additions, covers the whole ground.

"Hybrid Words—In building a compound name two classical languages should never be mixed. The new words should be wholly Greek or wholly Latin. Hybrid words are always objectionable and such compounds as Swainson's Felichthys, Longicephalus, Leptogunellus, Flavigaster, Gymno-coryus, arborophila and the like are enough to make one's hair stand on end."

Siwash-Latin Combinations

This is a very excellent rule, except that it does not go far enough, or that it should be followed by another to the effect that in building a compound name a dead classical terminal should never be grafted on a live North European root nor upon a Siwash, an Aztec or a Japanese root.

If Longicephalus or Arbrophila "would make one's hair stand on end," what would become of one's hair and whiskers at the sight of a Latin or Greek terminal grafted upon a Siwash, an Aztec or a Japanese root—could more monstrous philological hybrids be imagined than Sterna Aleutica, Numenius Tahitensis, Synthliborampus (w)umizusume? Yet these are modern scientific names, built up of Latin and Aleut, Latin and Tahitian and Greek and Japanese. It is almost impossible to imagine by what processes of thought such names are brought forth—indeed upon critical analysis these words seem to be the result of a sort of cerebral borborygmus rather than of the action of a healthy and well developed brain.

Yucatan

In naming a very beautiful dove found in Southern Mexico a remarkable breach of these rules was made. This dove has been called Zenaidura Yucatan-ensis. Now of all the mixtures of miserable lingo and Latin this leads. Yucatan got its name from a question asked by the natives of that country of the Spanish and Portuguese discoverers and explorers. These in sailing along this coast inquired of the natives in the rich variety of languages embraced in their crews, "what country is this." The natives not being versed in these languages inquired in turn "Yucatan," or what do you say? So these exploring pirates named the country "Yucatan." Now comes the scientist and converts this jargon into scientific language by adding "ensis." In a similar manner had he been exploring the Barbary coast of San Francisco and had inquired of some native the name of the locality and received the return inquiry, "whad-jo-soy," he would have concluded that this was a good name to introduce into science and classified the natives as specimens of the variety of the human race, called Homo whad-jo-soy-ensis.

^{*}In earlier times this disease was sometimes diagnosed as "congenital senility," but the refinements of more modern methods, when common sense has been replaced by pedantry, require greater elegance of expression.

*Pro. Cal. Academy of Sciences, 3d Series, Vol. 1, No. 3.

Two "Dont's"

These seventy-two rules could be advantageously reduced to two, as follows:

Rule 1. Never build up a supposed Greek or Latin name for which a plain English equivalent exists or can be made.

Rule 2. Whenever it is necessary to resort to classic languages follow the rules of those languages and keep their purity and grandeur entirely free from admixture with an incongruous modern language or lingo.

One great difficulty in all of this minute classifying and naming is that the whole series of plants, animals and minerals is or has been in the process of evolution. Each living individual of each species is undergoing this process and has reached that particular stage or condition which the environments of its ancestors and itself require. The series are therefore infinite so far as variety is concerned and the differences when not apparent to the unaided eye become so under high powered microscopes. When by the closest scrutiny and comparisons these differences are detected the discoverer proceeds to add a new species to the long and dreary lists, and vainly imagines that he has added new laurels to his brow, and has immortalized himself by having a Latin genitive tacked on his name, which name may be even less fit for such an appendage than his performance is worthy of merit.

As an illustration of this tendency to multiply names the following instance is cited:

A dyke of trap has been upthrust through a granitic formation. This dyke highly heated and compressed the granite on each side for 200 or more feet. This heat and pressure was greatest next the dyke and gradually faded to the limits above mentioned. These modifications in heat and pressure produced differences in structure and probably slight variations in composition in each part of the zones bordering the dyke. Now according to

MANUFACTURERS, BUSINESS HOUSES, AND PUBLIC MEN

can obtain all kinds of newspaper information from

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

It covers the State, Coast, and entire country. Send for details.

88 First Street
San Francisco

117 Winston Street
Los Angeles

They say that no one can live without dining, but thousands do.
To eat is not to dine. If you want to dine well you must be certain to get our

Pure Mocha Coffee

Guaranteed under the pure food law

SUNSET TEA COMPANY

911 CLAY ST., OAKLAND

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital$ 1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910..... 40,384,727.21
Total Assets 43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Egn. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

modern modes of naming rocks there are quite a large number of kinds of rocks in these altered zones—some with Scandinavian, some with German and English and a sprinkling of Erse, all ending in "ite," but none of them describing the origin and nature of the rock.

It appears that in naming the various animals and plants of past eras and of present time two general modes have been adopted. These may be properly termed: (1) The Siwash and (2) The Mongrel.

The Siwash Mode

The Siwash appears to have the more philosophic basis and the mongrel to better meet the requirements of vanity. The Siwash is a mode quite generally adopted by primitive peoples—for instance, the Indian names his chiefs and great men by a system which describes some characteristic of the individual. Sometimes these names are poetic and heroic, at others they are somewhat the reverse. As examples of the former we have chiefs "War-Eagle," "Black-Hawk," "Thunder-Cloud," as examples of the latter, we have "Sitting-Bull," "Scar-faced Charley," "Rain-in-the-Face" or "Man-Afraid-of-his-Horse."

In adapting this system to scientific purposes we have the following: "Woman's-breast-toothed-Animal" (mastodon), "Terrible-big-Beast" (dinotherium giganticus), "Unarmed-beast" (anopotherium), "Kin-to-a-Lizard" (plesiosaurus), "More-kin-to-a-Lizard" (Pleosaurus). In both cases these names are well chosen. The Indian has been no less apt in recognizing the leading characteristic of his chief and in naming him therefore than scientists have been in selecting the names for certain "terrible big beasts," whose remains they have unearthed. The fact that the Indian uses his own language and the scientist patches up a supposed Greek or Latin equivalent for what he is ashamed to say in his own tongue is more to the credit of the Indian, besides the Indian names for his chiefs might sound just as "scientific" in Greek or Latin as do the names of Woman's breast toothed animal, or Terrible big Beast. Let us try:

Sitting Bull becomes tararus sedans; Scar-faced Charley, caroulidion oulopou; Rain-in-the-Face, ombros hupopios; Man-Afraid-of-his-Horse, Hippon phobonmenos; War-Eagle, Aquila bellica; Black Hawk, Kircus melas; Thunder-Cloud, Nephos baruktupou.*

Is it any more "scientific" to call the bones of a terrible big beast the skeleton of a dinotherium giganteus, than it is to speak of Black Hawk as Kircus Melas or of the great chief War Eagle as Aquila Bellica. There might be objections to this were that doughty old warrior still in the flesh, for he might use his tomahawk as a writ of ejectment for the brain that would call him a squaw War Eagle.

The Mongrel Mode

In the second or mongrel mode, the general idea seems to be to tack the genitive terminals of the classic languages on any name of any old kind of a language or dialect to form a sort of scientific lingo which is supposed to be very learned and impressive. In its pure form this mode is admissible and originated at a period when the English, German and French languages were not competent to express scientific thought. Newton could hardly have written his Principia in the English of that day, and Bacon would have had a still harder task to have written his Aphorisms in his mother tongue. But Darwin found no difficulty in giving the grand truths of Evolution to the world in plain English, marred only by certain names, the use of which he could not avoid by reason of the fact that the scientists of his age had suffered from cacothesis verbi-faciendi.

The most virulent and confluent case of this disease yet published is recorded below:

The Unfortunate Trilobite

Many geological ages ago there lived a three-lobed shell-fish. His family embraced

(Continued on Page 574)

*The writer respectfully acknowledges his indebtedness to Prof. C. of the University of California for his rendition of the English translations of these Indian names into Greek and Latin.

HONOLULU and back first class from San Francisco

Reduced Rate $110
The splendid steamship SIERRA (twin screw, 10,000 tons displacement), makes trip in 5½ days. R. T. tickets good for 4 mos. Sailings, July 30th, August 20th and every 21 days. Book now. Honolulu, most attractive spot on entire round-the-world tour. Volcano Kilauea now unusually active.

LINE TO TAHITI AND NEW ZEALAND: S. S. Mariposa sails from S. F. Aug. 6, Sept. 11, etc. Tahiti and back, first-class, $125. New Zealand (Wellington) and back, $246.25. Good 6 mos. Write or wire

OCEANIC S. S. CO., 673 Market St., San Francisco.

T. J. FITZSIMMONS

GILT EDGE INVESTMENTS

309-310 MARINE BUILDING

CALIFORNIA and FRONT STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

708 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus 400,000.00
Profits 45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy. Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The First National Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Capital$3,000,000.00
Surplus and Profits..... 1,945,000.00

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

First Federal Trust Company

CAPITAL$1,500,000.00

Interest at 3½ per cent. per annum paid on Deposits.

DIRECTORS:

John A. Hooper James D. Phelan
J. G. Hooper Mark L. Requa
Thomas Jennings J. H. Skinner
James K. Lynch Rudolph Spreckels
Walter S. Martin John W. Van Bergen
J. K. Moffitt Rolla V. Watt
S. G. Murphy Clinton E. Worden
George Whittell

Our Armor Plate Safe Deposit Vaults provide perfect security for valuables at moderate cost.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

BUD ASHTON sat at his desk in the "News" office, under the glow of a green-shaded electric light, putting the finishing touches on a police court story for the morning's paper. McLaughlin, the regular man on the police detail, was off in the Rockies on his vacation where, as he wisely remarked to the boys when he bade them goodbye, "Kelley can't reach me by wireless." Kelley was the city editor, and many a vacation he had ruined by wiring for a reporter to come back and handle a big story.

So, while McLaughlin was away, Bud Ashton was handling the police news. He had been in Kansas City only a year, coming to the city from Sedalia to win his spurs as a knight of the pen. He had done pretty well with the work that had come his way, but he was still only an understudy to McLaughlin, and of course McLaughlin got all the big stories to do. With McLaughlin away, Bud hoped that something would happen to give him the chance to show how he could handle a scare-header. It meant a rise in his chosen profession, and then there was the girl down in Sedalia who expected great things of him and had promised to share his luck when he could see rent and the grocer's bill in his weekly pay check.

As he pulled the last sheet of copy out of the typewriter and turned to his desk to correct it with pencil, Bud felt a touch at his elbow and turned to the office devil, who had come up behind him.

"The old man wants to see you," said the devil.

"Kelley?" Bud asked.

"Sure."

Bud did not wait to finish his copy. When Kelley sent for a man he wanted him, quick. So he walked rapidly across the hall and knocked at the door marked "City Editor."

"Come in!" sounded from within and Bud opened the door, a little nervously. Most men were nervous around Kelley. He was not a prepossessing man. Sitting at a roll-top desk in the far corner of a huge room that was in gloom except for the one light at his elbow, Kelley looked like a monstrous toad. He was short and fat, and his face was bloated with liquor and white from night hours. The puffs of fat beneath his eyes were blue-black. The eyes themselves were sharp but glowering. Kelley had no friend but work. Schooled in the hardening experiences of newspaper work, he had developed from a blustering rowdy of the streets into a capable newspaper man and nothing else. Life, to him, meant only news. People were merely names. Human joys and human sorrows were only stories for tomorrow's columns—especially the sorrows. He was cynical; he was ruthless in the quest for news; he was immovable as to printing it. "If you didn't want your name in the paper, why did you do it?" he sneered to folk who pleaded for the mercy of oblivion.

His divination of news stories at times was weird. In touch with the world only through the telephone, the telegraph, and the handful of young men who sat in the big room across the hall, he oftentimes scented a news "beat" from the dark corner where he squatted at his desk when every other paper in town was far afield on a false lead.

Bud closed the door behind him and stepped over to Kelley's desk. Kelley glanced up and turned to a file beside him. Picking from it a scrap of paper, he handed it to Bud and said:

"Write the story of this fellow's capture."

Bud took the bit of paper—a clipping from a Chicago daily—and glanced rapidly through it. It was the latest account of the fruitless search for "Danny, the Kid," whose exploit in robbing the La Salle Street Bank, of Chicago, of fifty thousand dollars in bills was the national sensation of the hour in police circles. The case against the Kid was complete; the only hiatus in it was the Kid himself, who had made a clean escape and had so far baffled the utmost effort of public and private detectives.

Bud looked up with an exclamation:

"Have they got him?"

Kelley glowered from his desk, blinking his eyes:

"Got nothing. You get him."

BUD ASHTON'S SCOOP

BY

E. FRENCH STROTHER

"But Chicago—the police—" Bud stammered.

"I said get him!" bellowed Kelley. "He's in Kansas City, under your nose. And don't police me. The police are blockheads. We're the police, the unofficial police. We catch 'em every day when they can't scent 'em. Beat the police and scoop the town. Down in the river bottoms, he is. Here, this address," and he handed Bud a sheet of copy paper with an address written on it, an address in the smoky Missouri river bottom district of the city, beyond the Union Depot and near the stockyards, a district of miserable hovels where negroes and poor whites live.

Bud slipped out of Kelley's office, glad to be from under Kelley's menacing eye. He was a little nervous at the thought of taking Danny the Kid; that meant hand to hand work with a desperate man and a chance to get shot; but he was exultant too, for this was the big story, the great chance to scoop the town, yes, to scoop the country. He saw his signed story on the first page of The News tomorrow morning, his picture alongside that of Danny the Kid, captor and captured. He heard the applause of his fellows in the office, the gruff "Good work" of Kelley, the murmured adoration of the girl in Sedalia. It spelled that flat he had dreamed of, and the lady at the front door to greet him when he came home every night.

He went to his desk and slipped from the drawer of it into his pocket the thirty-two automatic revolver that he carried only when he had to visit the toughest parts of town. Carefully he pinned to the inside of his coat, below the label and out of sight, the nicked badge of a special policeman. Once again he read the detailed description of Danny the Kid, and then he slipped out to the street and made his way toward the bottoms.

As he went he began to wonder, more calmly, whether he was not on a wild chase. Kelley had done some wonderful feats in scenting news, but wasn't it rather absurd to suppose that even Kelley could know that Danny the Kid was in town and, more absurd, that he would be at a given address this evening? As the street-car ran out of the tunnel upon the steel trestle over the railroad tracks and into the Union Depot, Bud felt that his dreams of glory and bliss were upon a fantastic foundation of improbability. A moment later, as he picked his way through the crowded station and reached the street, he was even inclined to laugh. A half hour later, as he stood in the dark roadway of the evil district to which Kelley had sent him, staring at a house dimly outlined across the street, he did laugh aloud.

The house was so obviously respectable, for all its poor associations. The one gleam of light that proved it tenanted fell from a window partly raised, a window screened by a cheap scrim curtain, cheap but neat and clean. What lay within the room Bud had not yet made out, for the light within seemed to be turned low. That was suspicious. But as Bud watched, the front door was opened, and a woman's voice sounded, low but distinct:

"Will that be all, doctor?"

A bluff, hearty voice responded:

"I'm afraid that's the best we can do."

And the door was closed as a man, with firm tread, came down the steps.

Bud, with every muscle tense, his revolver drawn, was across the street and by the gate when the man opened it. But even in the dark shadows he saw plainly that this was not the Kid. A portly figure, full face, clean-shaven, could not by any chance be the sallow, slight Danny of the police descriptions. Bud passed the doctor and walked slowly on toward the next house.

Suddenly he started. As if from nowhere, a figure glided past him, silent, swift, slender and lithe. Bud turned his head just in time to see the figure entering the gate the doctor had just left. Like a flash Bud turned and followed, in quick, noiseless leaps. As the stranger turned to close the gate, he confronted Bud's revolver, thrust full in his face, a short three feet from his eyes.

"Put 'em up!" Bud exclaimed. "Up! I say."

The man had made a motion of resistance that had caused Bud's added ejaculation. The warning was heeded, however, and the hands went into the air.

"Back away a little, there," commanded Bud, and as the man obeyed, Bud opened the gate. "Now, you, come on."

Until now the man had made no sound. Now he spoke, but in a whisper.

"For God's sake, bo, gimme half an hour. That's me mother in there, dyin', and I got to see her. Just a half an hour, bo."

The savage intensity in the man's voice touched Bud, and made him pause, but an instant later he was more than suspicious. This was Danny the Kid, the smoothest man in the business, resourceful as a fox and as dangerous as a wolf. What kind of a den might be within that house, cloaked under the guise of respectability, he did not know. But caution urged redoubled vigilance.

"Nothing doing," Bud replied. "That gag don't go down. You come on, and mighty quick."

He felt the exultation of the chase, the gloating triumph of the man-hunter who has found his prey. The vision had come true, Kelley's divination had been vindicated, he had the quarry and the presses would be ringing it on the beaten town before another dawn.

"Come on!" he added, with a persuasive twist of the revolver.

The man suddenly leaned forward.

"Shoot, damn you, shoot!" he whispered. "I tells you, me mother's in there, dyin', and I don't go till I see her, if I die fer it."

Something in the fierce earnestness of his manner carried conviction to Bud.

"Tell me about it," he said, keeping his revolver pointed, "but keep those hands up while you're doing it."

"I gets the word in Chi, see, and I beats it here. She don't know me business. She tinks I'm workin' in de shops. She's been good to me, and when dey tells me she's goin', I got to see her. See? You'd a done it, wouldn't you, bo? I'll go wit' you when I seen her. Honest to God, I'll go like a lamb. Are you on?"

Bud's revolver went to his side, but still aimed.

"Go ahead," he said, "I'll have to go too."

"Sure, bo, on'y don't let her know."

"All right. Go ahead."

With Danny ahead and Bud following, the two walked up the steps to the door. Danny knocked gently. The door was opened and a nurse stood facing them.

"How's me mother?" Danny asked, and his face, by the dim hall light, showed drawn and haggard.

"Mrs. Latimer is dying," said the nurse, and let them in. She seemed to know Danny, and Bud hesitated to follow. But at the sound of a smothered groan from Danny he went in and the nurse closed the door softly. Without further words the nurse led them to the room from which Bud had seen the light issue. Here, on a bed, lay an old woman, whose sweetness of expression had not faded under the long strain of illness, and whose white hair surrounded her face like a radiance. Her eyes were closed, and only the slow rise and fall of the covers showed that breath had not already flown. The nurse paused at the doorway.

"The doctor says she may live till mornin'," she whispered, "but he thinks not longer than midnight. He'll be back, he said."

Bud looked at Danny. The evil lines of his face were gone, or nearly gone, and their place had been taken by an expression of tenderness, of grief, and of helpless despair. He tiptoed to the bedside and lifted the wasted hand that lay upon the cover and touched the dying woman's forehead. She did not respond to his caress, and Danny's head fell to his knees. He sat so for a long time, and then beckoned to the nurse.

"Ain't she goin' to wake up, ever?" he whispered.

"Maybe for a moment—" she paused with the delicacy of sympathy before she added—"at the end."

Again Danny strove to rouse her. Again he failed. He motioned Bud to a chair and drew his own closer to the bedside. There they sat as the clock on the mantelpiece ticked off the hours. Bud had noted the time as he came in, eleven o'clock. The hands moved on to twelve. Only an hour more till closing time for copy, Bud could not help reflecting. But he put the thought away and sat in silence. The hands moved on to one. They could get out an extra edition, anyway. One-thirty. Two. The dream of the scoop of the town, of the flat and the girl, of Kelley's praise, was dissolving, but Bud sat still. The white figure in the bed stirred now and again, but did not rouse.

Three o'clock. The dying woman's eyes opened. Danny leaned over her in an agony of hope, of fear, of tenderness. "Mammy," he called, "Mammy, it's Dan." A smile slowly curved her lips, she nodded feebly, and Danny stooped to give and receive a kiss. "God bless my boy," she whispered. "Good-bye."

She lay still, the smile still on her lips, and Danny sobbed like a broken-hearted child.

Bud was at his desk in the News office early the next evening. Carefully he closed the drawer after removing from it the few things that belonged to him. For the third time he picked up the evening papers and glanced at the stories of his rivals in which his own name did not appear. Kelley entered the room, his face swollen with anger.

"You," he shouted. "You pup! Got your man and then let 'em scoop you! You're a newspaper man, all right. You're fired."

Bud smiled and spoke quietly:

"Oh, I know that, Mr. Kelley. Good-night."

And he turned his back—and walked past the line of reporters that had waited for this explosion, and descended the stairs and strolled out into the night, still smiling to himself.

("Cacoethes Verbificendi"—Continued)

numerous kinds and has been given the classic name of trilobite. Although "Silurians," they were the kings of the earth in their time, and being the characteristic life of one of the earliest ages, their remains have been ruthlessly torn from their graves, scientifically classified and labeled and stored in collections where rude mortals may gaze at them and talk wisely.

The names which have been given the various members of this family do not vary materially from those which have been bestowed upon birds, rocks and plants, except in some instances. One of these is so out of harmony with the principles of naming animals (a privilege especially conferred upon Adam, and by heritage upon his descendants), that it is worthy of notice. The particular family of Trilobites chosen for this name is supposed to be the oldest upon earth. It might therefore have been deemed proper to give a name indicative of their ancient origin and lineage, and according to the dignified oriental custom to have called them most ancient and illustrious in proper classic terms in accordance with the majesty of their position as the progenitors of numerous progeny which reigned longer than any of the reigning families of human history.

But, unfortunately, two ambitious paleontologists have been industrious in giving a supposed life history and family connections to this particular trilobite, and in vaporizing about their bearing upon contemporaneous and subsequent history, and they both desired to link their fame with that of this great ancestral race of trilobites. Unfortunately too, for Prof. 's 72 rules for forming scientific connections of this sort (each rule with its exceptions), these scientists were named respectively Schmidt and Mickwitz. One is led to surmise that the former was a Dutchman and the latter a Pole. One name

